Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. Arthur A. Waite, an evangelist, closed a revival at Lynn, Mass., by running away without paying his bills.

THE marriage service uniting a Chicago couple was, it is asserted, performed by departed spirits, a medium acting under their control.

THE unflinching persistence of ex-Shepherd Cowley in clamoring for that $6,500 which he claims the city owes him for starving the young lambs in his "Fold" is regarded as one of the most noteworthy of the ecclesiastical phenomena of the day.

THE friends of a poor man at Stillwater, Minn., gratuitously dug a grave for his dead child, but the Christian sexton refused to permit the funeral procession to enter the cemetery, on the ground that he had been cheated out of the job.

PRESIDENT PORTER of Yale takes occasion to declare that in the instruction department of the college no religious tests are applied. It is not even demanded that instructors shall formally express a faith in God, or shall use any religious influences.

THE Roman Catholic Bishop of Cincinnati, in consequence of dancing having been allowed at some church fairs, has issued a circular positivly forbidding dances after dark at entertainments given for church purposes, and round dances at any times.

A NUMBER of Mormons who claim that Brigham Young introduced the doctrin of polygamy and blood atonement contrary to the original belief hav organized a new church in Salt Lake City. They renounce polygamy, and refuse to pay any more tithes.

PASTOR SEGUIN, who is laboring among the French Protestants in this city, has issued a pamphlet to show that the apostle Peter was never in Rome. One of his principal arguments is that the epistles of Paul make no mention of having seen Peter there.

BAKER, of the Halifax Mayflower, naively says: "For my part, I cannot understand how a parson need ever be caught. He can always make pastoral calls, without the object of his visits being questioned; and yet here is the melancholy fact that in a few of the states 917 parsons were convicted, the last three years, of adultery, rape, seduction, and even nameless crimes."

IN a sermon preached on Sunday, the 18th, the Rev. Dr. John Hall said: "Let us act so the community may say, 'He is a lawyer and a Christian man;' 'he is a physician and a Christian man.'" "It strikes us," says the New York Sun, "that of late years it has been quite as easy to make either of these remarks with truth as to say, 'He is a clergyman and a Christian man.'"

WHEN the counsel for the prosecution in the Guiteau case asked Dr. Spitzka "if he believed in God," he replied: "To answer from my standpoint, that is an impertinent question, in a country which guarantees civil and religious liberty. I am here to discuss insanity, not theology." When asked if he would "consider a man insane who prayed to God as a cure for disease," he replied, "No, not insane, but weak in judgment."

THE Rev. A. W. Wild preached a particularly eloquent sermon on the death of President Garfield, in the Congregational church of Peacham, Vt., and admiring members had it published in pamphlet form. Brother Parker, who disliked the pastor, did not believe him capable of producing such a discourse, and set about finding its source. After a long and industrious search, he has found that about a fourth of it is identical with an article in the Christian Statesman. Mr. Wild admits the plagiarism, but says it amounts to nothing, as nearly all clergymen incorporate newspaper clippings into their sermons.

THE following shows the intelligence of some of the men who hav it in their power to say what shall go through the mails and what shall not: A country postmaster wrote to the post master-general lately, saying: "A man's wife dropped a letter in this office addressed to another man. The husband suspects something wrong. Shall I deliver the letter to him?' Strange to say, the postmaster was instructed that the husband could not get the letter in that way.

A LIVERPOOL Tory paper says: "A Philadelphia merchant sent a cargo of goods to Constantinople. After the supercargo had seen the bales and boxes safely landed, he inquired where they should be stored. 'Leave them here; it won't rain to-night,' was the reply 'But I dare not leave them so exposed; some of the goods may be stolen,' said the supercargo. The Mohammedan merchant laughed as he replied, 'Don't be alarmed, my friend; there is not a Christian within a hundred miles of us.'"

THE trustees of the Lutheran church at Dearborn, Mich., sit in a pew together. There was a dispute as to whether Thwark or Thiel had been elected to fill a vacancy, and on the following Sunday both took seats in the trustees' pew. Thiel ordered Thwark to get out, and then violently ejected him. The pastor ran down from the pulpit, crying, "Put out Thiel," and put out the momentary victor. The rest of the trustees joined in the scrimmage, the pew was torn to pieces, and Thiel was eventually thrown into the mud of the street.

THE daily newspapers are to be burned out of existence. Such seems to be the prophecy made by the clergyman who writes as follows to the Watchman: "We hear about the glories and the greatnesses of the daily press. Faugh! It is an abomination. It is as completely enslaved to the god of this world as is the theater and the sailor's dance house. I am, for my part, glad to know that 'a fire is kindled in God's just anger that shall consume the last sheet of it.' Just when this interesting performance is going to take place is not stated by the minister."

TWO worthy citizens of Nankin, Tenn., had a spat seventeen years ago, and since then they hav been bitter enemies. Recently the three clergymen of the town undertook to effect a reconciliation, but the peaceful arguments adding to the flames brought on a shooting affray. Last week a good-natured citizen invited the enemies to his house. He had studied carefully their tastes. One he entertained with applejack in the library and the other with beer in the sitting-room. Both got to be brimful of good nature. The adroit peacemaker got one to say finally that he really liked So-and-So. The remark was overheard, and the sliding doors between the rooms were pushed apart and the enemies shook hands.

COMMENTING on the recent Sunday-law agitation in San Francisco, the Jewish Times says: "There has been a great deal of comment as to the causes which led Judge Morrison to render his now famous decision in declaring the obsolete Sunday law constitutional. Judge Morrison, it is known, is a very zealous Catholic, and popular opinion is unanimous in declaring that "he owes his present position on the bench to the Catholic vote." Popular opinion is sometimes right and sometimes wrong, and as to the decision, it is on record. A little light was thrown on the subject last Monday evening at a meeting of Auxiliary League No. 190, a branch of the National Liberal League, when President J. L. Hatch announced that he had been informed by a prominent lawyer of this city that Judge Morrison was 'under the direct and powerful influence of Archbishop Alemany,' and that the latter favored the Sunday law because his Catholic flock was addicted, during the season, to largely attending picnics and spending money which, morally speaking, belonged to the church. The practice kept thousands away from their religious duties and tended to the desecration of the Chirstian Sabbath. This statement looks plausible, and the source from whence it emanates is worthy of credit. We think, however, that a jurist holding the high position of Judge Morrison would be very careful in allowing ecclesiastical influence to bias his legal decisions one way or another. Such things hav been, though, and history, it is said, repeats itself. It is curious to note that with regard to this Sunday law, which is, literally speaking, an effort to enforce the observance of the Christians' Sabbath on his community, the Catholic and the Puritan, mortal enemies, are for once united. Judge Morrison has rendered the decision, and the other element will enforce it, if possible. They will leave nothing undone to accomplish that end; this is certain. There can be no doubt that public sentiment is hostil to this obsolete law, which, if enforced, would make San Francisco's present joyful Sunday a gloomy, dreary, desolate day. Bigots are persistent, and it is well to remember that 'eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.'"

ONE of our friends, G. W. Lawson, writes to the Portland (W.T.) Oregonian: "Mr. Beecher is reported as having said in a late sermon that Judge Cox was an imbecil at one end of a court, trying a vagrant fool at the other. I doubt the report. It is discourteous to the bench and unfair to the patient judge, who tries to hold the scales with a steady hand, though the beloved Garfield is in one balance and the hated Guiteau in the other. Besides, Mr. Beecher knows from his own hard case that it takes a long time to try such cases, the bigger the fool at the other being the usual cause. Judge Cox cannot break through general rules to hang Guiteau instantly. There was a day when Mr. Beecher could hav been hung by a lynch court for riding 'on the ragged edge of despair' with the soft-eyed Elizabeth, and he ought not to savagely refuse a calm court hearing for the despairing, fat office-hunter Guiteau. Every man has his penchant, if not his failing, and even the poor devil Guiteau should hav his due. And besides, Mr. Beecher ought further to recollect, in behalf of charity, if for nothing else, that Guiteau is the natural victim of his own teachings. How often has Mr. Beecher commended Abraham for daring to lay murderous hands on his own son at the command of a Jewish demon or tribal god. Nor should he forget that his teachings caused poor Freeman, of Pocasset, to thrust his murderous knife through the heart of his helpless little daughter, because Abraham offered up Isaac in a blind faith. No man of Mr. Beecher's intelligence livs but in his heart of hearts knows that those murderous teachings are but the bloody myths of barbaric ages, and utterly unworthy of the Caucasian intellect and organization. And Mr. Beecher further knows that he had much better be engaged with Bob Ingersoll in making a grand bonfire of all such horrible personations and perversions of the great spirit of the universe than to be holding up that bloody old insane father and monster, Abraham, to make Guiteaus with. I will propose to Brother Beecher a subject for a future sermon: 'An Amendment to the Murder Laws.' Let it be enacted by all civilized peoples that hereafter all human life shall be sacred to its possessor; that there can be no lawful taking of the same except upon the verdict of a jury or in case of war; that all personal, voluntary, wilful, and knowing destruction of human life shall be murder in the first degree. Such a law, established and practiced for a few years, would dissolve these supposed partnerships between God and assassins, and both religious and political cranks would consider their services uncalled for, either for God or party, when they knew that the sure end thereof was the hangman's rope and the gallows. Brother Beecher, these are stirring times, and great lessons are before the people. Those who can should use them for instruction, and not for detraction or malediction."

A Truth Seeker Around the World.

Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, and Cypress, to Beyrout.

Nov. 4, 1881.

KIND PATRONS: We left Constantinople, as I advised you in my last letter, and with the setting sun we steamed down in front of the city, viewing for the last time its domes and minarets, its palaces and large public buildings, its towering, dark-green cypress-trees, its squalor and its filth. The rain had ceased, the wind from the north was blowing briskly, the weather was appreciably cooler, and the charm we experienced when six days before we came up the Bosphorus was very much lessened. We have a material addition to the number of our passengers, those of the first class filling the state-rooms, and fully two hundred Turks and other natives of this part of the world occupying the main deck even to the bow of the boat. These have supplied themselves with mattresses, blankets, etc., and for the six days' ride before us will make their homes under the awning stretched for their protection. They also furnish their own food, as I understand it; at all events there is no table set for them, and I saw them eating their food where they sleep, closely packed together. We have also a lot of four-footed cattle on board. This morning we stopped at the small town of Gallipoli. Arriving at noon at the Dardanelles, we waited two or three hours at the Turkish town by that name and had plenty of time to view the fortifications on either side, and to look at the place where Leander and Byron swam across the strait. On the hill back of the little village on the north side we saw ten wind-mills not far apart, all going at the same time, and as the wind was brisk they were revolving pretty lively. If a plenty of grain was in the hoppers a good deal of flour should have been turned out.

SMYRNA.

Before dark we had passed through the narrow channel and were again out in the Mediterranean, shaping our course southward, leaving the islands of Imbros and Tenedos on our right, and keeping on our left the mainland, Asia Minor, near the north-west corner of which stood the once-famous city of Troy. The north wind continued brisk through the day, and made the sea rough as soon as we reached the open Mediterranean. The weather continues cool and fall-like.

Saturday, Nov. 5th.—Through the night we made our way, passing inside the large island Mitylene, making one stop on its rocky shores. With returning day we found ourselves steaming into the capacious bay of Smyrna, and soon the city was beautifully spread out before us, snugly nestled in a valley, with lofty, rocky hills all around, and patches of tall cypresses in the background. The bay is large enough to hold all the shipping in the world, and on each side of it the hills, or almost mountains, rear their heads. Smyrna presents a beautiful appearance from the incoming steamer. Its population is estimated at nearly 200,000, and is composed of a mixture of Turks, Greeks, Armenians, Jews, Gipsies, and Arabs, in about the following proportions: Turks, 80,000; Greeks, 90,000; Jews. 12,000; Armenians, 10,000; Levantines, 15,000; Europeans, 1,000. The languages spoken are as varied as the people, and are much merged and modified.

Smyrna is a very old city; for centuries it has been the largest city in Asia Minor, and to-day possesses the largest commerce of any city in the Turkish empire save Constantinople. The imports and exports are said to amount to $15,000,000. It is the only city of its size and importance which has no chamber of commerce or board of exchange. The traders of the different nationalities who do business here have a system of their own, with but little co-operation with each other. The success with which trade is conducted here is ascribed to the labors of the Turks in the interior and not to the Greeks, the former furnishing all the produce. Smyrna produces very little herself, but is the shipping-port of all this portion of Asia Minor. It is the chief seat of trade in figs, raisins, drugs, including opium, madder, and licorice; valonia sponges, emery, chrome ore, and cotton. Figs are a specialty, and are grown largely in the adjoining Aidin districts. The curing of them is a secret which the Smyrna women keep closely to themselves. The yearly export of this fruit is over 5,000 tons. Black and Sultana raisins are also exported in large quantities. The value of sponges shipped from this port is said to amount to $2,500,000 annually. They are from the neighboring islands The valonia-tree is a species of oak. The acorns are gathered, the cups of which contain a large percentage of tannin, and are used for tanning purposes. Of the madder root large quantities are shipped. Considerable has been done in silk, but the trade varies; when the prices are good the people turn their attention to it and prosecute it with considerable vigor. Mulberry-trees abound in the locality. Angora goats' wool—the material of which mohair goods are made—is produced in considerable quantity in the interior. It is called tiftik. Galls are an article of large commerce. Olive oil is produced in some parts, but not of first quality. Turkey carpets and rags, and some lace, are considerably manufactured in several interior districts. Attar of roses is a valuable commodity of export.

The ancient history of Smyrna is very obscure, and is much involved in myth and the fancies of archæologists. It was a city long before the Greeks entered Asia Minor—one of the so-called Amazon cities, named from the Amazon, Smyrna. It has been subject to the various vicissitudes and incidents of successive conquests and warfare so common to all the countries in this portion of the world, which it is hardly worth while to enter into. Its fortunes have been varied in the numerous wars which devastated Asia Minor, once so filled with populous cities and a prolific population. In the days of Grecian greatness it became the school of rhetoricians and sophists, of whom many records are to be found in Grecian authors. It was called the Forest of Philosophers, the Museum of Ionia, the Asylum of the Muses and Graces. Smyrna is a great point for the collection of curious and rare antique coins, which in olden times were largely coined in the various cities of Asia Minor. These are still found in considerable numbers in the interior and brought into Smyrna, where they are bought up by dealers and by them sold again to those in different parts of the world who make collections of these relics of the past Christianity was early introduced in Smyrna, and the first of the seven churches of Asia, alluded to in the first two chapters of Revelation, was located here. Christians claim it as the fulfilment of a prophecy that Smyrna still holds an existence, while the other cities where the churches were established have passed away. The causes, however, which make Smyrna a city to-day are other than that blind allusion about a candlestick in Revelation. When, also, it is taken into consideration that Smyrna has been destroyed six different times, it would seem that the light in its candlestick would have flickered considerably. The great extent of productive country back of it and its very favorable position for shipping are sufficient reasons why it continues to exist. St. Polycarp is said to have been bishop of Smyrna, to have had a church here, and to also have suffered martyrdom here. But it must be confessed that there is much that is mythical in the story of Polycarp. Dr. Middleton, in his preface to his letter from Rome, pertinently says, "It is a thing to be confessed and lamented by the gravest divines of the Roman Catholic communion that the names and worship of many pretended saints, who never had any real existence, had been fraudulently imposed upon the church." The improbable story of this saint is that having lived in undisturbed tranquillity in his bishopric under a Nero and a Domitian, he was dragged in his eighty-sixth year to a cruel death by fire under the government of the moral, virtuous, and philosophical Antoninus. It is said when he was fastened to the stake there came a voice from heaven, saying, "Be of good cheer, Polycarp, and play the man." The proconsul demanded of him whether he was that Polycarp, beckoning that he should deny it, and adding, "Consider thine age—swear by the fortune of Cæsar—repent thee of what is past; say, remove the wicked." But Polycarp exclaimed, "O Lord, remove the wicked," and after concluding a mystical prayer with the usual doxology at the end of a sermon, was committed to the flames; but the flaming fire, framing itself in the form of a vault, or sail of a ship, refused to burn so good a man; upon which the tormentors were ordered to be fetched, to whom orders were given to lance the body of the suffering saint in the side with a spear, from which, when he had ended his prayer, such a stream of blood issued forth as to entirely extinguish the flames. Dr. Taylor says the story originally ran that when the saint was pierced in the breast a dove flew out of his body. The devil is also said to have interfered and prevented the body of the saint being found after he was dead, lest miraculous works be performed by his lifeless flesh and bones, and become an object of worship. But we were shown the grave of Polycarp, all the same. Taylor nevertheless says, "The name of Polycarp, his bishopric, his martyrdom, are entirely unknown to rational or credible history." It is not to be denied that some Christians were put to death in the first two centuries of the existence of the church, but they have abundantly paid the debt. For every Christian that was put to death by unbelievers, the Christians have put to death in the most cruel manner not less than five hundred poor victims for not entertaining the right sort of belief. In inflicting torture and taking life for opinion's sake Christians have far exceeded the believers in all other religions.

WHAT WE SAW OF SMYRNA.

It was not until after we had partaken of breakfast—which on the Saturno is at ten o'clock, coffee and tea being served from seven to eight—that we were put on shore by boat, when a guide took us about the city, leading us first to the post-office, where we mailed some letters, then through the principal streets and bazars, where we saw shops similar to those in Constantinople, where all sorts of merchandise are offered for sale. Embroidered goods are conspicuous among the variety of merchandise presented, and many are rich in gold and silk. The bazars are not as extensive as those of Constantinople. The streets, however, are better paved and smoother, and not so dirty, and the dwellings are of a better character, some streets having a decidedly pleasant appearance. A very striking feature was the number of camels we saw from the interior, some laden with the commodities there produced and others with merchandise to take back in return. We met many of these trains on the narrow streets and in the bazars, and must have seen nearly two hundred camels in all. A train usually consists of six camels in single file, with a rope extending from the first to the last, which has two cow-bells on his neck, one on each side. The train is led by a man, or oftener by a donkey, the man following in the rear. A large saddle is on each camel, and upon them are lashed with ropes the sack of merchandise which they transport for hundreds of miles. They walk patiently, sedately, and majestically along, as though but little in the world had the power to affect them, and look inoffensive and harmless, though I noticed the larger portion of them had muzzles over their mouths to prevent them from biting. The sight of so many camels made us think we had really reached the land of the East. These camels are finer and larger than the miserable affairs seen in the menageries.

The street porters here surprised me still more than those in Constantinople. I could hardly believe men able to carry about such loads. I saw two porters with each a hundred boxes upon his back, each twelve or fifteen inches in length, eight inches wide, and five or six in depth. I presume they were for figs. The stuff, of course, was not thick, but the boxes made a great bulk, and must have weighed nearly two hundred pounds. I saw several porters each carrying six or seven plank for joists or other building purposes, 2½ inches thick, eight feet long, and a foot in width, which seemed to be green, and probably weighed three or four hundred pounds. The saddles of the porters here are larger than in Constantinople, and look as though they were enough for a load themselves; but when their loads are piled up squarely upon these saddles, the porters march along in their stooping position without the load being bound on or falling off.

Smyrna has some twenty-five mosques, with one minaret each. They are not so extravagant here in the amount of minarets as in Constantinople, where they have two or four to each mosque, and to one six. There are few or no domes in Smyrna. The Christian churches, thanks to the liberality of the Turkish government, conceding to all freedom in religious opinion, are about as numerous as the mosques. A majority of the churches are Romish, as the Catholics outnumber the Greeks and the Protestants six to one; but to conform to the prejudices of the Turks and the Armenians against image worship, they indulge in few or no images. The church of Rome has ever shown herself very accommodating in conforming to popular prejudices, first in adopting pagan rites and festivals esteemed by the people, and then in modifying them where she could gain strength by it. We visited one Greek church in the Byzantine style—whether it was the one Polycarp is said to have preached in or not I will not pretend to say—but it was elaborately furnished and figured with bronze ornamental work different from anything I have before seen, and the pulpit, though small, is highly decorated. There is also about the usual number of paintings of Jesus, the Virgin, and the saints that I saw in the churches at Athens, and I wish to remark that the Greek church representations of Jesus and the Virgin make entirely different-looking characters from those in the Catholic churches; they do not look so dismal and unhappy, and I like them decidedly better. I see no use in being a son of God, or even a virgin, if it makes one wretched and unhappy. As widely, however, as the Greek church and the Romish church differ in their representations, I am charitable enough to think one is equally as correct as the other.

This is the Jew's Sabbath, and many of the more pious ones, and the women who wish to show their diamonds and fine apparel, turn out to the synagogues, of which there are a few here, but which are represented as being so dirty and uninviting I did not care to see them.

This also being the third day of the Mohammedan feast of Koorban-bairam, the Turks are rejoicing, indulging in their kind of unmusical music, and various species of hilarity. We met one company who seemed to have imbibed something which made them very noisy. Other companies were working in some order, visiting the house of a friend, whence we could hear the discordant notes of the pipe and drum. A larger proportion of the people here wear the Turkish or country costume than in Constantinople. Not over one-third of the inhabitants wear the regular European garment. The turban and the baggy petticoats sewed up at the bottom, which men wear, are seen in great numbers. The large white fezes of the whirling dervishes or mevlevy, as their proper name is, are seen here in considerable numbers. They have their Tekechs—the name of their monasteries—as in all other parts of Mohammedandom, women wearing their Yashmak, the name of the thin white muslin veil, which they wear over the face, are met here in great numbers. The women, as a rule, are much better looking than in Constantinople. Dark veils are worn over the face independent of the Yashmak, so as to preclude the possibility of discerning the features. But, for the life of me, I cannot see the propriety of hiding the face and uncovering the bosom.

We passed through the Turkish quarter on our way up to Mount Pagus, the Acropolis of Smyrna, which stands in the rear of the town. It is a hill five hundred feet above the sea, and though not as steep as Lycabettus at Athens, it is quite steep enough for comfortable climbing About two-thirds the way up we came to what purports to be the grave of Polycarp, though who discovered it and how the discoverer learned that Polycarp was buried there is not explained. The Mohammedans have built a crude monument or altar over the place and regard it with much veneration. Some of them take their sheep up there to sacrifice. We saw the fresh blood which has thus been shed there during the present festival. A pious Mussulman was also there going through the ceremony of prayer, repeatedly rising, bowing, and kneeling with his face toward Mecca. And on the stunted trees growing near are numerous bits of rags tied by credulous believers, who think by so doing they obtain a seat in heaven. It occurred to some of us that seats up there are getting very cheap. Who would not tie a bit of rag to the limb of a shrub to thereby gain an entrance into the world of bliss? O superstition! when will you depart from among men? It is a curious fact that since the Mohammedans have taken this place, called the Tomb of Polycarp, for their sacred spot, the Christians have pretty much abandoned it, and don't much think now that Polycarp was buried there at all.

Not far below this place is the old Stadium, or race-course of the ancients, capable of holding sixty thousand people. In another place is the ruins of an ampitheater said to have been capable of containing seventy thousand people. But little is to be seen now save the excavations made in the earth.

We proceeded on to the Acropolis, the highest point of Mount Pagus, which is believed to have been the center of the ancient city, and a citadel of great strength. It is not so abrupt, nor so rocky as the Acropolis at Athens, and is four times as roomy on the summit. The heavy ruins are still standing, though hundreds of tons of the towers and walls have been thrown down the hillside by time and earthquakes, which have many times visited this locality. The first structures here were erected so long ago that it is unknown who built them. It is believed, however, to have been a Cyclopean work, executed not less than a thousand years before the Christian era, as were temples of Jupiter, Bacchus, Hercules, Nemesis, Cybele, and other gods and goddesses; that these fortifications were taken and dismantled by Alyattes and the temples destroyed, and thus laid in ruins until restored by Alexander and Lysimachus. Fragments of marble are seen lying around, and these are all that are to be seen of the old temples, though some of the walls of the ancient fortifications are thirty feet in hight. We climed the ruined staircase to the top of the highest part of the wall, and from that point we had a magnificent view of the city far below us, with its dull, red little roofs, its towering cypress-trees, and its solitary minarets, as well as the magnificent bay, the extensive valley, and the grand old mountains all around save at the opening of the bay. A more beautiful view is seldom seen. The day was pleasant, though the wind was very fresh.

A feature of special interest in ascending and descending Mount Pagus—for we ascend by one road and descend by another—is the wonderful accumulation of oyster-shells to be seen. I saw them on the way up and picked up some of them, but in coming down I saw many more. They lie in three separate strata, at least three hundred feet above the level of the plain, of two and three feet in thickness, with some three feet of earth between the strata, and above all nearly a hundred feet of earth and a quarry of rock as well. It is an interesting question how these shells came there. It is possible the vein runs through the hill. I ask again, How did they come there, and how did all that earth and stone come to be on the top of them?

Mark Twain thinks they are suggestive of a very extensive oyster saloon, once conducted there, where the ancient Smyrnians opened millions of oysters, and threw the shells in piles, but that hardly accounts for the earth and stone over them. He thinks, besides, that a restaurant could hardly have paid up there on the side of that steep hill, and that the oyster business could not have been so extensive as to account for all those shells. He suggests, however, that in Smyrna's palmy days they might have had palaces up the hillside, and that the inhabitants might have been fond of oysters; he is willing to accede that there might have been one oyster saloon up there, but he is staggered about the three strata and the bed of earth three feet thick between. He asks if they could have had restaurants up there at three different eras of the world. He concludes that the restaurant theory will not answer, and thinks it barely possible that Mount Pagus was really Mount Ararat, that Noah's ark rested there, and that Noah and his family ate the oysters and threw the shells overboard. But discovering that that hypothesis does not account for the strata of earth between the strata of shells, he is compelled to abandon it; besides, he is of the opinion that Noah and his family, though ever so fond of oysters, could not have eaten all that those shells contained in the two or three months he was compelled to stay there, waiting for the waters to subside. He next starts the suggestion that the beasts with Noah might also have fed upon oysters, but he abandons it as too absurd to be entertained. He decides that Noah must have known more than to feed wild beasts on oyster suppers. In his dismay he resorts to one more possible theory. He says: "It is painful—it is even humiliating—but I am reduced at last to one slender theory: that the oysters climbed there of their own accord. But what object could they have had in view? What did they want up there? What could an oyster want to climb a hill for? To climb a hill must necessarily be fatiguing and annoying exercise for an oyster. The most natural conclusion would be that the oyster climbed up there to look at the scenery. Yet when one comes to reflect upon the nature of an oyster it seems plain that he does not care for scenery. An oyster has no taste for such things; he cares nothing for the beautiful. An oyster is of a retiring disposition, and not lively—not even cheerful above the average, and never enterprising. But above all, an oyster does not take any interest in scenery—he scorns it. What have I arrived at now? Simply at the point I started from, namely, those oyster-shells are there in regular layers, five hundred feet above the sea, and no man knows how they got there. I have hunted up the guide-books, and the gist of what they say is this: 'They are there, but how they got there is a mystery.'" One might go a step farther, and think they might have been made out of nothing at the time the rest of the world was constructed out of the same rather thin material. But then it is likely that when the maker was in a hurry to get his job done by Saturday night so as to have a rest, he would stop to make three strata of oyster-shells on Mount Pagus, and strew strata of earth three feet thick between? It is hardly probable. The terrible commotions that in the ages past have taken place in this part of the world, the strong proofs of volcanic formations that exist all around here, and especially at the deep cut on the Aidin railway but a short distance from the town, with the numerous earthquakes that have taken place hereabout, may suggest the thought that in the long ago, this hill, like the hill at Athens, on the top of which sea-shells are found, was thrown up from the level of the sea, oyster-shells and all, after the earth had been deposited thereon. I cannot say this was the case, but it remains true that great disturbances have taken place here that the writer of Genesis knew nothing about, and which he makes no explanation of. However it may be, like Mark Twain, I know the shells are there, and I have brought some of them away with me.

There are some things said about the people living in and about Smyrna not altogether to their credit. It is said that brigandage and robbery abound here to an alarming extent. It is even said to be unsafe for a stranger to walk about the city alone in the daytime, and that if he ventures away from the town he is almost sure to be attacked and robbed, even if his life is spared. There are said to be two classes of brigands here; class No. 1, who are semi-honorable fellows, seize a stranger and secrete him in the mountains till his friends offer a liberal reward; and class No. 2, who shoot down a stranger without the slightest compunction, and take what he has, whether it is a hundred dollars or a hundred cents. They follow this business in the summer and fall, living out of doors while it is warm enough, but in the winter they flock into the city to become policemen. The adage that it takes a rogue to catch a rogue may hold good here. None of our company were anxious to venture alone far from their companions. This brigandage is not attributed any more to the Turks than to the Greeks, the villianous ones among whom are said to gather here from the islands as being a good field for booty.

Upon our return we stopped at two or three fig stores, and saw them packing new figs in small boxes. Many of the company bought a box each, containing nearly two pounds, at one franc, or twenty cents, per box. I preferred some raisins. We also saw lots of melons, both water and musk, which looked very tempting, but we were rather too far from the boat to carry them. It seems late in the year to see melons around so plentiful.

Relics of antiquity, such as pieces of statuary, fragments of old pottery, etc., are to be seen in various parts of the city, being in many instances worked into the walls of modern buildings. At the northwestern extremity of the city, near the water's edge, are the remains of the temple of Jupiter, but little remains now except fragments of pillars and other parts of the structure. We were told also about Jacob's well being not far out from the city, but we knew that if Jacob ever existed he was not within five hundred miles of this place, and so thoroughly realized the fraud of the pretense that he ever had a well here that we did not care to be led to the insignificant pool. When one is humbugged he wants at least that a slight semblance of possibility should exist.

EPHESUS

Is but forty-eight miles from Smyrna, and our company was very anxious to visit it, thinking it quite feasible to charter an extra train to take us out and back. Fourteen of us were willing to give a pound ($5.00) each extra to see the old ruins there, while so near, but our conductor was either a little dilatory about the matter, or did not want the bother of going out. He concluded that it would not be safe to go out, as the steamer might go and leave us before our return. This, however, was a groundless fear, as the steamer did not leave till seven in the evening, affording us ample time to go out and back. The old city is too important a place in ancient history to be passed over in silence, now that I am so near it, so perhaps if I draw somewhat from memory I may be able to give you a more acceptable description of it than though I had seen it myself. Let us see.

Ephesus, the modern name of which is Ayasolook, is situated close to the river Cayster, the Bay of Ephesus, and the Smyrna and Aidin railway, and on a stream called the Selinus. The population is about four hundred, made up principally of Greeks engaged in the culture of figs, the orchards of which are a mile and a half away. The old city occupied two hills—Mount Pion, or Prion, and the slopes of Mount Coressus. Ephesus stands out conspicuously as one of the cradles of Hellenic mythology, as the metropolis of the Ionian confederacy, next to Athens, as remarkable for having been the scene of memorable events, for having the great school of art, and as being, next to Jerusalem, the holiest of Christian cities, and the most noted in apostolic labors. In earlier mythic epochs Ephesus was the reputed refuge of Latona; the place of the metamorphosis of Syrinx into a reed; the lurking-place of Pan; a chief seat of the Amazons, so ancient that Bacchus contended with them, and Hercules defeated them, when they took refuge in the temple of Diana; the great seat of the worship of Diana, whose birthplace was marked by the original olive-tree, even after the Christian era, and consecrated by a heaven-born image. On Mount Solmissus the angry Juno had vainly watched, and had been deafened by the sounding arms of the Cretes. Apollo, on having slain the Cyclops, found there a retreat from the vengeance of Jupiter. Many of these reputed sites are still to be seen by the visitors to Ephesus.

On the migration of the Greeks to Asia Minor, Ephesus was occupied by an Ionian colony, the events connected with which are obscured by fable. According to one account, the founders consulted the oracle, supposed to be that of the Ephesus, which told them that a fish would show them, and a wild boar conduct them. Some fishermen being busy dressing their dinner of fish near the fountain Hypetæus and the sacred port, one of the fish leaped out of the fire with a hot coal in his mouth, which, setting fire to the dry bushes, spread flames to a thicket in which a wild boar was ensconced, and the boar darting out ran along the mountain Trachsia and was at length killed where the temple of Minerva stood. The colonists accordingly settled there, driving out the Lelegs and Lydians from the upper city, but allowing the Amazon women settled near the temple of Diana to remain. It is curious how much fish have to do with these remarkable miracles performed in olden time, and that is doubtless a very good reason why they are all of such a fishy character. This legend, however, seems to be about as wonderful as any of them, and probably possesses about the same amount of truth. According to another legend the Ionians brought no women with them, but slew the men of the country and married the women, which of course was pretty hard on the slain men.

The Ionians were headed by Androcles, one of the younger sons of Codras, king of Athens; but though his descendants were honored in Ephesus and multiplied there, bearing the title of kings and being clad in purple, Ephesus was mostly a republic, either oligarchic or democratic, generally from natural sympathy in alliance with the Athenians, but occasionally from political motives joining the Lacedæmonians. Although occasionally the city enjoyed great power, ruling over Magnesia, Samos, and the neighboring islands, and having trading facilities from the Black Sea to Egypt, it was more frequently in subjection to the kings of Lydia, or the satraps of Persia, and its political vicissitudes subjected it to many sieges, and brought into communication with it many eminent men.

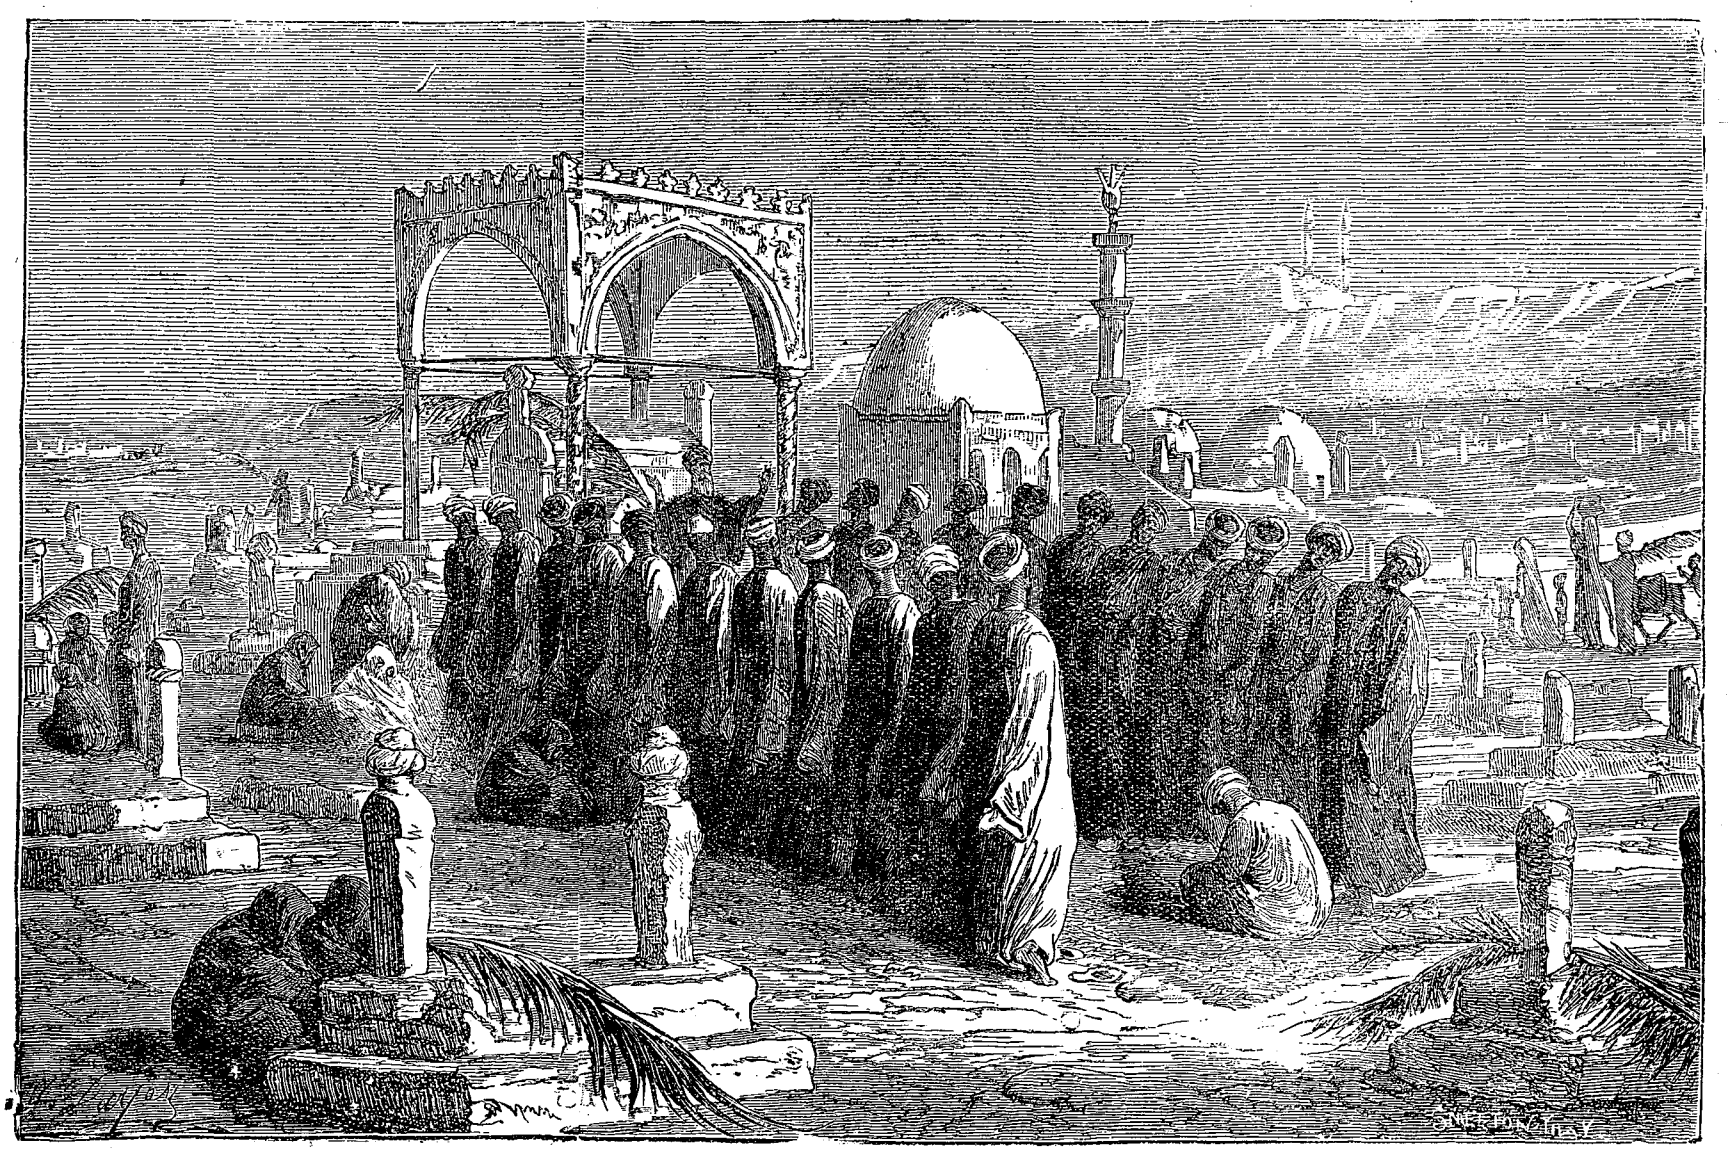
Ephesus was one of the places claimed as the birthplace of Homer. The poets Callinus and Musæus were born there, and a long list of eminent philosophers. It had famous schools of painting, sculpture, architecture, metal work, philosophy, rhetoric, and magic. The great painters, Evenor, Parrhasius, and Appelles were born there. Among eminent men connected with Ephesus may be named Lygdamus, king of the Cimmerians or Tartars, who attacked the city twenty-five hundred years ago; Crœsus, king of Lydia, whose nephew was its tyrant; Artemisia, the famous queen of Caria, who was then guardian to the children of Xerxes, after his defeat at Salamis; Cimon, the Athenian; Alcibiades; Lysander, the Spartan; and Agesilaus, king of Sparta. Xenophon was here before he joined Agesilaus. Alexander the Great arrived at Ephesus four days after taking Sardis, by way of Smyrna. He assigned large revenues to the temple of Diana. He had his portrait taken by Apelles for the temple of Diana.

Ephesus was contended for by the successors of Alexander, Antigonus, Lysimachus, Demetrius, Ptolemy, Philadelphus, Antiochus, Theos, and Antiochus the Great. Hannibal met Antiochus here. It fell into the hands of the king of Pergamus. Ptolemy Evergetæ and his wife Irene were killed in the temples of Diana. Here Laodicea poisoned Antiochus, Theos, and Berenice, and threw Danae, wife of Saphron, from a precipice. The wars of Mithridates brought the Romans into the province, and the names of Manlius, L. C. Scipio, P. M. Scipio, Lucullus, and Sylla are found. Antony, entering the city in the character of Bacchus, here passed one of the scenes of his mad triumph with Cleopatra. In Ephesus tribes of players and musicians were collected, and sailed for Samos with a splendid fleet. Although Antony allowed the followers of Brutus and Cassius a sanctuary in the temple, he took them and slew the brothers of Cleopatra.



Cicero mentions that on his way to the province of Cilicia tho Ephesians received him with games. Pompey and Augustus visited the city. Being finally subdued by the Romans, the political history of Ephesus came to an end. After this came its religious and Mussulman history. If the glory of the Ephesus was great, its ruin is no less remarkable. What remains attests its vastness, but of that magnificence naught but fragments exist. It has a character of desolation of its own. The population has passed away from the site, and of the monuments of marble scarcely enough remains above ground to mark their sites. In one place there are ranges of subterranean vaults, and all else of the colossal superstructure is gone; in another place there is a Corinthian column in one block, in the flute of which one can walk, and yet this is all that remains of many such. For the absence of smaller columns we can account —they were carried off to embellish Constantinople, Pisa, or the Saracenic cities; but what was difficult to be removed has almost entirely disappeared, leaving but a wreck behind. What has become of the numerous statues which adorned the temples we can not tell, unless they have been burnt to lime, pounded into the rubbish which covers the plain, or buried beneath the soil.

Still Ephesus is one of the most remarkable archæological sites. At Athens all is concentrated; here the monuments are widely dispersed. There are remains of all ages, from Cyclopean walls down to those of the Saracenic sultans. The name of the mountain on which the earliest settlement was formed, is, as observed, called Prion or Pion, and it consists of two rounded hills. It has been attempted to connect with this mountain the legend of Hercules being sent to Omphali, queen of Lydia, against the Cecrops. He caught two of them, Passalus and Acherman, and strung them like hares to the end of his club, whence he obtained the name of Melampygus. In the territory of Ortygia, the birth-place of Apollo and Diana, there was a magnificent woods of cypress and other trees; there were also temples and statues, and the college of Curetes was kept up. It is here Orion was supposed to have been slain by Diana. The Panionium, or general place of meeting and sacrifice of the Ionian cities, originally at Mycah, was removed to the vicinity of Ephesus.

Among the noted places in the city were the Great Agora, or Agora Civilis, for holding public assemblies. In its center was a lake, and in later times a double Christian church was erected here. Here, also, was the tomb of Heropylus, the restorer of liberty to the Ephesians; and Dionysius of Miletus, a rhetorician, was buried here. The statues of Lysander, Etsonikus, Pharax, and other benefactors, were placed in the Agora. Here the laws of the Ionians were publicly exhibited. Here Antony one day, presiding in his court, abandoned the pleading of a celebrated orator, and leaped forth to attend upon Cleopatra, who was being carried past in her litter. Here were extensiv colonnades, and here it is held that the colloquy took place between Justin Martyr and Tryphon the Jew. There are supposed to have been two other Agoras used as markets.

The Opistholeprian Gymnasium was one of the most celebrated in the world. It was here that Agesilaus assembled his Spartan forces and exercised them.

The Great Gymnasium, however, was the largest, being 925 by 685 feet. The gymnasium of the Stadium is located on the northern slope of Mount Pion. The gymnasium of the theater is recognized between it and the Agora. The theater is where St. Paul, in Acts xix, is said to have wished to enter when some of his friends advised him not to attempt to enter, when the town clerk made a very sensible speech and dismissed the crowd. Paul is said to have remained in Ephesus over two years, doing a lively business at preaching and spreading the Christian faith. It was there that he addressed himself to the young believers, asking if they had received the Holy Ghost, when they replied that they had not so much as heard that there was a Holy Ghost. When Paul heard this he baptized about a dozen of them and introduced them to the Holy Ghost, who for some thousands of years had been closely in the background, so that not only those men of Ephesus had never so much as heard that there was any Holy Ghost, but Abraham, Jacob, Moses, Samuel, David, and Solomon were all in the same unfortunate dilemma; they also had never heard that there was a Holy Ghost. But to return to the theater, it was a capacious one, holding 60,000 persons. Though now a mass of ruins, its outline can still be traced. The Stadium was a capacious one, seating 76,000 persons. The Odeon was excavated by Mr. J. T. Wood, and was found tolerably perfect. The Serapion, another building for amusement, was in front of the Stadium. Of the temples of Ephesus there were, besides those of HOWLING DERVISHES.

Diana and Hecate, those of Jupiter Olympus, Jupiter Pluvius, Minerva, Apollo, Venus, Bacchus, Neptune, Ceres, Serapis and Isis, Mercury, Hercules, Fortuni, Harpacrates, Romulus and Remus, Julius Cæsar and of Rome, and of Claudius, to which have been added Juno Pronuba, Mileager, Carcarilla and Geta, Septimus Severus, and Elegabalus. It is thought there were other temples of Diana, Jupiter, Juno, Latona, and Apollo. Diana, Bacchus, Pan, and Hercules were believed to have bodily manifested themselves, and that they did so the proofs are about as strong as that the Holy Ghost did so. At all events the superstition in the belief that they had done so was strong enough to produce a great attachment towards those buildings.

THE TEMPLE OF DIANA

was one of the largest, most celebrated, and most magnificent in the world, but it has for centuries been completely overthrown, and its few remains were so deeply buried beneath the gradually accumulated soil of the low plain that its very site was long lost; but by the energy and enterprise of Mr. Wood it was unearthed and brought again to the light of day. He began his explorations without any funds save his own private means, and with no assistance from others save a firman obtained for him by the trustees of the British Museum. Beginning with the Odean, he proceeded to clear out the area of the great theater where Paul got into an uproar with the people; where he found a number of inscriptions, one of which furnished a clew to finding the temple of Diana. He next discovered the Magnesian Gate of the city. From that gate, according to Philostratus, a covered way led to the temple. Just outside the gate Mr. Wood found about eleven feet underground an ancient road, with tombs on each side, pointing in a northeast direction, and at the side of the road a row of square piers, such as would have served to support a stoa. This road Mr. Wood continued to explore during the years 1867, '68, and '69. On one of the inscriptions he had discovered it was stated that the procession from the temple of Diana entered the city by the Magnesian Gate, and returned through the Corresian Gate. He consequently concluded that the temple stood at the junction of the two roads. Having found the Corresian Gate, and noted the line of the road from it, he easily fixed the spot where the two roads would meet; and there in April, 1869, he struck upon the angle of the peribolos just where it might have been expected to be. In the wall was an inscription stating that the Emperor Augustus had rebuilt the peribolos wall round the temple of the goddess Diana; this was in the year 6 B.C.

Having so far been successful in discovering the long-lost site, he proceeded to follow the two lines of wall, and also sunk a number of pits in the interior. In one of these he came upon a pavement of square blocks of white marble nine inches thick, laid on a level bed of black marble, together with two marble sculptures. These lay buried under eighteen feet of alluvial deposit, the lower stratum of which was composed of splinters of fine white marble, which appeared to have been calcined by fire. He soon afterward found several drums of marble columns six feet and one inch in diameter, one of which was in situ; and he also laid bare a small portion of the south cella wall of the temple itself. As the work proceeded other fragments were discovered. Among these were the lower drum of a column, nearly entire, with figures sculptured on it in relief, and large fragments of two or more drums similarly sculptured; also the base of a pilaster, sculptured in relief, on the same scale as the drums. The largest of them bears on its least injured side a composition of six figures, three of which are supposed to represent Mercury, Victory, and either Juno or Ceres. On the pilaster is a female figure which appears to be struggling with Hercules. It seems probable that the sculptor had taken his subjects from the myths connected with the early history of Ephesus. Those sculptured drums are manifestly portions of thirty-six columns of the temple which Pliny describes as sculptured in relief.

When the site had been completely cleared and the measurements taken, the temple was found to have been of the Ionic order, octostyle and dipteral, having eight columns in front and two ranks of columns on the flanks; one hundred of these columns, which were six feet in diameter, and nearly sixty feet high, surrounded by naos, or cella; thirty-six were sculptured, and five examples of these sculptured columns were found on the site. The size of the temple was 343 feet in length by 164 in width. Its foundation was nine and a half feet above the pavement surrounding it on a platform which measured on the lowest of fourteen steps 418 feet by 239 feet. The cella was nearly seventy feet wide, and was probably adorned with two tiers of columns and contablatures. These measurements show, when compared with those of the Parthenon, the enormous size of the temple of Diana. The Parthenon, it will be remembered, is but 228 feet long by 101 broad. The great temple of Baalbec approaches it in size, as it measured 290 feet by 160, and its columns were even larger, being seven and a quarter feet in diameter at the base, and seventy-five feet high, including base and capital. Other interesting points were brought to light by Mr. Wood, which it is hardly necessary to giv in detail. At the extreme end of the Elgin Gallery in the British Museum may be seen three of the sculptured drums, the base of one of the columns of the peristyle, a portion of the frieze, the capitals, a lion's head from the cornice, and several other fragments.

The origin of this famous temple is clouded in myth and fable. A temple of the Ephesian Diana appears to have been as old as the city itself; Pausanius says it is older than the colonization of the Ionians. He adds that Crœsus, a native of the place, and Epesus, who is thought to have been a son of the river Cayster, raised this temple, and the city received its name from the latter. According to Pliny, the temple was burnt seven times, and that of which the ruins now exist was the eighth. But the accounts which have come down to us of the first five are very uncertain, and they do not appear to have stood upon the same site as those which followed them. The foundation of the sixth is said to have been laid about 600 B.C.; and to guard against earthquakes, a marsh was chosen for the site, and the ground was made firm by layers of charcoal rammed down, over which were laid fleeces of wool. The work proceeded very slowly, as it was forty years later when the columns were set up. It was nearly a hundred years before it was completed. Eusebius gives the information that it was destroyed on the same day Socrates drank the poison which the court of Athens imposed upon him, 400 B.C. Immediately after this the seventh temple was built in a style of such grandeur that Herostratus burnt it in order to perpetuate his name. This occurred on the same night on which Alexander the Great was born, 356 B.C. The erection of the eighth and last temple was commenced at once, and it was the most magnificent of them all. It is said that Alexander offered to pay the whole cost of the restoration on the condition that his name should be inscribed upon it; but the Ephesians evaded the offer by the flattering reply, that it was not right for a god to make offerings to gods. The quarries from which the marble was taken were on the north side of Mount Pion. Strabo says that in order to defray the enormous expenses the women consecrated their ornaments and the men their goods, and all Asia contributed offerings.

It would seem that there was an original statue of the goddess, which according to the tradition had come down from Jupiter, as alluded to in Acts xix, 35. It was probably of wood, and preserved with scrupulous care in the sanctum of the building. But the form of the great statue of the goddess, the figure of which has come down to us, was entirely different. The face and head were bare and surmounted with a mural crown. On the breast are the signs of the zodiac; the necklace is of acorns, the primeval food of man; lions are on the arms and denote power; the hands are stretched out to show that she is ready to receive all who come. Her body is covered with breasts and monsters to show that she is the supporter of life and mother of all things; the legs are inclosed like those of a mummy, and the covering is ornamented with various animals. The statue was concealed from the multitude by a veil, which, according to Pausanius, was raised toward the ceiling.

As a treasury of works of art the temple contained the finest specimens of sculpture and painting in the ancient world, the productions of the great school of Ephesus, and of the distinguished artists who resorted thither. In the sacred grove was the cave of Pan, and also the statue of Hecate, which was of such splendor that the priests were under the necessity of warning those who entered the temple to shield their eyes lest they should be injured by it.

The temple had the right of possessing property, and acquired a large revenue; its treasury, besides containing its own wealth, was a place of deposit and custody for all Ionia. It and its precincts had the privilege of an asylum or sanctuary for criminals and debtors. Free women, however, were not allowed to enter the temple, though maidens and slave women could. The priests are said to have been eunuchs, and were styled megabzyns. The names of the chief priests are sometimes found recorded on coins. The priestesses are virgins, and divided into three classes: candidates, priestesses, and part priestesses. King Antiochus the Great, perceiving the priestess of Diana to be very beautiful, left the city that he might not be led into temptation.

The history of the fall of the temple is very obscure. About 253 to 260, under the Gallieni, the city was sacked by the Goths, by Respha, Weducko, Thur, and Waro, who set fire to the temple of Diana. It is curious to find the name of Thur here recorded as common in that time. The final destruction of the temple is supposed to have been in consequence of the decree of Constantine in 342, 346, or 352. From that time there is no account of it.

The Eleusinian mysteries were celebrated at Ephesus in honor of the goddess Ceres. It was moreover a school of magic, and there in the temple of Hecate the Emperor Julian was instructed in the magic art, and there he is said to have renounced Christianity. There is a claim that St. John had charge of a church in Ephesus, and that he died there and was buried under one of the churches, but this is not authenticated, and is probably one of the idle myths, of which there are so many with regard to the ancient city. Mary Magdalen is claimed to have also been buried there on a hill adjoining the church of St. John, near the cave of the Seven Sleepers, the legend of which latter you must know, and which appears to be as well founded as some of the other legends. The tomb of Timothy is also said to have been at Ephesus. That may have been so. He would be as likely to die at Ephesus as at any other point, though, like the grave of Moses, his is not known at this day.

Ephesus was noted for its massive walls, its aqueducts, its games and ceremonies; but they have all passed away. Desolation now reigns where once all was life and activity. It is perhaps quite fitting that the murderer Constantine, who pretended that a cross had appeared to him in the heavens, and who established Christianity in blood, should be one to destroy the works of art, learning, and beauty which a people had expended its wealth in erecting. It was such deeds that inaugurated the dark ages, which expelled learning from the earth and produced the blackest darkness the world has known.

THE SEVEN SLEEPERS.

Ephesus abounds in legends, and perhaps few of them are more extraordinary than that of the Seven Sleepers, who took a sounder nap than any other seven young men ever heard of. Washington Irving has told us remarkably well the American legend of how Rip Van Winkle slept a hundred years, and how the place where he thus passed a century in a snooze was called Sleepy Hollow ever after. But here in Ephesus were seven Rip Van Winkles, who slept two hundred years without opening their eyes or turning over. The story runs in this wise: Two centuries after the dawn of Christianity in the city of Ephesus seven young men who resided there, to escape persecution, fled to a cave, taking with them a dog. As one account has it, they pilfered from a neighboring store some several bottles of very tempting-looking liquor, which, when they got to the cave, they partook of, and the liquor put them to sleep so effectually that they did not wake up for the term named—two hundred years. A singular thing about that nap was that they all went to sleep at the same time, and I think the little dog slept with them. But when they waked their surprise was very great, as they went forth into the city and saw nobody they knew or who knew them; and they found everything so changed that they could scarcely believe they were in their own city, still supposing, of course, they had slept but a single night. Even the language of the people was so changed that they could not understand what the people said. They went to the street where they formerly lived and called at the houses which were once their homes, but they could find none they could recognize, and none who ever knew their former relatives and friends. Whereupon they became so disconsolate and unhappy that they went back to the same sleepy cave and lay down and died, and never waked up any more. Whether the dog lay down and died too is not positively stated, but it is not unreasonable to suppose that he was sensible enough to do so. What had he to live for, when all his folks were dead, and the whole city had become Christian?

Mohammed heard of this sleepy story, and was so impressed, not only with its probability, but its truth, that he incorporated it into his Koran. He devotes a chapter to the subject, entitled, "The Chapter of Caves." Of course that chapter is just as much inspired as the rest of the chapters making up the Mohammedan bible, and, for aught I know, as much inspired as the chapters of any other bible; and it affords, in an easy lesson, an insight into how inspiration is gotten up. The faithful Mussulman has a great reverence for the story, and the cave is solemnly pointed out where the sleeping took place. They even revere the memory of the dog Ketmehr which is so connected with the legend. The story seems to have been an adopted one from the heathens, like many others gotten up about that period. The original story is in Diogenes's Laertius, and of Epimenides of Crete, who, when a young man, being sent in charge of some cattle, wandered into a cavern and went to sleep. On awaking at the end of forty years he returned home and found his younger brother grown to be a gray-haired old man. The stories do not end alike, as it would take but slight ingenuity to change them to that extent The Cretan, finding himself looked up to with respect and wonder, set himself up for a prophet, and lived to the age of 189 years. Now you have heard both versions of this pious story, and I leave it with you to take your choice between them. They are just of a price, and as you pay your money you can choose for yourself. If I thought you could believe the story about the Seven Sleepers any easier, I could give you their names, for they have been faithfully preserved, together with that of the dog; and the Mohammedans place these names upon their houses, together with that of the dog, for good luck, to keep evil spirits away, and to prevent their being burnt. But knowing how unbelieving many of you are, and as the names are rather hard ones to remember, I will omit them. The Mohammedans, however, all over the East, retain a great respect for the dog Ketmehr, and allow him a place in paradise with a few other favorite beasts upon whom they bestow special favor, and they have a sort of proverb, when speaking of a covetous man, that "he would not throw a bone to the dog of the Seven Sleepers." It is moreover said that they have the superstition to write the name of the dog Ketmehr on letters which have to go far, or which pass the sea, as a protection or talisman to preserve them from miscarriage.

CHAPTER XX.

THE PRINCIPAL IMPOSTURES OF THE PRIMITIV CHRISTIANS.

The testament of the twelve patriarchs which we still hav in Greek, a translation of John surnamed St. Chrysostom, is one of the most ancient impostures of those energetic innovators. This old book, belonging to the first century of our era, was evidently written by a Christian. This is proved by a passage in which some one is made to say to Levi, in Article viii of his Testament: "The third will be a new name because he will be a king of Judea and perhaps a priest for all nations," etc. He who planned the character of Jesus Christ could never hav made it public by other than such deceptions. Some one evidently predicts the coming of Jesus in Article xviii, after being made to say in Article xvii that the priests of the Jews commit sins of the flesh with beasts.*

Some one evolved from his imagination the testament of Moses, Enoch, and Joseph and the ascension or translation to heaven of Abraham, Elda, Moda, Elijah, Sophonias, Zachariah, and Habakkuk.

They forged about the same time the famous books of Enoch, who alone is the founder of all the mysteries of Christianity, since in this book is to be found the history of the rebelling angels† who sinned in paradise and became devils in hell. It can be demonstrated that the writings attributed to the apostles were only composed after the fable of Enoch, and were written in Greek by some Christian of Alexandria. Jude, in his epistle, cited Enoch more than one time; he reports his own words; he is lacking in sense when he tries to assure us that Enoch, the seventh man after Adam, wrote the prophecies.

Here, then, are two of the grossest impostures proved—the first is the imposture of the Christian who manufactured the books of Enoch; the second one is that of the Christian who dreamed of the epistles of Jude in which the words of Enoch are quoted. Never was a tale more false.

It would be exceedingly useless to hunt up the principal author of these dreams which are so insensibly attributed to the wrong people; there is some reason for believing that a man named Hegesippus, whose fables were quite popular, and were cited by Tertullian and copied by Eusebius, was the author of the dreams. It was Hegesippus who said that Jude belonged to the race of David, and that his grandson lived in the time of the Emperor Domitian. That emperor, if we can believe him, feared very much to be thought one of the descendants of that great King David, who had an incontestable right to the throne of Jerusalem, and consequently to the throne of the entire universe. He caused those illustrious princes to be summoned before him, but after having seen whom they were he let them loose without doing any harm.

But Jude, their grandfather, who has been ranked with the apostles, is sometimes called Thaddeus, and sometimes Lebbius, like the pickpockets who always hav two or three fictitious names.

There was a fictitious letter of Jesus Christ, addressed to a supposed governor of Edessa, which was circulated among the primitiv Christians for four hundred years. Edessa at that time never had a governor.

All those who had written a gospel, or all those who had attempted to teach a growing flock of Christians, imputed to Jesus discourses and actions of which the four evangelists hav not spoken. Thus in the Acts of the Apostles (xx, 35) Paul cites the words of Jesus, "It is more blessed to giv than to receive." These words are not to be found in Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John.

The travels of Peter, the Apocalypse of Peter, the Acts of Peter, the Acts of Paul, of Thecla, the letters of Paul to Seneca and of Seneca to Paul, the Acts of Pilate, the letters of Pilate, are all very well known to learned men. We can find all about them without searching the archives for dreams and foolish writings.

We could indulge in the ridiculous to the extent of writing the history of Claudia, Procula, or the wife of Pilate.

An unfortunate man named Abdias, who undoubtedly is reputed to hav lived with Jesus Christ, and for having been one of the most famous disciples of the apostles, is the one who has furnished us with the history of the combat between Peter and Simon, the pretended magician so celebrated among the primitiv Christians. Upon this imposture alone is founded the belief that Peter came to Rome. That is the fable which established the popes in all their grandeur, so shameful to the human race, and alone would make their grandeur a mark for ridicule were it not that their numberless crimes hav rendered them odious.

The following is what Abdias relates. He pretends to speak from personal observation. Simon Peter Barjonah came to Rome in the time of Nero. Simon the magician arrived about the same time. A young man who was some relation of Nero died. It was thought necessary to resuscitate him. The two Simons undertook the affair. Simon the magician made it conditional that the one who failed should be put to death. Simon Peter accepted this, and the other one then commenced his operations. The corpse shook its head, and all the people cried for joy. Simon Peter requested them to be silent, and said, "Gentlemen, if the defunct has life why does he not hav the goodness to lift himself up and walk and talk with us?" The body did not move. Then Peter said to it, "My son, lift thyself up; our master Jesus Christ will heal you." The young man raised up, spoke, walked, and Simon Barjonah sent him to his mother. Simon his adversary complained to Nero that Peter was only a miserable charlatan and ignorant fellow. Peter then appeared before the emperor and whispered in his ears: "Believe me, I know more than he does; and to prove it giv me secretly two loaves of bread. You will then see that I shall fortell his thoughts and he cannot foretell mine." Peter was handed the two loaves, and he concealed them in his mantle. Very soon Simon let loose two fierce dogs who were his guardian angels. They were about to devour Peter when he cunningly cast before them the two loaves. The dogs stopped to eat, and forgot to harm the apostle. "Now, then," said Peter, "you see I know his thoughts, but he is unable to know mine."

The magician demanded a new trial. He promised to fly through the air as Dedalus did. A day was appointed; he flew without any effort, but St. Peter prayed to God so heartily that Simon fell and broke his neck. Nero was indignant at having lost so good a mechanic through the prayers of Simon Peter, and caused him to be crucified with his head downwards.

Who would believe that this tale is not only related by Abdias, but by two other contemporary Christians, Hegesippus of whom we hav already spoken, and Marcel? Marcel adds a few finishing touches after his own fashion. He resembles those writers of the gospels who contradict each other. Marcel agrees with paul in part; he adds that Simon the magician, in order to convince the emperor of his power, said, "Do me the honor to strike my head off, and I promis you to resuscitate myself in three days." The emperor did so, and behold on the third day the magician appeared before Nero with the most beautiful head in the world upon his shoulders.

Let the reader reflect a moment with me. Suppose that the three fools, Abdias, Hegesippus, and Marcel, who related those pitiful little tales, had been less maladroit, and had invented stories more probable than these of the two Simons, would they not hav been regarded to-day as the fathers of an infallible church? Would not all of our learned men hav cited such unimpeachable truths? Would not the professors at Oxford and Sorboune hav proved the truth of these writings by their conformity with the Acts of the Apostles, and vice versa, hav proved the truth of the Acts by the writings of Abdias, Hegesippus, and Marcel? Their histories are assuredly as authentic as the Acts of the Apostles and the gospels. These were untried and untested in the past ages. There is no reason why we should reject the one and not the other set of tales.

I pass by in silence the rest of that history—the beautiful story of Andre, of James the Great, of John, of James the Little, of Matthew, and of Thomas. Let them read these silly tales who wish to do so. The same spirit of fanaticism, the same weaknesses, are to be found in them. I stop, for a satire too long is too insipid.*

*It is an astonishing fact that he always spoke of the be tial habits of the Jews. There is only one verse in the works of Latin authors (a line in Virgil, "novimus et qui te") and a passage in Apulus where there is a question of their infamous character [1771].

†The fable about the sins of the angels came from India, where all of them originated; this fable was known to the Jews of Alexandria and to the Christians, who were late in adopting it [1771]. This is the first stone in the edifice of Christianity [1775].

*Lord Bolingbroke has good reason for saying this. Nothing but a mortal weariness overcomes the reader of these books who undertakes to examin that which he cannot resist. Where are the magistrates, the warriors, the negotiators, the farmers, the literary men who are mentioned in the Gestes of the happy apostle, Andre, and in the letter of St. Ignatius the martyr to the Virgin Mary and in the answer of the virgin? Would we hav known a single one of these letters of the Jews and primitiv Christians if the gentlemen engaged in the business of beating in our ears the scriptures did not find such letters profitable? They, in fact, make their living out of our credulity. There is nothing in this world more ridiculous and more coarse than the fable about the voyage of Simon Barjonah to Rome. It is upon such stuff as this that the throne of the pope is founded. It is this which has plunged the bishops of the same faith into dependency. It is this which giv the bishops their titles by permission, whereas they should be equal to the pope according to the laws of their church. It is this which gave the popes their domain in Italy. It is this which despoiled thirty Italian principalities to enrich that idol of the people [1771].

Some Impious and Sacrilegious Utterances.

[It looks as though Bro. Young had been stirring up the "border ruffians" out in his state. He has caused the following pithy remarks, addressed to the general public, to be printed in circular form for distribution. They epitomize the popular arguments that hav been dinged in the ears of Christianity for the past century without receiving a direct answer from any one competent to speak with authority. As long as the doctrin that God so loves the world that he damns nine-tenths of its inhabitants is preached, these arguments should never be out of print.—ED. T. S.]

The editor of the Reveille has my sincere thanks, for publishing articles designed to excite and encourage free and independent thought in his readers.

But a change has come over him, and I am out in the cold.

He is undoubtedly sincere in assigning as the reason for his course that I write from an "impious or sacrilegious" standpoint.

But sincerity is no proof of sound reason on any subject—especially on religion.

The nativs of some of the South Sea Islands devoutly believe, when the old moon fades from the heavens, that the gods hav eaten it, and feel shocked at the impiety of those who doubt the soundness of their faith.

The Jew, the Christian, and the Mohommedan, each in turn, regards the others as impious for not accepting his belief.

And coming down to our humble selvs, our convictions on religion are as widely divergent as north from southern pole.

While my friend considers true piety to consist in cherishing the doctrins yclept "orthodox," I can but regard them as in the highest, or rather lowest, degree "impious or sacrilegious.

According to orthodox theology, God consigns a large majority of mankind to endless misery for acting just as he foresaw they would act as the legitimate result of instincts and attributes with which he endows every one before he comes into conscious existence!

But if piety leads one to believe the God of the universe out-devils the devil in that style, I choose to remain as impious as possible.

The average Christian is supposed to believe the Bible to represent the devil as the basest, most treacherous, cruel, and heartless being imaginable. But if he will read the whole book with the honest desire to see what it really does teach, he will find Satan represented to be the embodiment of all the virtues, compared with the character it givs the Infinit!

It is true there are some sweeping charges preferred against his Satanic Majesty—such as, "He was a liar from the beginning." But if the reader will examin the first three chapters of the book, he will see that, while his snakeship told the truth as to the effect the pippin would hav on the unsophisticated pair, Jehovah fibbed it.

And there are numerous accounts of similar foibles on the part of the latter.

See the following samples:

"For this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie" (Thes. ii, 11).

"Now, therefore, behold, the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets" (1 Kings xxii, 23). "The Lord sent an evil spirit" (Judges ix, 23). "And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord hav deceived that prophet" (Ezek. xiv, 9).

The devil is also accused of going about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour. But as there is no instance specified of his having devoured any one, his roaring may be simply for fun. The worst crime named against him is smiting Job with sore boils; but it will be seen by examining the record that the Lord gave him the wink to do it, which places one about as deep in the mud as the other in the mire.

But the second chapter of 2 Kings describes a crime, which the book ascribes to the Lord, compared with which Job's affliction was a slight affair. In fact, boils are generally blessings in disguise, to rid the system of morbific matter, for the promotion of the general health.

The account refered to is substantially this:

One Elisha was going up to Bethel, when a company of mirthful little children mocked him, and said, "Go up, thou bald head." Now it wasn't pretty in the children to speak so, but any old man with a bald head who loved children and knew he was a child once, would hav talked so kindly to them that they would never hav repeated such language to anybody. But what does old Lishe do but turn back, look at those giddy little children and "curse them in the name of the Lord," when out of the woods came two bears and tore forty-two of those little children to pieces!

Why don't the clergy take this and some other passages that I am selecting for them as texts for sermons? Such preaching would draw.

A few more illustrating the piety of Bible worship may be in order: "I will not pity, nor spare, nor hav mercy, but destroy them" (Jer. xiii, 14). "And thou shalt consume all the people which the Lord thy God shall deliver thee" (Deut. vii, 16). "Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all they hav and spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling" (1 Sam. xv, 2, 3). "The Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them and they died" (Josh. x, 11). "Because they had looked into the ark of the Lord, even he smote of the people fifty thousand and threescore and ten men" (1 Sam, vi, 19) "And the spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him . . and he . . slew a thousand men" (Judges xv, 14,15). "David did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and turned not aside from anything that he commanded him all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite" (1 Kings xv, 5). "And David slew of the Syrians seven thousand men which fought in chariots, and fifty thousand footmen" (1 Chron. xix, 18).

And this same David was guilty of enormous crimes too numerous to mention, and in sensuality out-Mormoned the average Mormon. And yet the the Bible calls him a man after God's own heart! In this connection the reader's attention is called to the story of Solomon, who cast all Mormondom into the shade by his lascivious life and songs; but still the Bible tells us that he was the wisest man that ever did or ever will liv! The Mormons, therefore, are the wisest people on earth.

More selections from the inspired book:

"Who ever doeth any work on the Sabbath day shall surely be put to death" (Ex. xxxi, 15). "They found a man gathering sticks on the Sabbath day, and the whole congregation stoned him to death, as the Lord commanded Moses" (Num. xv, 32, 36).

According to the thirty-first chapter of Numbers, God commanded Moses to make war on the Midianites. He did so, and took all their property, put all the males and married women to death, and gave the virgins over to a life worse than death; the reason for this wholesale outrage being, not that the people had done any wrong to Moses or his banditti, but that the Lord, like the editor in my case, regard d them as lacking in piety. But I hav no fears of my friend's wishing to come the Jehovah on me, as he is far higher in the moral scale than the book he swears by. But, as there are those who might consider themselvs moved a la Bible to emulate the piety of Moses, David, and the bears, all of whom are represented as under divine guidance, I breathe freer and deeper for the waning power of the mythical book.

There is, if possible, a still lower deep to orthodoxy than anything yet noticed. Reference is made to the dogma of vicarious atonement.

Language is impotent to properly characterize it. Suffice it to say that an infinitly wise, just, and merciful God is blasphemously represented as refusing to pardon sinners from eternal torments, however humble, contrite, and penitent they may be, save only by the cruel and bloody murder of his only begotten and innocent son!

The animus of the dogma is far below the code of Southern chivalry.

No chivalric son of the South could ever hav meted out vengeance to any but those he considered in the wrong. But that is just what God is said to hav done, or caused to be done.

Nothing short of the sufferings of a God like himself could appease his anger, caused by the sins of mankind! Such is the justice of piety!

And here it may be well to elucidate the mathematics of the "Adorable Trinity." Well, there are three personal Gods—yet there is but one God. In other words, as applied to the triune God, three are no more than one, nor is one any less than three. So now, dear reader, you know how it is yourself. It is one of the "mysteries of godliness"—and don't you forget it.

So the wrath of the father (one-third of God) could be appeased, sated, or satisfied for the sins of the world only by the cruel and ignominious death of his own innocent son (another third of God, who was just as old as his father, and equal in all respects). And these sufferings of Christ are imputed to sinners, and they go scot-free. For the doctrin is that the passion of the cross was a full atonement for the sins of all mankind who will accept such means of free grace.

Therefore if Christians suffer too, it is sharp practice—God is extorting double price. But here, as in most matters, Bible believers reason in a circle. In one part of their orbit they say Jesus made a full propitiation for the sins of the whole world. They then swing around to the opposit point, and declare that all that will liv godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution (2 Tim. iii 12). "And ye shall be hated of all men for my name sake" (Luke xxi, 17). "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth" (Heb. xii, 6). "Jordan am a hard road to trabel," etc., etc.

It is impossible to believe that a human being ever existed so void of mercy as this dogma represents the Infinit to be.

And it would be difficult to devise a religious tenet more demoralizing to all who can believe it, or which could hav stronger attractions for the ignoble and selfish, than this dogma of vicarious atonement.

There can be no doubt that this feature is what won the blood-stained Emperor Constantine to Christianity. He hoped it might save him from punishment for his atrocious crimes.

How comforting to the hardened criminal to believe that Jesus died for him, suffered in his stead, has taken away all his sins, if he will believe on and trust in him; that he will be accepted at the eleventh hour; that though his sins are as scarlet, the blood of Jesus will make them white as snow.

Probably ninety-nine per cent of all criminals believe this doctrin. Some years ago it was ascertained that the convicts of the Auburn (N. Y.) state prison (situated in my nativ county) were orthodox to a man, and eighteen of them clergymen.

And it is well known that convicted murderers, almost or quite without exception, are orthodox, and speak with their last breath with the utmost confidence of swinging from the scaffold to paradise direct. And this may be the reason why clergymen are so unanimous for the gallows.

But how about the noble and magnanimous? Can they wish to enter heaven, not for any good they may hav done in the world, but to sneak in over the blood, sufferings, and merits of another?

They cannot. But paradise is not an inclosure; but the result of unselfish devotion to the good of mankind.

> "Who hath assuaged a widow's wo,
> Or wiped an orphan's tear, doth know
> Of heaven beginning here below."

The dogma of vicarous atonement could not liv a decade in this enlightened age but for the Sunday-school, in which the confiding, unreasoning, and plastic mind of childhood is bent, twisted, and distorted into the most unnatural and grotesque forms, which crystallize in many cases and go through life. I once heard Dr. K., of Mechanicsville, Ia., boast in public of never having allowed himself to harbor a doubt of anything taught him at Sunday-school when a child. His teachers might therefore hav made him a life-long believer that Jonah swallowed the whale, instead of vice versa.

But "the world moves." And the Bible, from having been so long the judge on the bench, has become the culprit in the box. Amen, Selah.

Memphis, Mo. STEPHEN YOUNG.

The Revolt Against Compulsory Vaccination in England.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The recent conference of the London Society for the Abolition of Compulsory Vaccination has given a further impulse to the now irrepressible agitation for the repeal of all compulsory vaccination legislation. The chair was taken by Mr. I. Passmore Edwards, member of Parliament for Salisbury, and proprietor of the Echo and other well-known journals, who denounced the tyranny of the laws which subjected parents to repeated fines and imprisonment for their non-compliance with what they believed to be a mischievous medical infliction. There was a large attendance of medical men, sanitarians, members of boards of guardians, and others interested in questions relating to the public health, among them Dr. Clark, Dr. C. T. Pearce, Dr. Edward Haughton, Dr. D. Jones, Dr. C. R. Drysdale, F. R. C. S.; Mr. W. J. Collins, M. B., M. R. C. S., Dr. Thos. Nichols, Dr. Renner, Mr. Alderman Rees (chairman of the Dover Board of Guardians); Mr. Zadok M. Spear, of Philadelphia, U. S. A.; Mr. Alex. Wheeler of Darlington; Mr. T. Martin of Lewes, Mr. Robert Blackie, of Liverpool; Dr. Alice Vickery, and other lady doctors, Mr. Mozley, barrister at law, Mr. W. Tebb, Mr. William White, Mr. Cornelius Pearson, and many others. Dr. Drysdale read an interesting paper on the origin of vaccinia and the progress of animal vaccination, which was followed by an animated discussion. Mr. William Tebb furnished some important details relating to the progress of the movement against compulsory vaccination both in England and on the Continent; upwards of a quarter of a million tracts and publications had been published and circulated by the London society alone during the past twelve months, new anti-vaccination leagues and societies had been formed, and old ones revived. An able article in the Journal of Science for November, entitled, "The Vaccination Question Reconsidered," showed that recent parliamentary and other official documents demonstrate the inutility of vaccination as a preventiv, and its deleterious effects on the public health, which facts could not be much longer concealed by the leaders of the pro-vaccinating party.

The International Anti-Vaccination Congress held in Paris last year had been the means of intensifying the opposition, and awakening public attention to the subject to a large degree. Deputations of the delegates had been granted audiences with M. Tirard, the minister of agriculture and commerce; also with M. Constans, the minister of the interior; and the main facts against vaccination laid before them had led to the rejection of M. Lionville's bill for making vaccination and re-vaccination compulsory in France. The International Congress recently held at Cologne, at which eight nationalities were represented by forty delegates, would, he (Mr. Tebb) ventured to hope, precipitate the repeal of the vaccination acts in Germany, the opposition to which was gaining ground every day. After the termination of the conference proceedings Mr. Alexander Wheeler proposed the following resolution:

> "That in view of the confusion of opinion which prevails amongst medical authorities when the subject of vaccination is discussed, it is unwise, impolitic, and unjust to enforce it; that such enforcement retards all improvement in the treatment, and all discoveries for the prevention of smallpox; and that all compulsory legislation with regard to vaccination ought to be repealed."

This was seconded by Dr. Haughton, and carried amidst applause, with only two or three dissentients, in an overflowing assembly.

London, Dec. 7, 1881. WM. YOUNG.

A Letter from California.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER. Sir: I promised you some time ago that I would giv your readers an idea of where immigrants could find some good farming, and also where hunters could find plenty of game and "toilers of the sea" plenty of fish. Since the promis was made I hav read the very interesting letter of Dr. J. L. York, of San Jose, in this state, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week, and also some articles from Washington territory, published in the Investigator. Oregon and the territory around are the regions of which I was to speak, but I would also include British Columbia and Alaska. As to the British possessions on the Pacific, an American can feel as much at home there, substantially speaking, as in Alaska, Oregon, or Washington territory. The inhabitants of all the vast regions spoken of speak the English language, habits and customs are the same, and the most fraternal feelings exist.

As to agricultural and grazing lands, there are millions of acres, and "as good as ever lay outdoors," as the saying is. But let us understand each other thoroughly. I look upon all Freethinkers as constituting one great family, and when I giv information, counsel, or advice, I do so unselfishly, as a member of that family, and am proud of the honor. Now if any Freethinker along the Atlantic seaboard, the great West, or elswhere, the other side of the Rocky Mountains, is comfortably situated, and life is prosperous with himself and family, he had better not break up the old home. Let its memories be sacred unto him, for this beautiful and blessed earth is the Freethinker's heaven. If we get to the other we will try and make it a greater heaven still.

As to men who hav determined to make a move, let them not hesitate a moment to strike for the Pacific coast. Young men who are resolved to go West, as good Horace Greeley would say, should not stop before casting their eyes on the glorious and apparently boundless Pacific Ocean. These two classes, whom I know to be composed of earnest, honest, industrious men, cannot fail to prosper. I should suggest northern California, Oregon, and Washington territory for those intending to pursue farming and cattle-raising. Irrigation is necessary in southern California. Hunters will find Washington territory, British Columbia, and Alaska a veritable bonanza, as will fishermen.

The climate, generally speaking, is mild, owing, the scientists say, to the Japanese gulf-stream. Right here in San Francisco you can imagin what an Eden it is. Three weeks ago I planted out some corn in a large vase and left it on my window-sill, out in the open air. To-day I measured my green crop, and all the blades are from one to two inches high, and healthy and strong. And this in the middle of the month of December. All my flowers are green and blooming, and the trees in the gardens are just commencing to bud. Nature is thus impulsiv through a great section of California at this season. Think of this, you who hav four or five months of ice, snow, and cold winds before you.

Truly we hav a paradise on the Pacific, but here, as elsewhere, life is a struggle, and there are those joys, griefs, those hopes and fears which are the common lot of humanity. All things considered, however, we really hav a paradise on this coast. I presume the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER goes to his office in a heavy overcoat, has warm gloves to keep his hands in good trim, and a fire all day to enable him to work. I do not know what an overcoat is, and I hav not seen a fire in my office this winter or last, and never feel the want of such a thing. I present these facts to show your readers that "the boasted climate of California" is deserving of its good name. Of course people hav fires here, but they are more a necessity for cooking and the old folks than anything else.

I hav received several letters in reply to my last correspondence, to some of which I hav replied. The general facts herein stated must be a reply to the others. My friend, Mr. A. Berenz, has also received a number of letters, and he requests me to say politely to his correspondents, all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that the facts stated in my last letter with regard to the boot and shoe trade are the same as then, and that the artisans who are determined to come here will find remunerativ work, as stated. With an "aloha" for all, I remain, as ever,

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1882.

Welcome, 1882.

This number begins a new year and a new volume of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Last year had fifty-three Saturdays, and consequently our readers had fifty-three papers. Some weeklies skipped one issue, but we could not afford to do it. We intend to giv every patron who deals with us his full money's worth and not take advantage of any freaks of old Father Time to get out of our honest obligation to publish THE TRUTH SEEKER every Saturday. If the white-headed old man takes a notion to stick a hundred and three Saturdays in 1882 we shall print a paper for every one of them.

Since THE TRUTH SEEKER started as a little eight-page monthly out on an Illinois prairie it has seen many vicissitudes, and its honored editor has known how bitter is the lot of him who speaks his honest thought surrounded by Christian enemies. He has felt the overpowering love which has in all ages so preëminently distinguished the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, and has tasted prison fare because of his unswerving devotion to what he considered right. He lay for eleven long months in a Christian prison because he maintained the right to utter the honest thought of others. He was put there by a Christian society because he was an Infidel, a Freethinker, a truth seeker.

But he survived and came out stronger than ever, more widely known and honored. His reception in this city will long be remembered as a red letter day for the Liberals of this city, the country, and the world. Kind greetings came even from over the sea. But that was not honor enough, and he was sent as a delegate to the International Congress of Liberals at Brussels, from whence he took a tour over the eastern part of Europe, "The Truth Seeker in Europe," a volume of 850 pages, being the result. So well pleased were the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER with his letters that Mr. Coleman made the proposition that he go around the world and giv the Liberals of the country the benefit of his travels through these columns, and also in book form. From being a mere suggestion the enterprise soon took definit shape, hundreds of people pledging the five dollars for the book, and on the 30th day of last July he sailed, and the weekly letters now appearing are the result. The fund is still growing, and we believe that ultimately enough will be subscribed to pay the entire expense of the trip.

From being the inmate of a Christian prison to traveling around the world as the eyes of several thousand people is a long step. The churches of this country can best tell whether the project of imprisoning the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has been a satisfactory and paying investment.

And so we welcome 1882. We start out on the new volume under happy auspices. If our friends do their part the year will be a grand one. It will see the editor home, the travels completed, and the first Liberal history of the old world written. The aims of the paper will be, as ever, to inculcate and perpetuate science, Liberalism, and truth. We hav no creed nor dogmas to ask others to subscribe to, but are in favor of independent thought, free inquiry, free speech, and everything that tends to break the chains of mental bondage, ignorance, and superstition. This should be the platform of all charitable, Liberal, honest men. Upon this platform the paper has stood for eight years, even when whirlwinds of slander and vindictiv opposition hav roared around it. It has never faltered in its opposition to Christian priestcraft—a system that has fastened an incubus upon the world more blighting than any mildew ever breathed from heaven. It will at all times defend the right and denounce the wrong. It will wage an unceasing warfare upon the shams of the church and the crimes of the priesthood, and the cruel creeds which bind as in chains the minds of hundreds of thousands all over the country. The paper will never cease to oppose a system of religion which resorts to lying, intrigue, and imprisonment to smother honest thought. Christianity claims to be founded on the merits of a meek and lowly man, but its followers hav been the most intolerant of opposition, the most bloodthirsty toward unbelievers, of any religionists. They hav persecuted the good, the true, the brave; hav imprisoned the scientist and burnt the heretic.

To rescue man from a belief in a superstition which has done this is the mission of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It has consistently pursued this course since its birth, and will continue to do so. That the light of truth may spread still more rapidly over the world, that men and women everywhere may learn to prefer it to darkening, blighting fogs of superstition, is its devoted wish and purpose.

We welcome 1882 because every year the paper livs the stronger it becomes, and with its permanency insured there will always be one bulwark against Christian encroachment and persecution—one voice always lifted up in a wilderness of truckling, time-serving papers for the preservation and perpetuation of the institutions founded by our Infidel forefathers. So long as THE TRUTH SEEKER exists there will be one defender of human rights; one denouncer of Christian wrongs.

That it will liv for a hundred years—ay, more—we firmly believe. It surely will if every friend of freedom does his or her duty. The only thing that can imperil its existence will be the apathy of the Liberals of the country, and we do not think for a moment that such apathy can exist. Great progress has been made during the last year in speading the light of reason. The struggle of Liberals against the dominant church persecution has passed into history. There may hav been a few stragglers from the grand army left by the wayside, but the van and the great body hav pressed steadily forward, and Liberalism to-day is far in advance of what it has been at any other period in time. Its ranks hav been strengthened by the best minds of the day, the clearest thinkers, the most learned scientists. The time has clearly come when our movement must no longer be merely a negativ opposition to old myths and superstitions, but we must show by our lives and our works that we hav something better to offer, something to take the place; and in this, as in its opposition to the creeds of the churches, THE TRUTH SEEKER will be found in the lead.

And so to the Liberals of the country, to those who love liberty, those who value free speech, who place honesty above hypocrisy, who prefer the facts of science to the theories of superstition, the thinkable and knowable to the unthinkable and unknowable, reasonable opinions to the ipse dixit of ignorance, neighborly charity to burning bigotry, we appeal for support the coming year. All we ask is reward according to our merit, and it shall not be our fault if it is not as generous in the future as it has been in the past. We hope that every person interested in the cause of human rights—of liberty for all alike—will do what he can to help along THE TRUTH SEEKER. Let all seek for truth, and when we hav found the jewel in the grass, let us bring another to view it with us. A diamond loses nothing of its luster by being looked at by the multitude, and the truth will bear the roughest handling. All it asks is a fair field and no favor. .

Remember THE TRUTH SEEKER is the largest, boldest, and freest Liberal paper in the world. It will be sent, postage paid,

One year, ...	$3.00
Six months, ...	1.50
Three months, ...	.75

In order to introduce it, we shall continue to send it to new or trial subscribers three months for 50 cents. We do not make anything on this, and we do it simply to take the stranger by the hand, trusting that he will like the paper well enough to continue taking it at the regular rates.

We wish all our friends a new year free from worry and vexation, from financial distress, sickness, and suffering, and trust that in their prosperity they will not forget THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Religion and Insanity.

The Miss Nancy who writes the esthetic articles for the New York Tribune is much shocked that level-headed people are attributing to religion the "crankedness" of the fanatic now undergoing trial at Washington. The fact that some persons hav cautioned ministers to be careful how they preached from the biblical story of Abraham about to sacrifice his son lest it might lead religious people, like Freeman and Guiteau, to commit murder, is dwelt upon and deplored. The cause of insanity, says the long-stockinged young man, is always physiological.

Now, we did not hear anything of this kind when the president was first shot. On the contrary, every minister said it was the result of Freethought, and preached lurid sermons against the Infidelity of the times. But when it is incontestably proved that the assassin is one of the most religious of the religious, the ministers shrink from their own reasoning and say that religion never had anything to do with it. How would it hav been had it been shown that the wretch was an Infidel? Would not every Christian in the land hav said the crime was the result of his belief, or non-belief? And would not the Tribune hav said so too? The Liberalism of the century would hav had to bear the opprobrium, and now that it is shown that the Bible and the Christian religion are the source whence the murderer drew his inspiration, we propose that the church shall bear the obloquy, and not its opponents.

Infidelity has no sacred standard for murder, no inspired record of holy crimes, no deity who sanctions and commands assassination, no scheme of redemption whereby the innocent is made to bear the sins of the guilty, but, on the contrary, every Freethinker is guided by the principles of right and justice. If he commits a wrong he cannot say he was led to it by his religion, or that his god sanctions it. He must square his life by honesty and justice, and stand on his own merits.

Religion givs a man a chance to do all sorts of wickedness, and then escape by repenting at the last moment, throwing all the sin on Jesus, and keeping all the glory for himself.

The fact that religion has crazed a good many is amply shown by the statistics of the insane asylums of the country, and all the disclaimers by the men of God cannot make it any different. At present it looks as though the Washington crank was not insane, but only a shrewd religious fanatic. At any rate, religion must share the opprobrium of his crime until it is shown that religion never committed murder, and we take it that will be a hard matter to establish unless all books are burned and all human testimony thrown aside as counting for naught.

More Arbitrary Meddling with the Mail.

A few days ago an edition of the paper called House and Home was detained at the post-office on the pretext that it contained some proposition for premiums touching somewhat on the statute forbidding the offering of prizes. A copy of the paper was sent to Washington for the decision of the moguls at headquarters, and they returned it with this astounding decision: The lottery and gift enterprise statutes are not violated, but it should not be allowed to hav mail facilities because it contains an advertisment of Dr. Foote's "Health Hints!" We do not profess to giv the phraseology of this order, simply its substance. Why does not the department rule out the New York Weekly Tribune and the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post for the same reason? These papers are publishing this same advertisment. When this question is settled we would ask to know what there is objectionable in either the advertisment or in Dr. Foote's "Health Hints?" Things seem to be growing terribly foggy down at the capital, and every old government scow seems to be bumping against Dr. Foote's health excursion boats. But, seriously, what rights hav the newspapers in the mails? Where is this meddlesomeness to end? If such arbitrary rulings are permitted, what may come next? Is this censorship of the press to be continued until the liberty of the press and mails is wholly subverted? These are serious questions for the consideration of the American people.

Mr. Wakeman's Two Lectures.

We ask the serious attention of our readers to these remarkable lectures upon "The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels." The first lecture was concluded in our last paper with the close of the year. It laid the objectiv scientific basis of Liberalism concisely yet thoroughly. Mr. Wakeman deserves the thanks of all for collecting in so short a space the substance of hundreds of volumes, which ordinary mortals hav no time to read and digest. As far as we can see, his work has been admirably done. It furnishes a foundation upon which Liberalism can rest and build securely for the future.

We shall commence the second lecture with our next number. It promises to be not so deep and scientific, but more practical and generally interesting than the first. It takes up the main questions of our age, and, upon the scientific foundation laid in the first lecture, givs their solution from the Positiv and human point of view. He calls it the subjectiv order; but the point is to show how that The Religion of Science and Humanity is the only safe and practical solution and guide of human life, at least, on this earth.

Mr. Wakeman is advertised to repeat this second lecture, in substance, before the SOCIETY OF HUMANITY next Sunday evening at Science Hall. It will be the first of a course of lectures to be delivered Sunday evenings this winter by members of that society. Those who are so fortunate as to be able to attend this course will soon learn that those who talk about "shallow Infidelity" are sadly if not wilfully behind the age. See the announcement of this course in another column.

WE hav sent out bills to all our subscribers who are in arrears. We are needing the money and hope none will take offense at receiving the notice, for all may be assured it would not be sent were not the money needed. We hav, of course, a great many bills presented to us, and hav to scratch around and pay them, and to do this the hundreds of little bills owing to us are necessary. We hav reckoned the bills up to January, but we hope all who can will renew in advance for 1882. When the amount is for a part of the year, friends can just inclose $3 and let it go on for the year, or they can inclose the amount for the fraction of the year and also $3 for 1882, which latter course would assuredly please us best. The amount is not large for each individual, but in the aggregate the accounts amount up to a handsome sum, and if paid promptly will make THE TRUTH SEEKER all right for the coming year. We earnestly ask our friends to pay early attention to the bills.

Charles J. Guiteau and the Great Trial at Washington.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

I hav been for some time under a strong "pressure" —that is the phrase now—to say a few words about the trial of Guiteau for the "removal" of President Garfield. It strikes me forcibly that it is really not so much Guiteau who is on trial as it is the Christian church, and religion itself as it has been and is understood and taught in most countries. Especially is it Judaism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity, the three great religions of the occident, which are on trial; and to convict and hang Guiteau will go a long way toward rendering a verdict against the fundamental doctrin of these three great religions—the one doctrin in which they all agree, and by which they are affiliated as of the same descent. That doctrin is, faith in the direct inspiration of individual minds by the deity, which inspiration may and does, in supreme instances, lift the individual so inspired out of himself, cancel his responsibility, and make him the mere agent of the higher power; and further, that the grandest and sublimest test of the overpowering presence of such inspiration is its requisition upon the individual to do some act so abhorrent to his natural affections and reason that nothing but such a divine pressure upon him from without himself could hav induced him to, and hav sustained him in, the act. Such was the act of Abraham in his proposed sacrifice of his son Isaac at the supposed and assumed command of God; and it was that supreme act of faith in what came to him as an inspiration, and of obedience to the command so communicated, subjectivly, or through the operations of his own mind, that constituted and constitutes Abraham "the Father of the Faithful," and, as such, the historic head of the three great religions above mentioned. All of them date back to Abraham for their origin, and to this one act of Abraham as the sign and seal of the divine sanction of their own faith—the very reason of their existence.

What Abraham did, or proposed to do, Guiteau has done. The cases are as nearly identical as can well be imagined. Abraham was the Guiteau of his day; Guiteau is the Abraham of our day. Guiteau and Abraham are virtually one. We, who stand aside and judge, hav no means of knowing the facts, except what Abraham must be supposed to hav told some one or ones about it, and what Guiteau actually does tell us, and repeats, every day, about it. We cannot enter into the subjectiv chambers of their minds and actually know what occurred there. What is claimed as having happened is, however, the same in both cases; and if it be granted and claimed that such a thing can happen, and did happen in one case, that raises a strong presumption that it did happen, or may hav happened, in the other case. It is not my purpose to deny that it did happen in the case of Abraham; but to insist that this is the real question at issue. Guiteau is logically and precisely right in affirming that there are two and only two questions rightly before the court: (1) Was he under a divine pressure, an overpowering influence, compelling him to do an act from which personally he would hav recoiled, both in his sentiments and in his reason? and (2), Does the presence of a divine inspiration, thus lifting a man out of himself, constitute such a special variety of insanity as also to lift him above all responsibility to human laws.

Of course it does not follow, if inspiration is a truth, that every man who claims to be inspired is so, really. The first question divides therefore into two: (1) Is inspiration of the kind in question ever true? and (2), Was Guiteau's pretended inspiration one of the genuin kind, or otherwise?

I am not arguing for the yea or nay of any one of these questions. But I am saying that they are very vital questions for the church and for the current religion among us. It is the church and the current religion that are on trial. Is there any such thing as inspiration having the power over the human mind to snatch it from its anchorage in reason and hurl it into the current of what would otherwise be the direst and most horrible crime. If yes, then Guiteau may be telling the simple, unadulterated truth. If no, the very keystone is knocked out of the arch which sustains the three most prominent religions of the world.

The church and the current religion are on trial in this very case as never before in the whole history of the world. If God reigns, and if it were his express design to shatter the old forms of faith and hasten their downfall, in preparation for the new order of the pure reason, or if, on the other hand it, were his purpose to resuscitate faith by another brilliant instance like that of Abraham, to publish it suddenly to the whole world, and so to burnish up the whole armor of the old religious warriors—in neither case could he, seemingly, hav worked to his end better than by provoking this Guiteau trial; and herein may be the otherwise inscrutable divine wisdom of the whole transaction. But which of these two is the design of deity? Which doctrin has to go to the wall? Or is there a third which shall reconcile them? The church and religion cannot evade the issue. It is they that are on trial; not merely in the court-house, but in millions of individual minds over the whole world. Is inspiration a truth? Was Abraham divinely inspired to murder his own and dearly beloved son? If so, why not Guiteau to slay the president? Rev. Robert Collyer preached a sermon on Abraham and Guiteau. He denied the inspiration of Abraham, at least, by inference. But that is to cease to be either Jew, Mohammedan, or Christian. Rev. Dr. Fulton preached back again. His argument was little more than abuse of the other pulpiteer—abuse of him as worse than Guiteau, for comparing Guiteau to Abraham, when nothing but the prejudice of sentiment could surmise a difference—granting the sincerity of each. But in the midst of the bad logic of Dr. Fulton, his talk showed painfully the struggle of the heart; he sensed profoundly the awful strain which has come upon the doctrin of faith and inspiration. His sermon sounded like a wail, and a terrific protest against the stern logic of the case. He for one evidently sees and knows that it is the church and the current religion which are on trial.

But then what is to be said in this matter? Is the church and are the traditions of all past times wholly wrong; and are the new-lights of the hour the only people who hav ever known the truth about it? Are they even settled among themselvs on the subject? As I write there comes to me in the New York Herald of yesterday (Sunday, Dec. 19th), the report of a sermon by Rev. M. J. Savage, of Boston, in which he sets forth the present position of Mr. Frothingham, about which much misunderstanding has existed.

"Let me outline as briefly as I can," says he, "Mr. Frothingham's present religious attitude. Has there been any real change in his view of things? Yes, there has; and this is the little flame at the heart of all this heaven-filling cloud of smoke."

Mr. Frothingham, it seems, would not blot out one single word of all his past utterances, but would supplement them with a new element of faith. He does not tend backward but forward, except as extremes meet, and the whole embraces the parts.

"Now, then, for his change. To put it into my own phrase, I should say he has come to be a more pronounced Theist. The point toward which his thoughts converge is 'the mode of communication between the divine mind and the human,' to quote his own words in conversation. He said, 'For many years I hav been inclined to try to prove that everything comes out of the earth from below; that religion is purely earthly in its origin; something made by man—his effort to perfect himself, to use Mr. Abbot's phrase; and I hav not, as I now think, taken enough account of the working in the world of a divine mind—a power above man's working on and through him to lift and lead;' and in his own use of that term he looks for larger revelations of God and truth in the future. 'I hope,' said he, 'that new light will break out—not of God's word, in the sense of a book, but of God's universe. The new light, he thinks, will come, not by studying old creeds or standards or Bibles, but by looking forward for new manifestations through natural methods in the human soul."

The gist of all this is that Mr. Frothingham is laboring with this very question, "the mode of communication between the divine mind and the human," and this not as a matter of biblical interpretation, but as a question of universal and social philosophy.

Now, in order to understand this new departure, we may at least glance at the past. The ancient philosophers come to believe in a fate or fatality which overmasters the will of both gods and men. Shakspere says, "There is a destiny that shapes our ends, rough-hew them as we will." More specifically the ancients believed in a universal pneuma, a veritable holy ghost, which permeated the atmosphere and universal things, and affected the minds of men for good or evil. This all-permeating spirit or influence, impinging on the human mind, they personified sometimes as male and sometimes as female. It was from this idea that the doctrin of the Holy Ghost arose in the churches. Where the philosopher personified, the theologians impersonated. Mr. Frothingham is beginning to believe in the philosophical phase of this doctrin. Guiteau believes absolutely in the theological aspect of the same doctrin. Extremes meet.

I must stop. I might well write a volume on the subject. The Guiteau case presents exceedingly interesting problems for the students of sociological psychology. Ordinary psychologists compass but half the problem. There is a sense in which all mankind, nay, all things, are one, as well as a sense in which they are individual or many. Judge Porter will throw his strength, probably, into the effort to prove that Guiteau is and has been shamming or pretending; and with his great ability, on his plane, and his powerful magnetic sphere, he may very probably convince the jury, and, for the time being, the community, and Guiteau may be hung; but the people of a riper development and deeper insight of the next generation will reverse their verdict, and in history he will come to be regarded as a sort of martyr to the ignorance of the world we liv in. There is, almost certainly, no more honest man living than Guiteau, in the sense of a profound conviction of the truth of his inspiration. If there can be a possible doubt in his case, there can be none in that of Freeman. There is not a shadow of a difference otherwise between Guiteau, Freeman, and Abraham. The real question is, How came this man to hav that conviction? The answer is at hand: In his highly nervous, sensitiv organization, with some lack of balance; and in the facts of his education. He was taught from his infancy by his father, and trained for six years in his most impressible period of youth, in precisely the doctrins he is now reiterating with the stanchest confidence every day. They are the doctrins of John H. Noyes and his followers, who talk familiarly of God or deity as a person in daily and actual communication with them, and inspiring them, especially Mr. Noyes, in all they do. Mr. Noyes himself was when young a revivalist preacher, in dead earnest. He differed from the whole Christian world around him, in the single fact of actually believing what they taught and are teaching, while they but half believe it, or think they believe it, but do not do so in very truth. I hav been anxiously waiting to hear Mr. Scoville examin Guiteau and other witnesses, to show the influence under which Guiteau formed his character and his convictions, and especially upon the peculiar and very impressiv teachings of Oneida upon these very subjects. I venture to presume that Guiteau's defection from Mr Noyes was on the ground that Mr. Noyes even was not extreme enough in his belief of this very doctrin of implicit faith in personal inspiration, and in the actual and overpowering presence of God in the mind of the true believer.

Guiteau has lived all his life enveloped in this influence. His surprise and wonderment are perfectly genuin, I do not for a moment doubt, that the Christian community at large has not flocked around him and rallied as one man to his defense. In all this he is perfectly logical. They should do so, and especially the Oneida people should do so, if faith were not either dead or half dead among them. It is their issue, made boldly with the world, maintained verbally for some thousands of years, and now brought to an actual test in the court-house of a civilized country. I repeat, in conclusion, that it is the church and the current religions of the world which are on trial at Washington, and if they had the courage of their opinions to stand bravely up for his defense, as they might do with oceans of divine and no small amount of philosophical authority to back them, Guiteau would be properly defensed; and without that, if convicted and hung, he will be judicially slaughtered, having been deprived of the defense he is justly entitled to.

SIN AGAINST THE HOLY GHOST, AND EXPOSITION OF RELIGIOUS FRAUDS. By Thomas Crispin. Price $1.00. Detroit, Mich.

This is by a man who conceives he knows more about the Holy Ghost than ordinary people, and consequently is able to tell what is a sin against it. He seems to be a little church, with a little creed all to himself, and has about the same number of vagaries that most lay theologians who try to effect a reform within the church hav. He appreciates the true worth of the priesthood, for he says: "The last fifty years hav demonstrated pretty satisfactorily to most people that the clergy are no more to be relied upon for truth, honesty, and virtue than the politician or the general run of mankind. Each is bound to defend the doctrins of his own particular church, and they are as a class almost void of the moral courage necessary to enable men to stand up for the truth alone." With the exception of an occasional lucid interval like this paragraph, the book is as tedious as works written by more orthodox expounders of the mysteries of the H. G. and the trinity.

GEORGE FOX INTERPRETED. The religion, revelations, motivs, and mission of George Fox, "the first and chief elder among the people called Quakers," interpreted in the light of the nineteenth century, and applied to the present condition of the church. By Thomas Ellwood Songshore. Price, paper, 50 cts.; cloth, 75 cents. For sale by the author at Philadelphia, Pa.

Geo. Fox is canonized by the Quakers, who cherish him as a saint, and this book was written to destroy in some measure the superstition they hold respecting him and his faith. He is the text for the essay because his name may enlist and excite inquiry among his followers. The book, it is thought, may help them in defending themselvs against the charge of heresy, and in enlightening what the author calls the misguided. The book is not radical in thought; it was not written for the mentally full, but for the enslaved to superstition, and is designed for a stepping stone to farther-on truth, for which the author professes supreme reverence. The book is permeated with the kindly spirit of the Quaker sect, for which we must hav deep sympathy and respect, however much we may disagree with them in their religous tenets.

THE large cut which we print this week of the howling dervishes performing their worship—a sort of Mohammedan prayer and praise meeting—will be found alluded to in Mr. Bennett's letter from Constantinople. The peculiar conformation of the gravestones which the writer remarks can be noted in this picture.

Patent Morality.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: "Law" and "Liberta" are discussing prohibition. Perhaps I hav no business to interfere in this fight, but as the patent-morality people are trying, with good prospects of success, to secure the adoption of a prohibitory amendment in Iowa similar to the one their Kansas brethren hav engrafted upon the organic laws of the state, my intrusion may possibly be pardoned by your readers and by "Law."

But it seems to me that each of these gentlemen has chosen a somewhat inappropriate nom de plume. "Law" really speaks on behalf of liberty, while "Liberta" voices the demands of those who would sacrifice liberty in the name of statute morality. Let this pass, however.

The moment a man differs from them in regard to methods in reform, the patent-morality people vociferously charge him with being the enemy of morality, goodness, and human welfare. Because "Law" does not believe that certain words written upon a piece of paper can change the nature of men, supersede or neutralize conditions of birth and environment, make an ascetic of a glutton, or a sage of a boor, "Liberta" says that he is wanting in morality and a desire to elevate the morals of his community, intimates that he would recruit the ranks of Liberalism in the "sinks of immorality," and says that he is very much ashamed of "Law."

This is the spirit manifested by nearly or quite all of those who advocate compulsiv methods in temperance work. "Liberta" should not be blamed for this intolerant Phariseeism. He inherited it. From the church he got his ideas of right and wrong, and he simply wants to use her tools of reformation. Professing to be the apostle of peace, force has ever been her ideal means of grace. She has always persecuted men for their good. God has been the shibboleth, but the good of man her end. The inquisitor sought to conserve morality, and his conception of morality was obedience to the will of God as revealed in the Bible.

Men must obey God. Why? That they might be better and happier, if not here, then somewhere else. To the end that men should escape hell hereafter, the church endeavored to force her ideas of morality and duty upon all. Hence came racks, thumb-screws, gibbets, stakes, inquisitions, heresy laws, etc., etc. Little or no attempts to better conditions, to study nature, nothing but law and force everywhere and always.

Partly to save men from the same hereafter hell, partly to keep them out of the hells of the here and now, the patent moralists, prohibitionists, obscenists, and all others of that genus, seek to force their views of morality and temperance upon all, regardless of all differences of organization and environment; not only their views, but their methods of reform, their cure-all specifics. Hence prohibitory laws and amendments, fines, penalties, imprisonment, confiscation, and disfranchisment. The inquisitor and the prohibitionist are one as regards both motivs and means. The inquisitor sought to better the condition of humanity; so does the prohibitionist. The adored specific of each, force, legal, physical. The intention, good. The means, subversiv of all liberty, alien to science, totally inadequate to secure the end sought.

Prohibitionists are ever unjust to those who cannot agree with them as to methods. This is natural. The worshiper of force regards all who do not kneel at the same shrine, as rebels. And he is always ready to help put down the rebellion. He knows that he is right, and if others don't, why, they've got to, that's all. This it is that has cumbered our statute books with a multitude of laws, ninety-nine hundredths of which are needless, impertinent, invasiv, and tyrannical.

Any person who has the temerity to dissent from the dictum of your true prohibitionist is by him at once classed with the enemies of temperance, is called an ally of the rum-seller and a foe to morality. These legal suasionists get together and style themselvs the "Temperance party," thus classing all who cannot agree with them as to methods in a great intemperate party. An amiable, courteous, and modest proceeding, surely!

Says "Liberta," "The great crime of our age is intemperance. It is the father of every other crime." Per contra, the great misfortune of this and every age is and has been ignorance; ignorance of how to so adapt ourselvs to our environment as to secure the largest possible resultant of happiness for ourselvs and others; ignorance is the father of intemperance, poverty, bad generation, and all other secondary causes of human unhappiness which act and react upon each other, becoming in turn the cause and effect each of the other. Thus ignorance is the father of crime, but intemperance is not a crime, per se. If it is, why do you not arrest and fine the man who drinks, rather than the one who sells, the glass of beer?

Is it not because you dare not to-day go that far in your invasion of the sovereignty of the individual? Remember, if there was no demand the supply would not be forthcoming. Men do not manufacture reapers for the use of lumbermen, nor does the saloon-keeper sell whisky to the German when the latter can get beer. You may call intemperance a vice, and I shall not stop to quarrel with you, but I shall giv a much broader signification to the word than do you. Intemperance is an abnormal, unbalanced use of the forces of our organization, and may take the form of over-eating, overworking, late hours, excessiv, insufficient, or non-magnetic sexual intimacies, expensiv, improper clothing, over-stimulation of the mental and nervous organisms, indulgence in the use of alcohol, tobacco, opium, drugs, medicins, etc., etc. All these are evidences of man's ignorance of how to use his mental and physical powers. How are you going to work to remove these evils? Hav you anything but force to offer? Must you ever insultingly assume that he who is not a prohibitionist is necessarily intemperate. Do you not thus show your own intemperate zeal without judgment, and good intentions without scientific analysis?

It is asserted that intemperance is the cause of every crime. If by intemperance is meant only the use of stimulating drinks, nothing could be wider of the truth than this. Every passion of man, his every desire, every unbalanced faculty, has helped to swell the crime list. National pride! count its windrows of slain. Ambition! view its fields of carnage. Revenge! how many daggers has it sharpened, how many vials of poison uncorked! Avarice! in mercy's name, lift not the veil. Jealousy! see its victims bleed, hear their anguished moans. Parental ignorance and inharmony bequeathing to children malformed bodies and erratic brains! go gaze upon the scaffolds they hav built.

Now, bring on your statute law specific for all these diseases. What good will you accomplish? None; on the contrary, you will postpone by many a day the deliverance of man from the slavery of antenatal influences and bad habits.

You are misdirecting the energies of good men and women. You are seeking to advance by going backwards. You would kill a tree by trying to lop off a few branches. You seek to destroy effects while the causes remain. You think to make your neighbor temperate and moral by standing guard over him with a policeman's club. In short, you would make man an intelligent, self-respecting, duty-doing being by taking from him liberty. Your ideal man is an automaton. With the best of intentions you are doing all possible to destroy manly independence, to murder volition, to make us all puppets, to wither the hopes of the race. If you succeed you will hav established a terribly dangerous precedent. There is no logical halting-place between you and the czar, the pope. Your methods are theirs. You all fear reason and science. You all distrust liberty.

Prohibitory legislation is antagonistic to the spirit of Liberalism. Its weapons are in no sense those of Freethought. Facts, reason, better conditions, right generation, justice, love, liberty, these shall circumscribe day by day the domain of intemperance in all its multiform phases. Your laws hav retarded, retard, and always will retard the work of the reformer. Goodness is impossible without liberty.

It is my settled conviction that the use of intoxicants is in every way injurious. Others do not think so. How shall I convince them? By force? Is that the reason of the Freethinker?

There are tens of thousands of men who use certain of these alcoholic beverages. They would be better off without them. But they do not so think. They are good fathers, honest neighbors, industrious, frugal, kindly. They regard any attempt to prescribe for them their food or drink as a vicious interference with their rights, as indeed it is. Do you suppose that you will in any way better their opinion if you make them any more willing to listen to you as a teacher when you shall hav succeeded in ravishing from them their liberties? Would such a conclusion be natural? Or would you not naturally suppose that by such action you would build between you and them a fence impossible to pass, rendering futil every attempt of yours to mingle with and educate them? Such will invariably be the outcome of your proscriptiv methods if they hav in their veins the red life-currents of men. If they quietly submit and kiss their jailer's hand, they are only fit to be slaves, and slaves they will be. When you resort to force you confess yourself beaten in the arena of science, reason, and love, and thus establish your incompetence to deal with so tremendous a problem.

Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Dec. 20, 1881.

Elmina Says "It's Just the Thing."

Liberal Friends: When I sit down to a feast of good things I always want others to share it. I hav just received a little fifteen-cent pamphlet called "Genesis Revised," purporting to be the only authentic history of creation. It is uniquely illustrated and the story is told in an off-hand, easy, conversational style, and is so full of quaint and ridiculous expressions that one feels like roaring with laughter and bursting with fun at every paragraph. It is certainly the most comic and entertaining document that has ever emanated from the prolific brain and fertil pen of its author, J. R. Monroe, of the Seymour Times. If I was able I'd buy fifty copies at once and send them out on a missionary enterprise whose fruits would be of incalculable benefit to the cause of common sense against superstition. Address J. R. Monroe, Seymour, Ind.

Thankfulness.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A sudden and painful accident has thrown me on my back for near two months past, and given leisure for thoughts. I trust I may be pardoned for laying some of them before your readers. Imagin a party of three in a carriage behind a spirited team. Everything about wagon and team seemed safe and strong. A rapid drive of two miles brought us to the brow of a steep hill; descending with some speed, suddenly, as all such things will happen, the tongue dropped in front, leaving no method of holding the wagon save with the rear end of the horses. Now spirited horses are averse to holding wagons in that way, and I don't see who could be so heartless as to blame them. I could not even at that time, although knowing the peril was imminent. It seemed but a flash until the tongue was in the ground and the vehicle was raised in front and came down with a crash. In a moment more I found myself mingled with the débris of broken wheels, torn cushions, and wood splinters. Upon straightening up I found part of me was loose, dangling, which soon forced the painful conclusion that I had a broken leg. My friends escaped with painful bruises. Assistance came and we were soon back to town. After the good surgeon had neatly and swiftly performed his part in the program, and while I was lying upon my back vainly trying to get ease and rest, my good friends congratulated me on my providential escape from sudden death, and told me I had great reason to be "thankful" that it was not my neck instead of my leg. Of course I made strenuous effort to feel thankful, but thoughts would come up and hinder the "work of grace," I presume. I kept thinking that if he, Providence, really did save my neck on that occasion, how easily he might hav kept that tongue from dropping and so saved all the suffering, all the loss of time, and even saved himself this criticism on his manner of doing things in this world. I agree with Mr. Babcock, who says, "We want a God who, when he sees a chance to help a fellow, will pitch in and not wait to be asked." But I must not expect if he refuses assistance to so many hapless creatures in Michigan and the president of a great nation, that he will stop the harp music to prevent a little smash-up on the road.

We are told that we are to be thankful for whatever is sent. Though he lead us through fire itself, we are still to praise him. I wonder if any of the poor Michigan sufferers felt like singing, "Glory to God, who hath just brought us through a fiery ordeal!" It does look from this standpoint that he rather enjoys seeing them squirm. It does seem as if the preachers are right. He is so fond of suffering here in this world, I would not be in the least surprised if he had a good warm fire for those of us who are not "thankful" for the pain and anguish he so liberally bestows here. One cannot resist the conclusion that he enjoys the suffering of his creatures when we see how abundantly it is supplied.

Can we love him? Ought we to praise him? Has the sufferer any reason to be thankful? Say what we may, the theologies, dead and living, hav given no quieting answer. Spiritism does not solve the problem. Even with its sweet promis of summer land and roses, the blank, blue, and stony suffering of this remains. Materialism offers nothing better. I can only exclaim with Tulliver in "The Mill on the Floss," "It is all a mystery." What to our mind to-day seems best, to-morrow may be the worst. Whatever may be the power ruling the universe, I fail, even with effort, to be thankful. L. E. Huggins.

An Agnostic in Court.

The attention of the county court was occupied throughout Monday afternoon in the hearing of the cause, Mitchell vs. White. The action was in itself unimportant, but it involved the question of belief in a God and a future state. When the defendant, Albert White, of Orwell took the stand, Mr. James Glenn, counsel for plaintiff, stated that before the witness was sworn he desired to ask him a few questions touching his religious belief.

"Do you believe in God?" inquired the counsel.

"Will you describe to me what you mean to imply by the term God?" said Mr. White.

His honor Judge Hughes here remarked, "You can't ask a man to describe what is indescribable."

"Well," returned witness, "if you can't describe what God is you can't expect me to believe what is indescribable."

The prisoner was then asked by Mr. T. W. Crothers: "Do you believe in a future state of rewards and punishments?"

"I believe in rewards and punishments," replied the witness.

"Do you believe in rewards and punishments in a future state?"

"I don't know anything about a future state."

"Do you believe in eternity?"

To this a similar answer was returned, and his honor remarked, "That being the case, witness is evidently an Agnostic, and I cannot receive the evidence."

Mr. Crothers said he considered it unfortunate that his client should not be able to giv evidence without taking an oath on the Bible.

His honor remarked most emphatically that he did not consider it at all unfortunate. He heard that a judge in Toronto had lately expressed himself in a strain similar to Mr. Crothers—that he regretted the law could not be changed so as to admit of such evidence being given; but he himself entirely disagreed with the learned judge, and believed it was a very fortunate thing that such evidence was not allowed to be given except upon oath sworn on the Bible.

Mr. White, who is a prominent and highly-respected resident of Yarmouth township, then retired, and the case proceeded.

"The Radical Pulpit."

This book comes at an opportune time; just when we want to re-read some of the beautiful utterances of Mr. O. B. Frothingham, a man who has said so many strong, truthful, and soul-stirring things, but who now halts, hesitating whether to stand still, go backward, or progress onward to the beautiful land of the free, whose sunny sheen shines so invitingly and temptingly in the advance.

His "New Song of Christmas" is the first discourse of the volume, and is full of interesting information concerning the origin and uses of this day. He says: "To me the story of the birth of Christ is legendary, it is a myth. We do not believe that such a person as Christ ever lived; . . . that each year that succeeds the years gone by will bring some new acquisition of light and power is to me the grandest quality to glorify human nature."

In the discourse on "The Departed Years," he says, "The past has given all you hav; everything is welded together." He shows that each year only adds its own mite to progress and advancement, and that we are what we are of necessity; that if we hav made mistakes we should be consoled by thinking: We did our best. We acted under the circumstances. There was nothing else we could do. We did it; we were obliged to do it."

In the "Consolations of Rationalism" he asks if faith in a hereafter can be proved. He says: "I hav been a clergyman more than thirty years; I hav attended death-beds; I hav waited upon funerals; I hav seen people in all stages of disappointment, despondency, and grief; I hav attended the funerals of old men and women, of men and women in middle life, of children who sat upon life's threshold. It was always the same thing. I hav never found people who welcomed death because it sprung open the golden door. I hav never stood in the chamber of sorrow, or in any company of mourners at a funeral where there was the least gleam of joy. . . . Yet they believed in the hereafter. If I had breathed a misgiving of the hereafter in their presence they would hav been horrified and shocked. Yet their faith, all faith, rests as a hazy tradition upon the mind. It is accepted as sufficient in our glad hours; it is praised when we are talking upon theological question, but when the hour comes when this faith is to be the reed we lean on, then this faith, this orthodox belief, the Christian belief, we feel to bend and break under the lightest pressure we trust to it."

And again he says: "Another consolation belongs to the Rationalist; he has not imposed upon him the task of saving his own soul. Those who hav not reflected upon it hav no conception of the misery, the pain, and the sorrow, the wretched agony, that comes from that responsibility. . . . Our concern is not to save our souls, but to do our duty as life goes on. We can consequently train ourselvs, cultivate our faculties, use our opportunities, enjoy our privileges, and make the most of society and existence without any awful misgivings of the future, such as torment the Christian. We can lie down to rest; we can sit under the shade of the trees; we can laugh and sing; we can enjoy our time to the fullest extent; we can use our gifts; we can drink in the strength of nature from the gladness of the morning, from the peace of the evening, from conversation with a friend; in a thousand ways we can draw in the refreshing water of life to cool our thirst."

There are so many suggestiv ideas that I hav only space to quote a few specimens of the grand and beautiful whole. He clings to the word religion, but it is with him a word put to new meanings and new usages, though it is to be hoped the future will show him that with the old meaning the word should go as well.

The closing discourses of the book are by Prof. Felix Adler, and these too are full of gems of thought and fresh Liberal utterances, one of which is: "You who liv in the light know that justice requires that you shall be just; that purity demands that you shall be pure, and that love calls you to lift up the stricken and helpless poor. By its fruit a tree is known, and by its works shall Liberalism be known. Let us strive to liv this higher life that is expressed in our triple idea of justice, purity, and love. That is what we hav to offer the church, which is now dying and which no God can ever again save."

It is a beautiful book, full of beautiful things. One more treasure added to the Liberal catalog of good books for good men and women.

"Oh! may the heart of every man,
By truth be rendered free;
And brought into the perfect law
Of love and liberty."

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 66.

741. Is it not a very extraordinary thing that a book like the New Testament, admitted to be of divine origin should have remained so long in obscurity, and at last be only saved from everlasting obscurity through the presumption of a cunning, interested, and despotic priest, and finally determined to be genuine by a mere dicta of a council of priests equally as deceitful and arbitrary as himself? I cannot believe that such a set of men are capable of settling for the world what must be accepted as the inspire word of God.

742. It is a pertinent question to ask, How did that council of Laodicea obtain the wisdom to decide that the books composing the canon of the New Testament were the true word of God? Did they really receive light from heaven to guide them in this blind species of labor? No, this could not be, for we are informed that they decided the matter by vote; decided he matter as a town meeting of the voters of a township would elect supervisors, select men, and a path-master to direct the repairing of the highway. Had the vote chanced to hav been different from what it was, that which is now esteemed the word of God would have been denounced as false, and that which is now denounced as spurious would have been revered as God's inspired word from the celestial regions. William Penn, the celebrated and honored Quaker writer, in arguing that the Bible cannot be the rule of faith and practice, says: "I demand of our adversaries if they are well assured of those men who first collected, embodied, and declared them [the scriptures] authentic, by a public canon which we read was in the Council of Laodicea, held three hundred and sixty years after Christ. I say how do they know that those men rightly discovered the true from the spurious? Now, sure it is that some of the scriptures taken in by one council was rejected by another for apocryphal, and that which was left out by the former for apocryphal was taken in by the latter for canonical. Now, visible it is that they contradict each other, and as true that they hath erred respecting the present belief" (Penn's Works, vol. i). I regard Penn's opinion more valuable than scores of those who have had more authority in deciding what the canon should be.

743. That it may be known what kind of men these councils were composed of who decided for us which should be accepted by us as the word of God, some opinions of competent men may be called to mind. Upon the authority of no less a Christian writer than Tindal, in his work, "Rights of the Christian Church," St. Gregory Nazianzen, in his letter to Procopius, says that he "fled all assemblies of bishops because he never saw a good and happy end of any council, but that they did rather increase than lessen the evil; that the love of contention and ambition always overcomes their reason." Further on he reiterates his determination of never going to any council, because nothing is to be heard but geese and cranes who fight without understanding one another." Can any sensible person believe that such a body of men would be the kind to decide the question as to which is God's word? I cannot believe it.

744. As further proof of the character of the Christian councils, let Mr. Tindal have a word more to say. Of the Council of Nice he says: "And if the accusations and libels which the bishops at the Council of Nice gave in of one another to the emperor were now extant, in all probability we should have such rolls of scandal that few would have much reason to boast of the first Ecumenical Council, where, with such heat, passion, and fury the bishops fell foul on one another, insomuch had not the emperor by a trick burnt their church memorials, probably they must have broke up in confusion. After that Council was over the bishops made so great a bustle and disturbance, and were so unruly, that the good emperor was forced to tell them that if they would not be more quiet and peaceable for the future he would no longer continue his expedition against the Infidels, but must return to keep them in order." "Indeed," says Tindal, "the confusion and disorder were so great amongst them, especially in their synods, that it sometimes came to blows, as, for instance, Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, cuffed and kicked Flavianus, patriarch of Constantinople (at the second synod of Ephesus), with that fury that within three days after he died." Comment on such conduct is unnecessary. Can there be any who believe such men fit ones to deliberate and decide on heavenly things, to settle for thousands what they must believe, and that they have the wisdom and discernment to point out the narrow pathway to heaven? I certainly cannot. They are the last class of men worthy to be taken as guides, leader, and interpreters.

745. As to the honesty of the early Christian councils, our author, Mr. Tindal, thus discourses: "For though they are most obstinate as to power, they are most flexible as to faith, and in their councils complimented the emperor with whatever creeds they had a mind to, and never scrupled to recant what they had before enacted, or to re-enact what they had before recanted. Nay, so very variable were they that St. Hilary, bishop of Poictiers, says that 'since the Nicene synod we do nothing but write creeds; that while we fight about words, while we raise questions about novelties, while we quarrel about things doubtful and about authors, while we contend in parties, there is almost none that is Christ's. We decree every year of the Lord a new creed concerning God; nay, every change of the moon our faith is altered.'" The following fact, mentioned by Pappius in his Synodicum, should also be read in connection with the foregoing. He gives the information of the manner in which the true gospels were selected from the false at that memorable council. "This was done," says he, "by placing all the books under a communion table, and, upon the prayers of the council the inspired books jumped upon the table, while the false ones remained under." Who can longer have doubts about the purity and honesty of those councils, or the certainty of the inspiration of the scriptures?

746. After the Council of Laodicea, in the year 363, two other great councils were held, one in 406 and the other in 680. The council of 406 rejected several books deemed canonical by the council of 363, but the council of 680 restored them again to their former standing. It can be seen how in this way the word of God was toyed and played with by these Christian councils, as a little girl dresses her doll, or as older children play battledoor and shuttlecock. Let those doubt who choose that the New Testament published by the learned Evanson in 1807 contains only the gospel of St. Luke, Acts, ten of Paul's epistles and Revelation, and even those, as abundantly admitted, abound with manifest and numerous interpolations. The gospels of Matthew, Mark, and John he contemptuously rejects as spurious productions of the second century. The Swedenborgians admit only four gospels and Revelation. The German Baptists and the followers of Servetus are asserted to not receive the gospel of Matthew; and the learned Prof. Bauer, in 1803, denounced it as an actual "forgery." The second epistle to Timothy and to Titus were rejected by Dr. Eichorn, and the first epistle to Timothy by Dr. Schleiermacher. The gospel of St. John was rejected by Dr. Bretschneider, and the first chapter of Matthew and Luke were repudiated by the Unitarians, in their monthly repository as 'absolute falsities." The Protestants say the Catholic Bible abounds with innumerable gross errors and with shocking barbarity of style, with a great obscuration of the sense of the inspired writers. Still this Bible was pronounced authentic by the Council of Trent, and millions have accepted it as the divine and uncorrupted word of God. The Protestant Bible, on the other hand, is denounced by the Catholics in the strongest terms. In 1816 the pope declared it to be "pregnant with errors." Even Broughton, a Protestant, repudiated the accepted version as "perverting the text of the Old Testament in 848 places, and causing millions to reject the New and to run into everlasting flames." As to the present version, prominent Catholics say, "it ought to be abhorred to the depths of hell." Is it strange that doubts exist as to the integrity of the Christian Bible?

747. Educated Christians admit numerous translations and interpolations. Calmet, the distinguished Bible scholar, declared that the seventh and eighth verses of the fifth chapter of John's first epistle "are not in any ancient Bible." This interpolation was justly pronounced "an important stroke to support the doctrine of the trinity." Capellus says he was thirty-six years in writing the books in which he detects the numerous errors and frauds in the Protestant Bible. Dr. John Mill, an English divine, says that thirty years' researches upon the New Testament alone enabled him to detect the enormous number of eighty thousand different readings of that book. Even the best sentence that Jesus is credited with, Love thy neighbor as thyself, has been pronounced an interpolation. Origen, the Christian Father, and who also may be regarded as the father of our version, used this language: "If indeed there was no disagreement in other copies it would be irreligious to suspect that expression was interpolated, and not pronounced by our savior. But now, alas! what with the blunders of transcribers, what with the impious temerity of correcting the text, what with the licentiousness of others who interpolate and expurgate just what they please, it is plain the copies do strangely disagree." Cooper says it has been proved by a record in the Cronicon of Muis that a general alteration of the four gospels took place in the sixth century by order of the Emperor Anastatius, who decreed that "the holy gospels as written, Idiotis Evangelistis, are to be corrected and amended." This fact is mentioned by Scaliger, and Dr. Mill vouches for the truth of the record, and says Messala was consul at the time. Cooper remarks: "Well might the New Testament be compared to Lord Chancellor Eldon's silk stocking that was darned all over with worsted until there was no silk remaining." Probably these remodelings were much like the revision of our own time. So many revisions of what was imperfect and corrupt at first are not calculated to improve the general confidence in their immutability.

748. It should be here stated that all the copies of the New Testament books that have been seen by any known Christian are merely copies. If any one saw the originals, nobody knows who he was or when it was. Michaelis, the distinguished German professor, as translated by Bishop Marsh, says that the most ancient manuscripts of this portion of the word of God were written so lately as the sixth century, that is, nearly five hundred years later than the originals are claimed to have been written. The originals of the New Testament, indeed, "have not been seen," says Michaelis, "by any writer extant, nor do they record that any one of their contemporaries had seen them. The holy Fathers themselves do not profess to have seen the originals." He further observes: "None of the most early Fathers, as Ignatius or Tertullian, appeal to the originals, or had seen them." Prof. Du Pin, in his "History of the Canon," remarks: "We do not find that the two greatest men of the church, I mean Origen and St. Hierom, who had searched tho ancient copies of the scriptures with so much care and diligence, and have visited so many churches in the East, have ever spoken of the originals of the New Testament, written with the hands of the apostles, which they would not have failed to do if there had been any in their times." He continues thus: "But it hath been made to appear elsewhere that it is no wonder that the primitive Christians, who had not a regular body of a state in which they lived, and whose assemblies were, on the contrary, furiously disturbed by the Jews and pagans, had lost the originals of their books." "Nay," says he, "in the primitive ages, there was no talk of reading the scriptures in their originals; any copy whatever, provided it were used in the orthodox churches, might be relied upon, as if it had been the first original written with the hands of the apostles." The Rev. Dr. Campbell, in his work on "The Four Gospels," p. 117, says: "The autographs (the originals) it is acknowledged on all hands are nowhere to be found. What we have in their stead is the copies of copies—through how many successors it is impossible to say—which were originally taken from these autographs. The Rev. Dr. Haug, in his "Introduction to the New Testament," goes still further; he affirms that "it is probable there could have been no autographs of the New Testament at all." Since, then, the originals of the New Testament are absolutely lost, and, according to Michaelis and Du Pin, have not been seen by any writer extant, or any of their contemporaries, it is very plain there is nothing to depend upon but the copies of copies that have been handed down to us. It is, indeed, a matter of great doubt, in the first place, whether there were any original manuscripts by the apostles, and in the next place, after the great number of copies that have been made, with all the changes and interpolations that have taken place, whether any thing of the original has been preserved.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed please find $5 for the Round-the-World trip, to be sent to C. Dimmick, of this place. So the good work goes on. I do not see many subscriptions in your letter columns from this place, but I will say this, "There is an influence at work here that will bear fruit by and by, and don't you forget it." "Truth is mighty and must prevail." This is a superstitious, priest-ridden community, but the Christian bubble will burst after a while. I shall send for Bennett's travels as soon as I can spare the money.

Yours truly, E. W. CAUNCILMAN.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find my check for $8—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year and $5 to help bring brother Bennett home. One year ago I could hardly afford to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I did take it, and hav found that I cannot afford to do without it. It is a truth finder, and its pages are full of encouragement to all who are willing and will try to do right. I wish you a happy New Year and many of them. Very truly yours, W. F. HORTON.

GENEVA, NEB., Dec. 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed order for $8—$5 for the Round-the World trip and $3 to apply on my subscription. Please change my paper from Alpine, Neb., to the above address and oblige. There are lots of Liberals in this part of the West, but they are mostly of the do-nothing kind that think the majority of mankind are so bad that it is best to hav them hell-seared once a week in order to make them keep the peace, and the result is, but little progress is made in the cause. I tell you, Mr. Editor, if all the Liberals in the country were once aroused they would be a mighty power in the land.

Your friend, T. J. WHITZEL.

GARNETT, KAN., Dec. 20, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find $3 for the paper for another year, for I find my tab will soon demand renewal. I can't do without the good old paper much better than I can my daily rations at my table. TRUTH SEEKER No. 48 failed to reach me for some cause; don't know if it has gone off on a side track and a missionary tour. If so, all right, but I want another to keep my file all right. Would be glad to send "V" for Round-the-World trip; will yet if possible. Yours for more truth,

C. E. DEWEY.

P. S.—Inclosed find $8, including the within $3—$5 of which secures my "star." Send books when out to within address. C. E. D.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find my "V" for Round-the World fund. Excuse procrastination, which has caused me to be almost too late. Yours truly,

WM. CALAWAY, M.D.

MARSHALL, KAS., Dec. 11, 1881

MR. EDITOR: I had almost despaired of being able to contribute toward the Round-the-World fund. But good luck has it, and here is five dollars' worth of the "root of all evil," just enough to get the great work, also $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year.

There are no Liberals in this "neck o' woods" except myself. The Baptists are a majority, and fine times they hav. One good brother went up on the river goose-hunting on Sunday. His excuse was, he thought it was Saturday. This was a good one, and perfectly satisfied the anxious brothers and sisters of the church.

It is said their herder is a personal acquaintance of Col. Ingersoll, and that the colonel told him that he (Ingersoll) was no Infidel. Look out for an exposure. This will be a terrible slam on our venerable Bob.

Hoping to soon see my name on the roll of honor with a star to illumin it, I remain most respectfully yours,

S. V. MULKEY.

NIMASILA, O., Dec. 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find three dollars, which will pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the current year up to June, 1882.

I think that by the time D. M. Bennett gets around on this side of this ball I will be able to buy his book. If it is not too late, I wish that Mr. Bennett would examin while he is on the flat side of God's footstool all about that rock which the old woman alleges this earth stands on and reaches all the way down. It must be on the flat side, as the oval side has been pretty thoroughly explored by quacks. We hav five churches in this town. The Lutherans started to grind out a small grist last night. They hav not had any grinding to do for the last three years. Next a few followers of the old lunatic Albright, who started business about a century ago in the neighborhood of Harrisburg, Pa.; but they hav forgotten the name of their founder, and now call themselvs evangelists. They hav been out of power to grind for five years, but they think they hav a grist or two on hand now. Next the old reformed and new reformed. They hav also forgotten the name of their savior and founder. Some think that they started out about twenty-five centuries ago. Another thinks it was later—as late as the time of the Reformation, and think that it was an old Swiss by the name of Zwingilus or Zwingilii who was crucified, or died in some other way, at the time of the fight between the factions of the followers of Luther and Zwinglius. They hav much more money than love for one another. They would not be caught in one another's churches. The Campbellites think they were always a church, and date their origin back to the year one, claiming a relationship to the fathers of the first century. They think that Campbell was resurrected merely for the purpose of reviving and renewing their claim of relationship of those old fathers, hence they call themselvs disciples of the Jesus who lived, as their old brothers tell them, at the beginning of this era. They believe in enough water to reach around them in baptism. They do their baptizing below town in a mill-pond. The owner of the pond has now forbad them to baptize in it any more, as it killed all the fish. S. TRANSUE.

TUSTIN, MICH., Dec. 18, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Can it be possible that all the people of this new country, except D. R. Marvin, William Shuck, and S. B. Root are so righteous that they will not help support the best of all papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER? Those letters from our old veteran I consider super-excellent. If you will send me some of those colored posters I will try to get a few more names crossed off the Lamb's Book of Life and add to that number who think and act for themselvs, I will pledge $1 each year for five years for the establishment of an orphan home under Liberal auspices. Who will receive the money and make a start in the work? There will be enough to contribute to such a fund if some influential person will just make the start. With a good wish and kind word for all Liberalists, I remain, Your humble servant,

S. B. ROOT.

GREEN HILL, O., Dec. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6.25, to be applied as below.

I was in hopes that I could hav made a little canvass in behalf of our darling pet. I think I could hav several new subscribers, but the smallpox broke out in the town of East Rochester about six weeks ago, and the people got so terribly cranked about it that this truth seeker had to stay at home. It was in that town and vicinity that I wanted to do my canvassing. It is subsiding now. I suppose the good people hav prayed to Mumbo Jumbo, as they hav two churches there, and he has sent some of his pitying angels down, who hav banished it as St. Patrick did the frogs. Guiteau has got our Christians in a pretty bad fix. They are strong for divine inspiration and bitterly opposed to it. They remind me of the Dutchman who went out to hunt his old sow. He came to the river and told Jake to "make the river across and go up dat side, and I goes up on dis side, and, by hanks, we finds hlm on both sides."

Yours for truth, ENOCH WICKERSHAM.

Liberal News.

MR. BENNETT'S present address is care of Oriental Bank Corporation, Colombo, Ceylon, Asia.

IN a recent discussion between Mr. Bradlaugh and Dr. McCann Mrs. Besant was in the chair.

E. F. BOYD, author of "Uncle Sam and Americus," is writing a review of Henry George's "Progress and Poverty."

WE had a very pleasant call from George Chainey when in town last week. He says that his paper, This World, will be a success. It ought to.

RABBI BROWNE advertises himself as "the man of whom Col. Ingersoll is afraid." We would like to see that man, but we are afraid Browne is not he.

MRS. AMELIA H. COLBY will lecture next Sunday morning and evening at the Harvard Rooms, corner of Forty-second street and Sixth avenue, this city.

THE Rising Sun, a Liberal and Spiritualist paper of Portland, Or., has been obliged to suspend on account of the ill-health of its editor, Mrs. Lucy L. Brown.

E. C. WALKER writes that the census authorities hav applied to him for statistics about the National Liberal League. Why don't they go to headquarters?

CHAS. E. TOWNSEND, of Locust Valley, Long Island, N. Y.; and George Stephens, of Moline, Ill., hav recently taken life memberships in the National Liberal League.

WE regret to learn that Ella E. Gibson has been very ill. We trust that she will speedily recover, and that her friends and correspondents will be indulgent with her.

GEORGE STANDRING, of London, has issued a short biography of Col. Ingersoll. The desire to know all about the eloquent orator is no less strong in England than in this country.

A NEW auxiliary Liberal League has been chartered at New Boston, Ill.; H. H. Roberts, Secretary. J. R. Baker, of Keithsburg, lectured there, and F. F. Follett did the drumming up.

A MONUMENT to Victor Hugo is to be erected in his island home of Guernsey by the inhabitants, who are much attached to him. The Two Worlds says Hugo is an outspoken Spiritualist.

A GREENBACK paper, House and Home, has been reduced from pound to ounce rates of postage, because it contained one of Dr. E. B. Foote's advertisments. The Defense Committee are sitting on the case.

THE Banner of Light has a "God's Poor Fund." The gifts don't go to God, as might be supposed, but to the poor. Would our esteemed Spiritual contemporary not do better to drop the God and just call it the poor fund?

ONE of our items had too much "and" in it last week. It should read that the secretary of the National Liberal League "is receiving many letters from Liberal, Antichristian Spiritualists, making overtures to unite forces to secure a free secular state as the first thing in order."

FRIEND SEAVER had a very handsome Christian present in the shape of a Webster's Unabridged. It was presented by his almost life-time friend, J. P. Mendum, and his younger ones, J. A. O'Malley and Ernest Mendum. A neat mahogany stand for it to rest upon accompanied the cumbrous volume.

T. A. BLAND, at one time editor and publisher of the Ladies' Magazine, has started a paper at Washington, D. C., called the Spectator. It is an organ for Dr. Bland to manifest himself through, and will be (so we are informed by the doctor), thoroughly independent in politics and religion. Success to the publisher!

THE SOCIETY OF HUMANITY has inaugurated a lecture course for every Sunday evening for fourteen weeks, beginning to-morrow evening, January 8th. The lectures will be given at Science Hall, 141 8th street, at 8 o'clock punctually. The opening discourse is by T. B. Wakeman, on "'The Religion of Humanity the Only Practical Solution and Gospel of Human Life." It will be a general outline and statement of all the society's work, while the lectures to follow will be more devoted to special departments of the Humanitarian philosophy.

BOYS musn't pick up rags in New York. It is against the law. One of the "Societies for the Prevention"—made the law. But an Italian boy couldn't read the law. He picked up rags and got caught at the money making business. They put him in a Catholic protectory where he could be prayed, and chanted, and said mass over, and whipped for the sin and wickedness of youthful rag-picking. But the parents couldn't spare the boy to go to that school. They wanted him for home consumption; so they applied to the law firm of Wakeman & Latting to get him out of the Protectory. Mr. T. B. Wakeman applied in person to the "Prevention" folks, but they wouldn't let him out. Then he wrote them a letter, and then they thought they would let him out, and they did. This is Mr. Wakeman's second Italian boy, rag-picking case. He bids fair to build up a profitable line of rag-picking business.

Christian professors must be more careful of their judgments upon the Liberals, Freethinkers, and Infidels of to-day, or they will be apt to merit, in a way very displeasing to themselvs, the rendering of their acknowledged criterion, the scriptures, "Judge not lest ye be judged." I am led to the consideration of this subject of judgment because there seems to be such a lack of what should be the primest Christian virtue among Christian professors, charity. Among Christians, charity in the judgments of others upon their actions and motivs, and particularly the former, is expected, demanded, whenever a Christian errs. In no case, where an Infidel errs, does there seem to be any reason why a Christian should show any lenity or Christian charity. Condemnation is the only resort, and condemnation, whether the Infidel does right or wrong, is the most common of dispensation from so-called Christians.

As Christians liv in houses made of glass, and thin glass, too, they are very assailable subjects, particularly when they attempt to teach Liberals how they should think religiously that they may liv truly religious. Life is the only representativ of true religion. If a man, woman, Christian or Infidel, livs righteously, soberly, and goodly before men, as well as behind men's eyes, his or hers is the right doctrin. Comparisons are worthy to be drawn between the generosity, the charity, the true Samaritan idea in force, between Christians and Infidels. Among my so-called Infidel friends I find an excess of charity, benevolence, temperance, and honesty, according to their minority, numerically speaking, when compared with those professing Christianity. A Christian should be known not so much by his profession as by his excellency of good works, good life. I hav a friend who has been terribly assailed by Christian professors, and there seems to be but little let-up to their aspersions. I will kindly ask all of my Christian brethren to compare the life and testimony among men and women of my Infidel friend, and the very best among the so called religious laity. My friend is not an occupant of a pulpit, nor pew, nor superintendent of Sunday-schools; nor is he an elder, minister, nor bishop; he is simply and solely a free thinker and a free writer of what he thinks is right. I hav known him for more than thirty years to be in all respects what a man among men should be, and barring what many think to be the crime of Infidelity I can scarcely name one among his thousands of persecutors who are as good and acceptable models of what a Christian should be, as this, my Infidel friend.

He is a total abstainer from intoxicating drinks, from the principle of good physiological living. We do not think he has taken the pledge to abstain, so that if he chose to taste lager beer or wine he yet could do so, as he owns he recently did under pressure in Switzerland, and yet keep within the bounds of being practically a teetotaler, and how many best Christians can prove so much for themselvs? He neither smokes nor chews tobacco, and detests its use in any form. As to his sexual morality we believe he stands as pure and on as high a standard, and in many known numerous cases far higher, than his accusers. In short, we know of none who can prove anything against him on this ground, however much may hav been hoped to hatch from a lot of rotten eggs set by an Abbot. Honest to a penny in his dealings, liberal beyond the reason of his purse-strings, truthful as the sunshine, and noble to all, even to an enemy. Let any bring on one of his Christian assailants who can show less soiling and so much of benignity. We profess Christianity, and honestly differ from our friend in many particulars, but this honest difference has not hidden from our view many resplendent virtues in this Infidel which we would be glad to be more fully the possessor of, and wish the same for very many of our very bigoted Christian friends.

We hav not purposed adulation in this article; we would not hav so written of our friend had he been at home, but we would ask of all professing Christianity that, before "dealing damnation round the land" upon any Infidel, they first inform themselvs whether such are as good models of manhood or womanhood as we know D. M. Bennett to be. And without asking the question whether Infidelity has done so much for him, to be sure that inasmuch as we claim Christianity to be superior to Infidel principles, we should present superior fruits in life, worthy of the assertion. G. A. LOMAS.

A Modern Song.

In this broad-breathing age we reach
Deep into fearless act and speech,
Bound to no single ruler save
Truth that is stronger than the grave,
Truth that is brawn and power to us,
Which gave us spirits to worship thus.

We hav outgrown dull fables, mocked
Grim superstitions; we hav locked
Mythology in its antique books
And idols in their cobwebbed nooks;
From this hesperian world we cry
Our passion to the earth and sky.

We long to voice our freedom, we
That are what others died to be;
We gather knowledge where we can,
Defiant of either god or man;
We liv amid the wonders of
The cosmic universe above.

Our hearts are still the hearts of old,
As passionful, and wild, and bold,
As weak and sad; our sins, we know,
Are portion of our flesh, and throw
Their shadow over all our way.
The root of beauty is decay.

Imperfect, mortal, roused to bear
The eternal burden of despair,
Our life is grown about with weeds
That choke the flower of righteous deeds
And love that yearns for ample skies
Most often crawls, and writhes, and dies.

We are not better than the men
Who laughed when Greece was young, or when Rome bore her martial flag unfurled
Along the highroads of the world,
But we are braver for the right
Above the sanguin sword of might.

We hav fought against red slavery, fought
For liberty of the human thought,
And for the kingship of the soul;
We hav flown against the harsh control
Of chance, which may uplift a fool
To an imperial throne and rule;

We hav fought the stalwart fight of truth
With the whole vigor of our youth,
We hav stood for one humanity, stood
Sublimely for the common good;
We hav striven to make the name of man
Diviner since the world began.

We hav risen from ignorance which debased
Men, when their reason was outraced
By the blind fury of the mob—
When to think justly was to rob
A pope or priestman of the right
To gag some clinging acolyte.

We hav risen from ignorance, we hav claimed
A faith and glory once unnamed,
A faith that whoso livs shall know
Whatever wisdom can bestow,
That Nature and her works belong
To the whole world, like speech or song.

We stand within our century, here
Where the black fogs of ages clear
Where æons and peoples meet—we tread
The earth with prouder heart and head,
And move by many a skyward slope
Toward the eternal hills of hope

Creeds totter as we pass, and dreams
Are drawn to air like shallow streams.
We cast aside the old beliefs
That weighed upon our hearts like griefs;
We are iconoclasts, and joy
Inspires us when our hands destroy.

We break, we kill, we mar the grace
Wreathed on the shams of commonplace;
We peer beneath the veil that hides
The lust and flame of hollow prides,
We strike religions which are still
The Juggernauts of human will.

Yet we build nobly, for we raise
New watch-towers for the unborn days.
And if we war with time and life
And the unknowable God, our strife
Cuts sharp for justice; every stroke
Is aimed at some enslaving yoke.

We dream of no millennium, we
Who know what dark adversity,
What struggle and what anguish tear
The heart and lay its pathos bare.
We know that men shall toil with fate
While earth has fire for love and hate.

Yet we foresee that, mad or blind,
We solve the riddle of the mind
Even as we go, and that our lives
Mount by some law which calmly thrives
Beyond us like a star; we feel
The spur of an immortal zeal.

Nay, we shall hold our way, and sing
Of freedom and the recurrent spring,
And learn what sweeter truths we may
Of the wide night or brighter day,
Yet neither falter, faint, nor doubt
Till life is crushed forever out.

Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. OPEN LETTER TO

Anthony Comstock

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN,

SIR: I hav before me a seven-paged open letter, addressed to myself, intended for publication in all the evening and morning papers, copies of which. I am prepared to prove, were sent to every daily and several weekly papers, the publishers of which refused to publish it, consigning the precious product of your labors to the waste paper basket. For this I am truly sorry, as it would hav given me an admirable opportunity to show the public the true inwardness of the man who could pen such a letter, and yet claim to be a Christian and a protector of the public from the vicious members of society. A more vicious letter could not be penned, and the evidence of malice crops out in every sentence. You first claim that the courts honorably acquitted you. If they did, then I know nothing of the words honorable acquittal. You were arrested for publishing a malicious libel, and taken in the charge of an officer before the magistrates. You then waived examination. If you had written truthfully, why were you afraid of examination? I was present in the court to confront you on your vile charge. You were silent.

After the lapse of several weeks I received an order from Judge Smith's court to attend such court respecting my charge against you, and believing that you would submit to an examination and giv some excuse for your act, I went, accompanied by over fifty witnesses, so that a special court had to be set aside for my special case against you. Well, let us examin as to what followed. I stood there without counsel, ready to defend my order of arrest. I was strong in the proof of my charge against you, and did not require an attorney to quibble on points of law. You, on the other hand, had an attorney—a man in whom any person may trust their case as a legal adviser, and outside the law I hav reason to know that Mr. Tenney, your solicitor, is a gentleman and a noble-hearted man. He must hav felt seriously the weakness of your case, as set forth in your libelous letter, and therefore, as an act of charity toward you, advised you not to submit to an examination. He, good fellow, by special pleading, decided to take exception on points of law, and attempted to show that not the spirit and intent of your libelous letter should be gone into, but the actual wording only should be considered, and that therefore the same should be adjudged as a privileged communication, and on this ground pleaded for a dismissal. This I objected to, whereupon your solicitor proposed that a brief be prepared, setting forth the reasons why my complaint against you should be dismissed. I then stated in the presence of that court, that all I required was a full investigation into the facts. It was then arranged that the District Attorney should take charge of the case, as prosecuting counsel on behalf of the people against Anthony Comstock, I being promised at that time that such investigation should be made on the following Wednesday. But, feeling that there was some crooked business going on, and an attempt being made to frustrate justice, I employed one of our best attorneys, and he wrote a letter to the Judge, to the District Attorney, and your attorney for copy or nature of such brief. Not only so, but myself and attorney applied at Jefferson Market Police Court next day, and we were told that Justice Solon Smith had gone into the country, and would not be back until Monday following, the court officer to whom we spoke intimating that as the Comstock case was in the hands of Justice Solon Smith, nothing would be done until his return. Picture, therefore, my astonishment upon receiving a notice from the court that the case had been dismissed without an investigation into the facts which led to the writing of your letter, neither myself nor one of my witnesses being called, and yet you hav in your letter the audacity to tell the public that you were honorably acquitted. May heaven save the public when such honorable acquittals shall follow the publication of such vile letters as that penned by you to hundreds of my patients! So much for your "honorable acquittal." Now, as to your having evaded arrest or not, the facts are these: I did not dream of having you arrested until after I had written my letter to you, which appeared in all the newspapers. I called at your office personally three or four times, as did also my half-brother, David Cotter. We were each told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, and would not be back for a week; but on being told by persons on Nassau street that you were seen in the immediate neighborhood not long after my calling, I felt that you were evading me, and deliberately refusing to giv me the names of those whom you pretended had made statements against me. It was your thus evading me which caused me to take criminal proceedings against you, and forthwith instruct counsel to sue out a warrant against you for criminal libel. After such warrant was in the hands of the officer, such officer and several of my witnesses sought you at your office. They were told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, as I had before been told. On the morning of your arrest my half-brother, David Cotter, called at your office, in response to a telegram received by me. He was then told that you were away in the country. He went straight from your office to that of Howe & Hummel, and there met a private detectiv who offered there and then to disclose the whereabouts of Anthony Comstock, if the $100 reward, which I had offered for his arrest, should be given him. This was promised, and David Cotter then went and apprised the officer who held the warrant, and they went in company to your office, when they were jointly told by persons sitting there that you were away and they did not know when you would return; whereupon the officer, acting upon the information given by the detectiv above named, proceeded to a room in the upper part of the building wherein several voices were heard. The door was opened in response to the knocking of the officer, when a number of gentlemen were seen sitting around a table as if in committee. Anthony Comstock was inquired for, and denied being there. Upon retiring voices were heard in a room close by. Inquiry was made if Anthony Comstock was within. The person who opened the door replied that Anthony Comstock was not there, when the door was closed. My half-brother, who was waiting in the lobby, made a ruse as if running down stairs, the officer, all the time standing outside, beside the door. The same person who had before opened the door opened it again. The officer, by a rapid movement of the foot, kept the door open and then walked in and arrested yourself, Anthony Comstock. If this was not hiding from arrest, I fail to understand what hiding means, and as you hav in your open letter mentioned the fact of my having offered one hundred dollars reward, and that I had refused to pay the person giving the information, I beg leave here to state that the hundred dollars was paid to the detectiv in the presence of several witnesses, one of whom was a merchant and manufacturer in your immediate neighborhood of Nassau street. So much for your arrest. Was it with or without evasion?

Now, as to the next portion of your open letter: You say there is a law prohibiting the transmission of letters and circulars concerning schemes to deceive and defraud the public or obtain money by false pretenses through the mails. You knew very well when you were writing that sentence that it had no application whatever to my case, inasmuch as the following open letter to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you, offering every physician or scientific man a free entry into my factory and consulting rooms, and in the same letter offering five thousand dollars' worth of my goods to the poor of Brooklyn. Why did you not avail yourself of the offer and hav called at my consulting rooms and manufactory for inquiry before writing your libelous letter to the hundreds of my patients? You could hav no excuse as to time and place, for this reason, viz., that my establishment is one of the most prominent in Brooklyn, and in close proximity to your own residence, so that nothing but malice aforethought could hav induced you to hav written such a letter, while the following offer to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you in the circular or pamphlet from which you obtained the names of my patients to whom you wrote. If you wish to excuse yourself re-read the following:

WM. WILSON'S OPEN LETTER

To the Physicians and the Commissioners of Charities of the City of Brooklyn.

GENTLEMEN—Two years ago in Europe I invented and patented a magnetic appliance for the relief and cure of disease. My system is one that was never before attempted, but its simplicity places it among the many great improvements in the history of science which, after its inception, has caused thousands to wonder why so valuable an addition to the necessities of our race should hav been so long overlooked.

The success of my appliances in the cure of disease in England was such that over THIRTY THOUSAND persons were clothed in them, and not one case of failure when the proper appliances were worn as recommended. In the face of such success in Europe, I determined that the people of America should be made acquainted with the fact. I arrived in Brooklyn only a few months ago and commenced the sale of my goods at No. 465 Fulton street, since which time I hav, in Brooklyn and neighborhood, over a THOUSAND persons wearing my appliances for the diseases above mentioned—all of whom came to me only as a last resort, having failed to get relief from any of their physicians. And these persons were as readily relieved as were those of Europe—NINETY-NINE PER CENT of whom will tell you to-day on application to them that my appliances gave time all the relief promised. A printed list of my clients is at your disposal so that you may satisfy yourself of the truth of the above statement. My proposition therefore is that I hand over to the medical men of Brooklyn FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS worth of my appliances, to be used only on the persons of the sick poor now and likely to be in your charitable institutions and hospitals. The only condition I make is that I myself clothe the patients according to my own judgment and be allowed to retain watchers at my own expense that the patients do not receive any medicin during the wearing of my appliances, and that a proper report be supplied from time to time, so that I, at my own expense, can publish the record of the cures by my appliances. I further wish that every medical man in Brooklyn should call at my manufactory and examin for himself the processes of manufacture and make himself thoroughly acquainted with my system. My factory is open for inspection at all hours to any physician, chemist, or scientist, and in close proximity to my own business premises the same physician may see for themselvs the patients who hav been reliev by my appliances. All physicians and chemists who h examined my goods hav availed themselvs of my inve tion, are to-day wearing my appliances, and recommen ing the same to their patients with marked success.

The aforesaid gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of goods will be delivered from time to time, as agreed upon by a committee of yourselvs, on application to me a few days in advance, stating the disease for which they are required, so that I can supply the best possible form of my invention. Hoping you will avail yourselvs of my offer, I remain, gentlemen, Yours obediently,

WILLIAM WILSON.
No. 465 Fulton st., Brooklyn.

In face of the above letter, what pretense can you find for your conduct? Why did you not giv me the names of the parties whom you pretended had written to you? The fact is, no one did write to you except a lot of conspiring doctors, and to please them you became their tool.

In the next part of your open letter you refer to a letter you sent me, and say as follows: "Why did you, like Ananias and Sapphira of old, keep back a part; why did you not tell the public that I wrote you personally on the 15th of September?" Your memory must be very bad in this particular, or you did not read the newspapers, insomuch that this paragraph appeared in the Truth newspaper on September 20th, under the caption of "The Romance of Anthony Comstock's Arrest, and what Led to It," and directly following the $100 reward, I refer to the very letter which you say I never noticed:

"And the next morning I received a cringing letter, written after the reward was offered, as shown by the postal date on the envelope, Brooklyn postmark, 2 A. M., September 16. Now I was told in his office on the 15th of September, at two in the afternoon, that he had gone away for a week. Who told the lie? Did he order his subordinates so to do, or did they do so of their own accord? The next day, September 16th, my half brother, David Cotter, with the detectives and the court officer, went to Comstock's office. They were told that he was in the country, and did not know when he would return. They were then told that a letter was written by Comstock to William Wilson the night previous. At this the clerks seemed surprised, and said, 'Well, we do not know where he is, nor when he will return.'

"A private detectiv then told my half brother where to find him, and said he was hid away in an upper room in the same building. There the officers went, knocking at one door where voices were heard within, but the door was locked. Then in another room adjacent an attempt was made to discover him among a company of gentlemen sitting apparently in committee, but Comstock could not be seen. A ruse of running down stairs was made, only to retrace their steps just in time to find the door gently open that had before been tried and found locked. The officer slipped his foot between the door jamb and, walking into the room, arrested the great Anthony Comstock. He was taken before Justice Smith and committed in the following words of committal:

"'It appearing to me by the within depositions and statements that the crime therein mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Anthony Comstock guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer and be admitted to bail in the sum of five hundred dollars, and be committed to the warden or keeper of the city prison of the city of New York until he give such bail. SOLON B. SMITH,

"'Dated September 16, 1881.'"

You will therefore see, on referring to your poen letter, that you admit that my first public communication against your act was printed on the 14th day of Sept., and yet you charge me with being like Ananias and Sapphira of old, by keeping back a part. How could I mention, in my communication of the 14th, that which was not written by you until the 15th? But you know very well that the letter you refer to as having been kept back was referred to as above on the 20th day of September, that being the first letter from myself after receiving the letter written by you on the 15th. You therefore utterly fail to show in your open letter that I had kept anything back. In the same open letter you refer to a lawsuit in Ireland between Wetton & Co., and William Wilson, of No. 64½ Patrick street, Cork, and the most malicious act that any man could conceive is the taking the trouble of writing to Ireland for information respecting a man, and when such information is received, telling one-half the story in a open letter to the public and keeping back the other half. This you know you hav done, and I challenge you to publish at your own cost your open letter, as I at my own cost shall publish this. Your malicious act in thus concealing the real nature of the lawsuit between Wetton and myself as rival manufacturers and large employers of labor is an act unworthy of the commonest informer. I hav a deed from the British goverument wherein, on the settlement of that suit as above referred to, such deed binds my opponents to pay me a large sum of money in settlement thereof. Your attorney, Mr. Teuney, or Mr. Colgate, your President, can see that deed whenever they choose to call at my offices. Yet you, in your open letter, attempted to show that I had been guilty of a crime. If this was not vindictiv malice, what was it? Again, in the same open letter, yo u would insinuate that my patent and Edgar Wetton's were the same. Yet you know very well that the circular from which you obtained the names of my patients contains also the following description of my patent:

"During the past few years seven or eight different patents hav been taken out for Electric and Magnetic Belts, but the vital defect in each and all of them has been a want of means whereby the magnetism once imparted to them could be retained. This defect has been fully overcome in the 'Wilsonia' invention. William Wilson struck the happy idea of attaching a series of Voltaic Piles to the Magnets, which by absorbing the natural exudations of the skin giv out a constant galvanic current, and thus keep up a continuous supply of Magnetism. Another very important feature of the 'Wilsonia' invention is this. Wearers of these garments never experience unpleasant shocks and are never afflicted with sores, which inevitably result from wearing galvanic chain bands—they having to be steeped in vinegar to render them capable of imparting any curativ property, and in this process they become the mother of an incurable form of erysipelas! And then, the 'Wilsonia' is as comfortable to wear as any undergarment. These appliances keep the body warm in the cold season, and, by their power of absorption, impart, in the summer, a refreshing coolness."

Also the Method of Manufacture.

"Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing!

These goods are made as explained below, and every person following out the instructions here given can make for themselvs and their own wearing any garments to suit their malady.

Although I hav patented the invention, I giv any one the liberty to make for themselvs, but shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for others to wear, or to sell.

Process of Manufacture.

Take a sheet of cloth, or any woven fabric, lay it upon another sheet of gutta percha tissue, then lay a sheet of muslin corresponding in size; fasten these together. Then take hard steel plates (brittle as glass they need be for our purpose), cut them into narrow strips about one and a half inches long; perforate each plate, making a hole large enough to take in an ordinary shoe eyelet. These plates to the number of 250, with 500 eyelets, fastened to the cloth, are sufficient to make an ordinary NERVE INVIGORATOR. Over these plates, when fastened to the fabric, we place another sheet of india rubber tissue. Over this again we place another sheet of muslin and fasten the whole mass together with hot irons. We then puncture the eyelets the whole thickness of the fabric so fastened together, having about five hundred openings through the garments. Then we cover the whole with a lining of any material to suit the fancy of the wearer, but preferably canton flannel should be used. When the garment is so far finished it is magnetized by a powerful electro magnet until every plate of the whole series is thoroughly saturated with magnetism.

Having described the process as above, I again say that if you make the garments as I direct they will do you just as much good as though I made them myself. But the above being my patent, I shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for profit, and shall use the utmost rigor of the law in so prosecuting.

Now, then, where comes in quackery with with the WILSONIA?" Why do not the advertisers of quack nostrums tell purchasers how to make their compounds?

Now, as to Prof. White's great discovery: He told us a few weeks ago, through the columns of the New York Herald, that he had made a marvelous discovery, viz., that the whole secret of the electric charge in the Gymnotus, or electric eel, lay wholly in the fact that the said electric oil was enveloped in a film, whereby its electric charge was augmented. This marvelous discovery, he said, was only made after six and three-quarter years of fruitless research, and by an accident, he goes on to say the whole thing was made complete.

Now it will be seen from reading the above formula, that WILLIAM WILSON'S patent was taken out two and a half years before Professor White made his statement through the columns of the Herald.

It is upon the Gutta Percha Film patented by MR. WILSON, that the secret of the "WILSONIA'S" force wholly lies.

Physicians, electricians, and scientists are, therefore, invited to examin critically into the nature of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING, and, with the formula before them, go into their laboratories and experiment for themselvs. They will then know that the

Is the Greatest Wonder of the Age, and yet withal one of the most Simple of Inventions.

In the same open letter which you sent to the newspapers you maliciously attempt to belittle me by assuming that, because I had been a cabinetmaker, I could not therefore attain to a knowledge of curativ agencies distinct from the methods laid down by the schools. In answer to this assumption of yours, I can only say that I pity you for your stupidity. Do you not know that the celebrated Dr. John Hunter of London worked at the bench as a cabinetmaker at forty-two years of age, and afterward became the most eminent surgeon in Europe? and to-day the Hunterian Museum in London is a living monument of that cabinetmaker's skill? Do you not also know that all great inventions ever made emanate from among those whom we least suspect as the originators of new thought?

Another important reference in your open letter I refer to: On a board sign you say as follows: "Read the Anthony Comstock letters in favor of 'Wilsonia.'" In answer to which I simply say that I hav the copies of fifty-five letters sent to you in favor of my garments, the parties sending such letters being those to whom you had conveyed your libelous communication. Therefore I call these letters of my patients the Anthony Comstock letters, and shall continue to publish them in a pamphlet dedicated to the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn and New York; nor you nor your society shall intimidate me against such publication. Nothing shall be hiddennor held back. In conclusion, I again make the following challenge to you: To sign bonds for $5,000 if you can prove that I do not cure ninety per cent of the incurables given over by the doctors, or to produce one case where all the benefit was was not derived as promised on the purchase of the goods, such goods being worn as directed as to quantity and to time. I believe your society requires money to carry on its operations; here, therefore, is a chance to add to its funds. I will also sign bonds for a like sum if you can show one testimonial published by me that was not genuin, and will pay all expenses of the six physicians on whom you relied, and will meet them singly or as a body on any platform in the United States, and prove to an audience of scientists that these physicians know nothing of the nature of nerve fluid, the constitution of the blood, nor the difference between electricity and magnetism as a curativ agent. WILLIAM WILSON.

Having thus openly answered your letter, and wishing the whole thing to be closed up, I herewith make you this offer, viz: That you shall, upon the examination of the deeds referred to in my letter as above, between your attorney and Mr. Colgate, upon the conclusion of such investigation, giv me a letter of apology for having been instrumental in casting discredit upon my invention. I am quite willing to accept your plea of ignorance of the facts, and that you were deceived by others.

Upon receipt of such letter of apology, I will withdraw all further proceedings. WILLIAM WILSON.

Important to the Suffering and Afflicted Who Hav Been Deceived by Advertising Nostrum Venders.

The great success attending the introduction of my world-famed WILSONIA GARMENTS has incited a host of speculators to place upon the market several bogus arrangements under the specious titles of "Magnetic Clothing" or "Magnetic Garments." One unprincipled person has actually copied my engraving representing my clothing, so that a person not seeing the garments would take it for granted that the goods so advertised were fac similes of the WILSONIA, the engravings representing the clothing being identical with those issued by myself thus tending to defraud the public by their purchasing a worthless article for the cure of some malady or other. This same person has copied, almost verbatim, the language of my own circulars. One of these garments was brought me direct from the vender. I find it to be a clumsy imitation of the first magnetic garments made in Europe some fifteen years ago. I would therefore ask the public to see the Wilsonia garments before purchasing anything represented as a magnetic clothing. They will then find that an attempt at imitation has been made by an engraved circular containing copies of my own circular as above stated, and so cunningly has the device been carried out that parties purchasing the goods from such circular will suppose that the garments so purchased were identical with my own, but when seen together they are as different as anything can possibly be conceived. If, however, persons will call at any of our STORES in New York or Brooklyn, or elsewhere in the United States where Wilsonia depots are opened, they may hav everything made clear to them. The claim of CHEAPNESS is a poor point to put forward when the matter of disease and life and death is in the balance. My reputation now is so unparalleled that never before in the history of the world hav such remarkable cures been effected as those following the timely use of the now world-renowned Wilsonia garments. The blind hav been made to see, the deaf to hear, the helpless paralytic to walk erect, the demented to become sane, the martyr to catarrh and asthma to speak and breathe freely, the terrified with heart disease to walk forward among the public without the terror of impending death. All and every form of disease disappear when the Wilsonia Magnetic Garments are used as directed. I will undertake to cure 90 per cent of the so-called incurables now in the hospitals in the United States, and will place my garments upon such patients free of charge, the only condition I make being that the authorities governing such hospitals shall not allow any medicin to be given the patients during the wearing of my garments, and that the cures shall be publicly advertised as soon as made. CITIZENS OF AMERICA! when and where in the history of the world has such an offer as this been made? Here, in New York and Brooklyn alone, there are thousands of poor invalids in our hospitals passing through the ordeal of a protracted and living death who might, if my offer be accepted, be restored to the world as useful members of society, and this free of charge. If my offer be not accepted by the physicians of the hospitals, then the physicians must stand convicted of indifference and carelessness toward the poor invalids intrusted to their care. I hav sold my patent to a company with a view of manufacturing on a very large scale, so that with increased facilities in the form of valuable machinery specially prepared for our purposes, we shall be able to place upon the market an unlimited supply of these wonderfully curativ appliances.

After years of study in the particular direction of electrical therapeutics, I hav from time to time made many improvements on my first conception of what was needed for the relief and cure of disease until the "Wilsonia" in its present form contains all the elements of what has gone before in the same direction. The continuity of current is made complete, the dangers of non-ventilation are entirely overcome. This is an important point in the "Wilsonia." Thousands of persons are to-day suffering from the effects of retarded perspiration, owing had thrown back into the organism the poisonous emanations of the body. The expensiv nature of the "Wilsonia" combination in all its entirety makes the price somewhat high, but yet it is far the cheapest in the end, inasmuch as the curativ force will continue for years although a commoner kind will frequently result in marvelous cures. These commoner goods we sell at the following prices:

Gems of Thought.

O DEATH, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that liveth at rest in his possessions, unto the man that hath nothing to vex him, and that hath prosperity in all things; yea, unto him that is yet able to receive meals! O Death, acceptable is thy sentence unto the needy and unto him where strength faileth, that is now in the last age, and is vexed with all things, and to him that despaireth and hath lost patience!—Ecclesiastes xli, 1, 2.

O DEATH, the poor man's dearest friend,
The kindest and the best!
Welcome the hour my aged limbs
Are laid with thee at rest!
The great, the wealthy, fear thy blow,
From pomp and pleasure turn;
But oh, a blest relief to those That weary-laden mourn!

—Burns.

IF one thing is clear, it is that faith is large in proportion as it dares to put things to the proof. Fear and laziness can accept beliefs. Only trust and courage will question them. To reject consecrated opinions demands a consecrated mind. The moving impulse to such rejection is faith - faith in reason, faith in the mind's ability to obtain truth. The great skeptic must be a great believer. None hav so magnificently affirmed as they who hav audaciously denied.—O. B. Frothingham.

"ALL is bad or good as it affects the well-being of society, or, let us call it, humanity," said Richard Fullerton. "There can be no intrinsic evil, no positiv sin, where there is no community to be harmed by your acts." Mr. Fullerton brought forth the old argument of the desert island, and how a man could not sin by himself. If he could do no ill to others, he could do no ill at all; spiritual wickedness, self-generated, self-destructiv, and offending God only, being a myth and an impossibility. This was naturally utterly opposed to the theological view which makes sin a thing in itself between a man's own soul and God, and in no wise because of its action on the community; which sees in it primarily an offense against heaven even when it is a crime against society—damnable because disobedient to divine command rather than to be punished because of the evil handling of man's body and property.

SOON will the earth cover us all; then the earth, too, will change, and the things also which result from change will continue to change forever, and these again forever. For if a man reflects on the changes and transformations which follow one another like wave after wave, and their rapidity, he will despise everything which is perishable.—M. A. Antoninus.

THE poor man weeps—here Gavin sleeps,
Whom canting wretches blamed;
But with such as he, where'er he be,
May I be saved or damned!

—Burns.

OF late, the death-beds of believers hav been less peaceful than those of unbelievers Terrible doubts hav intruded themselvs. Orthodoxy is bound to believe that Voltaire and Paine, and other so-called Infidels, died miserable deaths, and still goes on asserting it though there is not a particle of proof. But it would not be difficult, were the truth abundant, to match these cases with a score to one of the unhappy deaths of orthodox Christians of the most saintly characters.—Chadwick's Victory over Death.

HERMIONE supposed that some things which she heard at church were true; but she did not realize them, and she more than half doubted the rest. In the state in which she was, religion was rather an irritation than a support, and the Bible perplexed instead of strengthening her. She did not know what in it was true, nor feel what in it was elevating. If there were such a thing as the divine life, the present vicar of Crossholm, sleepy, indolent, "unawakened" old Mr. Asten, could not lead her to its knowledge; and at home she was even farther from help or guidance. Her husband's studies had led him into the opposit camp, and he had become a pronounced Freethinker, Agnostic he called himself; Infidel he was called by others. He had placed science in the seat of theology, and his life's endeavor now was to weaken the hold of the Christian faith on the minds of men—not by reviling the creed and its professors, but by showing the contradictions which exist between nature and revelation, Genesis and science; by substituting knowledge for superstition, reason for faith, and history for mythology.—Under Which Lord? by Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

UTILITY teaches that the general happiness is to be the aim of the individual. The criterion of an action of A. B. is not whether A. B. thereby secures or increases his own happiness, but whether the tendency of the action is beneficial or detrimental to society. If A. B. secures his own happiness by a course which injures others, or which, if generally pursued, would be prejudicial to the interests of the community, he is at once condemned by the principles of utility, even although he may hav thereby increased his own individual happiness. Mr. J. S. Mill justly remarks that the standard of utilitarianism "is not the agent's own individual happiness, but the greatest amount of happiness altogether; and if it may possibly be doubted whether a noble character is always the happier for his nobleness, there can be no doubt that it makes other people happier, and that the world in general is the gainer by it." It is one of the merits of utilitarianism that it cultivates the social feelings and tends to bind men into a brotherhood, wherein the good of all is the aim of each. —Mrs. A. Besant's True Basis of Morality.

WHAT though on heavenly fare we dine,
Wear hodden-grey, and a' that;
Giv fools their silks and knaves their wine,
A man's a man for a' that.
For a' that and a' that,
Their tinsel show and a' that;
The honest man, tho' e'er sae poor,
Is king o' men for a' that. —Burns.

Odds and Ends.

A FRUIT of the battle-field—grape.

A LOUISVILLE belle has in her parlor a beautiful embroidered motto, "E Plur I bus, yum, yum."

LAST words of the balloonist, "It's all up with me." Last words of the gosling, "It's all down with me."

THERE are some days when you can't lay up a cent, and other days when you can't get hold of a cent to lay up.

IT is more blessed to giv than to receive, when a kick from a No. 10 boot is at issue.

"THIS world is all a fleeting show," said a priest to a culprit on the gallows. "Yes," was the reply, "but I'd rather see the show a little longer."

CUSTOMER: "You say that those figures are life size? My dear sir, they seem very small." Artist: "Perfectly correct, sir; you know 'life is short.'"

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher: "Why was Joseph put into the pit?" Boy (who goes to theater sometimes): "Because there wasn't room in the family circle."

"YOU promised to pay that bill yesterday," said an angry creditor to a debtor. "Yes," calmly replied the other; "but to err is human, to forgive divine, and I forgot it."

A DARKEY minister says, "How can dem Infidels say dare am no debbil? I knose there must be a debbil, case how if there was no debbil could they make his pickter so like him?"

"YES," exclaimed Brown, "you always find me with a pen in my hand. I'm a regular penholder, my boy." Let's see," said Fox, musingly, "a penholder is usually a stick, isn't it?"

WHY doth the festiv Injun squaw
Improve each shining minute,
And scratch her head from morn till night?
Because there's millions in it.

"No," said the charming actress to her devoted lover, "No, Charlie, I won't marry you; but you can hav the privilege of paying for all my little suppers and carriages after the theater, and you'll be envied by all the boys. That ought to satisfy you."

A CLERGYMAN who not long ago had entered into the happy state of matrimony with a maiden named Grace, rather surprised his hearers on the ensuing Sabbath by giving out as his text, "The Grace that is given me of God." The sermon, as might hav been expected, was well worthy of the newly-made Benedict.

A MAN who was continually grumbling at everything that happened to him died and went to heaven. A friend of his subsequently met him aloft, and thinking there could be no possible chance of hearing the other complain, asked him how he found himself. The dissatisfied gentleman rubbed his head about and replied, "Just like my infernal luck! why, can't you see this blessed halo of mine doesn't fit?"

AN American who started to ride from Colima to Manzanillo, in Mexico, was stopped on the highway by a well-armed bandit.

"Pardon, senor," exclaimed the latter, "but I perceive that you hav my coat on. Will you hav the kindness to remove it?"

The American produced a six-shooter, and cocking it, replied:

"Senor, I am of the opinion that you are mistaken about that coat."

"On closer observation I perceive that I am," the bandit answered, and disappeared in the wood.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.—A report on the state of religion in Nevada would be almost as brief as the the famous chapter on snakes in Ireland. The following anecdote might, however, be inserted. At the recent opening of the Nevada legislature an Eastern minister was invited to perform the religious service. He accepted the call and closed the ceremony with the Lord's Prayer. When he had finished, State Senator Doolan turned to Senator Hammond and remarked audibly: "He stole that prayer, and I'll bet on it. I heard it almost word for word in Eureka at a funeral over ten years ago."

A HEARTLESS CHICAGO EDITOR.

The editor so gay
Is feeling well to-day,
Because of poems he has burned a score;
He's tilted back his chair,
His feet are high in air,
And he's ready to incinerate some more.

A step is on the stair,
The editor's red hair
Begins to rise like quills on porcupine;
His face a dreadful frown
Assumes, his feet come down—
He's a kind of human giant-powder mine.

In steps a pretty maid,
Her hair is just the shade
Of summer sun that gilds the lofty spires;
She's pretty and piquant,
"Whatever can she want?"
The editor soft of himself inquires.

"I came, sir," she began,
"To ask you if I can
A Christmas story for your paper write;
I don't want any pay,
My name is Myrtle May;
I'd like to stand on fame's immortal hight.

"Oh, Myrtle," he replied,
"You'd better be my bride;
I'm lonely since the trotting season's o'er;
As wife of one who writes
Of ball games and cock fights
You'd hav of fame a quite sufficient store."

The maiden fled, and now
The editor, I trow,
Doth daily play that little game of his;
He knows girls cannot stand
His locks of auburn, and
The quarter-stretch expression of his phiz.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.
Spermatorrhea and Impotency,
as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an
which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
Middle-Aged and Old Men.
There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.
PRIVATE COUNSELOR.
Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.
The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.
This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.
In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

Notes and Clippings.

AN effort is being made in Hartford to enforce an old Blue law which makes concert going on Sunday nights a penal offense.

LEOPOLD VON RANKE, the historian, celebrated his eighty-seventh birthday a few days since. He is still in full vigor, and the third and fourth volumes of his "Universal History" hav just been published.

ST. JOHN, the temperance governor of Kansas, has officially recognized the claims of women to official station by appointing Mrs. Cora M. Downs, of Wyandotte, to be a regent of the state university.

THE question whether Noah Webster ever taught a singing school in Baltimore has been, after a thorough and somewhat excited discussion in that city, decided in the affirmativ. He became pressed for money while on a journey to Washington, and stopped long enough to fill his purse in that manner.

THE census returns just given in Bombay are quite interesting. Asked to state their profession or calling, the simple Hindoos hav filled up the paper with an accuracy that might in vain be sought for in any other country. In Bombay there are, upon their own confession, twenty-six gamblers and swindlers, one dog-poisoner, sixteen wizards, and 698 tattooers.

THE Rev. John Jasper, of Richmond, has a rival in Prof. Johnson of Hamilton. The professor is also a colored man, and he also believes that "the sun do move," and, like Bro. Jasper, he quotes from the Bible to prove his theory. He frankly acknowledges that his views are not in accord with the more advanced men of science, but, believing in the Bible, he can but believe that the sun goes around the earth.

A LONDON company, with a capital of $2,500,000, has acquired a million acres in Manitoba and the northwest territory, and intends to divide it into farms of 160 to 640 acres each, with certain improvements in the way of buildings, stock, and implements. The tenants are to work the farms, and the harvest is to be divided equally between the two parties to the contract. Some of the Canadian newspapers are opposing the scheme as introducing objectionable landlordism.

WE learn from an English paper that "Moody and Sankey are falling dreadfully flat in the north of England. Like ginger pop, they lose their gas after being once uncorked. One thing is certain, they've swamped Richard Weaver's little trade; but the heavenly Richard bears it all with a lamb-like spirit. Oh! the Lord will make it up to him, never fear; he'll get a nice, cosy, cushioned throne in the bright and better land, and there'll be no abandoned girls to trouble him there."

THE Rev. Mr. Miln, of Brooklyn, some time ago became uneasy in the Congregational church of which he was pastor, and felt that he would be happier in the Unitarian fold. So he accepted a call to Unity church, Chicago, of which Dr. Collyer has been pastor. Now he finds that he is theologically crippled and fettered by the doctrins of the Unitarians. He wants something broader and more suited to his advanced views. Therefore he resigns the pastorate of Unity church and strikes out for new fields of theological investigation.

THE new belief which has become dominant in the empires of Germany, Russia, and Austria is that the Jews are at the bottom of all the mischief caused by the spread of Nihilism throughout the east and north of Europe. And it is the knowledge of this fact which has caused the persecution of the Jews by the rabble and the lukewarmness of their defense by the authorities. Judaism is acknowledged at last to be the greatest power of all in politics on account of its command of wealth, and its hold hereby over every government in Europe. The children of Israel are knit together in a bond of Freemasonry, and, it is charged, are using Nihilism for the end they propose, of scaring European sovereigns into submission by the necessity which the most powerful will ere long find themselvs under of borrowing money from Hebrew hoards. In the end they will be compelled to remove those restrictions with which the Hebrew race has so long been burdened.

IN Europe the clergy do not oppose cremation as strongly as formerly. The Protestant clergy in Gotha and in Munich, the archbishop of Paris, and the bishop of Manchester, hav declared in favor of it. The Roman Catholic priesthood in Italy does not oppose it. The Copenhagen Cremation Society, which counts two thousand members, recently applied to the government for permission to erect and operate a crematory in one of the suburban cemeteries; the application was strongly approved by the board of health. Bodies recently exhumed in Danish burial grounds were found after thirty years to be yet in the first stage of decay.

THE University says: "If we are to enter into a crusade against heresy, we must transform the minister of customs into inquisitor-general and every collector into an inquisitor. Already the minister of justice has received intimation from Toronto pulpits that he can hav any number of inquisitors for the asking. And this in the year of grace 1881." And the London Free Press adds: "No free people would tolerate such an intrusion upon their rights as a custom-house inquisition of their literature presupposes. The circumstances of the seizure hav elicited the expression of much manly opinion as to the question of sustaining individual rights as opposed to the attempt to restrict them."

THE Glasgow Free Presbytery is discussing again the Sabbath question in its bearing on the opening of museums and libraries, and the proper length of a Sabbath day's journey for a clergyman who is going to preach. Some of the clergy hav been laying themselvs open to the criticisms of their brethren by hiring cabs on Sunday. The question now arises as to how far a healthy clergyman ought to walk on Sunday, and for how great a distance a cab becomes what the law of the church recognizes as a thing of "mercy and necessity." Some of the members of Presbytery declare themselvs able to walk five miles, but think that if called to go a greater distance they ought to take a cab. Others insist that a minister who is on Sunday going to preach more than five miles from his home ought to go on Saturday night and return on Monday morning. Others hav small objection to the hiring of a cab, provided no money is paid out on Sunday. Instead of destroying the sanctity of the day of rest by settling the bill at once, they would hav "cabby" call on Monday for his pay. Thus gnats are strained at and camels are swallowed. Presbytery did not arrive at any solution of the cab question, but passed a resolution to the effect that museums and libraries ought to be closed on the Sabbath.

THIS is the way the Arkansas people look after their shepherds who leave "between two days." It appears in the El Dorado (Ark.) Eagle, signed by eight persons: "We, the undersigned, would like to hav the character of D. D. Booth published in the Eagle, and his general conduct in this vicinity exposed. It is generally known that after the difficulty he had with Mr. Reed, the old man Primm and his wife took Booth to their house and nursed him and cared for him (about seven months) until he was well, and then how he conducted himself afterward. We want to inform the people how he has taken advantage of a deaf and dumb girl, the daughter of old Mr. and Mrs. Primm, by making rash promises to marry her. He promised to liv in town with her and get a fine horse and buggy and take her to all the big meetings and get her all the fine dresses she wanted, and went so far as to ask the old folks for her, and then seduced her. He has acted a malicious scoundrel with her, and it is now said that he has run away and left the state, and we hav every reason to believe it. He is known as a big Baptist preacher, and we want to warn all deaf and dumb and orphan girls of the danger of associating with him. He is none too good to stoop to anything that is low down and mean. We also warn everybody to watch him, both male and female, for he is an infamous scoundrel. We hav good evidence to support these statements, and we are responsible for everything we say in this instrument. We wish that we could explain this exactly as it is. We would not misrepresent a single feature of the case. We want everybody to know what kind of a man he is, and want this published everywhere throughout the United States, if possible. We further desire to state that he taught school in this neighborhood, and that he tried to seduce a ten-year old child that was going to him. We can establish these facts. This grand rascal is about five and a half feet high, dark complexion; in fact he is a black Dutch, and has a scar from a knife on his right hand and another on his left eye near to the nose. He is forty-six or forty-seven years old."

THE London Freethinker reads the Brooklyn mountebank this well-deserved lesson: "According to Swift a nice man is one with nasty ideas. Talmage is a nice man. His style of preaching against the vices of New York shows that he is intimately acquainted with them. No doubt he has made many a round of the haunts of dissipation to freshen up his knowledge. Any other purpose is of course out of the question. Some years ago there was a great uproar in Glasgow about the "can-can" which was being danced nightly at a music-hall by some young ladies in remarkably short dresses; and the result was that before the dance was suppressed half the officials of the city went to see it in the interest of public morality. Talmage goes the midnight round for the same reason. His last "nice" sermon is against "impure literature," and shows a pretty good acquaintance with erotic publications. Not satisfied with exhibiting his extensiv erudition in that line, he goes out of his way to malign D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who was sent to prison in America, just as Mr. Truelove was in London, for selling a pamphlet on the population question. Talmage alludes to him as "a filthy creature," and classes him with the vendors of obscene books. These Christian libelers don't care how much mud they fling; they hav any quantity of it in stock. We tell Talmage that his holy book, the Bible, is filthier than any publication ever sold by a Freethinker, and we make him a present of the following story. The great Goethe was present at a meeting of the Dutch clergy, when it was proposed to establish a censorship for the expurgation of improper books. He expressed his admiration of the plan, and recommended them to begin with the Bible. Whereupon the king of Holland said to him, 'My dear Goethe, pray hold your tongue. Of course you are quite right, but it won't do to say so.' Talmage thinks Freethought quite as bad as indecency. 'What are you reading?' he asks. 'Bolingbroke? Theodore Parker? Andrew Jackson Davis's tracts? Swedenborg's dreams? Tyndall's Glasgow University Address? Drop them and run.' But the oracle of the Brooolyn Jabernacle doesn't stop there. He runs a-muck against Homer's 'Iliad' and all the warlike epics of the world, because they foster a taste for blood. ut how about the bloodiest epic ever written, the Bible story of the Jewish wars? Begin at home, Talmage, begin at home. Homer's 'Iliad' doesn't claim to be inspired, and your Bible does. Purge the vileness from that before you go abroad. And don't imagin that mankind will ever be so silly as to banish the masterpieces of heroic literature and feed their minds on the weak, washy, everlasting flood of your sermons."

A Truth Seeker Around the World.

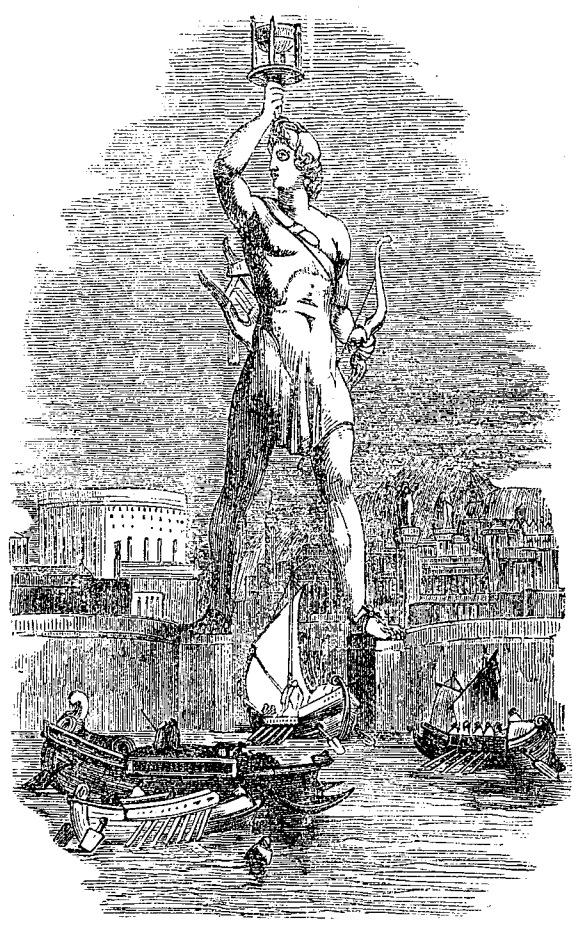
Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, and Cyprus, to Beyrout.—Concluded.

DEPARTURE FROM SMYRNA.

Sunday, Nov. 6th.—It was not till seven o'clock last evening that we had put off all the freight for this place and taken on other freight, as well as some additional passengers. In leaving the Smyrna harbor and resuming our course to the south we had to pass around a considerable peninsula, Karabournou, and down the Chios, or Scio, strait, leaving the volcanic island immediately on our right, of course passing on the opposite side of the island from what we passed when going to Constantinople. Chios, the principal town, is also one of the places claimed to be the birthplace of Homer, "the blind old man of Scio's rocky isle," and here, as in Ithaca, the inhabitants still point out the ruin which they call Homer's School. This island of internal commotions has also had its full share of political disturbances, conquests, and revolutions. At one time it had a considerable army, and could muster one hundred fighting vessels. It has often been conquered and held in subjection by the Ionians, the Greeks, and others.

We have had a strong north wind since we left Constantinople, and as we struck out this morning into wider waters and neared the passage between the islands of Samos and Nicaria the sea had become so rough that more than half the passengers were too seasick to go to the table, and I am compelled to admit that I was weak enough to go over to the majority. My old stomach has for many years shown itself reliable under the most trying circumstances, but when the sea goes beyond a certain line of roughness, and the steamer tosses and rolls beyond the bounds of propriety, my stomach absolutely rebels and will not be quiet. I have found that by keeping the recumbent position the sickness is generally allayed, but I have on occasions tried to keep up rather too long, and despite repeated swallowing my stomach has persisted in emptying itself two or three times. But I have not suffered nearly as much as Mr. Bridges and several others of the passengers. As soon as my stomach has had its way, and "thrown up Jonah" it becomes quiet and I feel all right.

We have regretted this cold, rough weather, but the captain says he expected it when he saw so many of the black-coated and black-hatted gentry (priests) coming aboard. He says he never ships a lot of priests but he knows he is about to have a rough spell of weather. If holy men do bring rough weather, we have enough of them to create a hurricane. There are five or six Greek priests on board, and two or three Roman Catholic priests. Their business cannot be excessively remunerative, for they travel second-class or on deck, so we are troubled but little with them in our quarter. They bunch in with the Turks, etc. Besides the clergymen, we have in our own company two or three American missionaries who joined us at Smyrna. These missionaries are a gentleman and three ladies of Massachusetts, and their field of labor is in Syria, not far from Beyrout, where some of them have been residing two years, and others longer. The women are very chatty, and no not seem any more religious than common people. We have some in our own company who can discount them largely in the piety line. It is cheering, moreover, to know that these missionaries are sufficiently supplied with funds from America to enable them to occasionally do a little visiting as a relief from their exhausting labors. They are now returning from a visit to Athens, Smyrna, etc. It is kind of the people of America to be so generous with their money.



The island of Nicaria, or Icaria, which we passed on our right, derived its name from a legend of Icarius, son of Dædalus, who, having incurred the displeasure of Minos, made wings of feathers and wax for himself and his son so as to escape from Crete. But Icarius, mounting too high, the sun melted the wax of his wings, and he fell into the sea near this island. It has not distinguished itself so much in the history of the past as many others of the islands in the Levant. High chains of mountains occupy the entire extent, and its inhabitants are considered the rudest and most unpolished of all the modern Greeks. They maintain themselves principally by the sale of charcoal to the neighboring islands and to the towns on the coast of Asia Minor, and by the exportation of fire-wood, with which their hills, unlike the rocky masses of many others of the islands, are well covered. The population of the island amounts to about 8,000. They pay an annual tax to the pacha of Rhodes like the neighboring islanders.

is a larger island nearer the main-land, and is one of the principal islands of the Ægean Sea. It is separated from the main-land simply by a narrow strait. It is about thirty miles long and eight in width, on an average; and though mountainous, has a good proportion of fertile land. It had its varied features in war, the same as the neighboring islands, sometimes triumphant and sometimes overpowered; sometimes having a king and government of its own and sometimes completely depressed; sometimes joining with one neighboring power, and sometimes with another, until in the second century, exhausted by repeated wars, it sunk into comparative insignificance. Its property was at one time partially restored by Antony and Cleopatra, residing there for a time, 32 B. C., and afterwards by Octavinces, who made it a free state. It was afterward deprived of its liberty by Vespasian, after which it rapidly went down in importance and wealth. Vathy is the capital. The population of the whole island is 20,000. It pays a tribute to the sultan of Turkey, but otherwise is free. There are ruins of several pagan temples on the island.

Between Icaria and Samos are several small rocky islands, some of which are occupied by a few shepherds; and some, mere masses of rock pushing up out of the water, are uninhabited. In one place we seemed for a time shut in by the rocks, but the pilot found the channel without difficulty, and we were again in the open sea.

Twenty miles south of the extreme point of Samos we came to the small, rugged, worthless island of Patmos, where it is claimed, with little probability of truth, that St. John wrote that crazy, unmeaning account of wild visons of dragons, beasts, and scarlet women called the book of Revelations, which never did anybody any good so far as heard from, because no man ever lived who could understand it, and if he did it would be very apt to set him crazy, as it has many who unwisely spent their time in poring over it. Patmos is a solid, angular mass of rock, bleak and barren, ten miles long and five wide. It has three or four thousand of poor, starved-out Greek inhabitants, who have to emigrate to other islands and to the main-land for employment in the busy seasons of the year, and work for forty cents a day.

THE COLOSSUS OF RHODES.

We also passed the islands of Arkei, Zipso, Lero, Telando, Kalymus, and Kappari, but they are small, very rocky, and undeserving of special notice. Kos, or Stanclis, is much larger and more distinguished as the birthplace of Apelles the painter and Hippocrates the physician. It was still more distinguished as being the only state in Asia Minor which refused to obey the edict of Mithridates, ordering the massacre of the Roman citizens. It is twenty-five miles in length, but narrow. Its fortunes in the past were as varied as its neighbors, which I will not trouble you to trace. It has now some 25,000 or 30,000 inhabitants all told, half Turks and half Greeks.

RHODES.

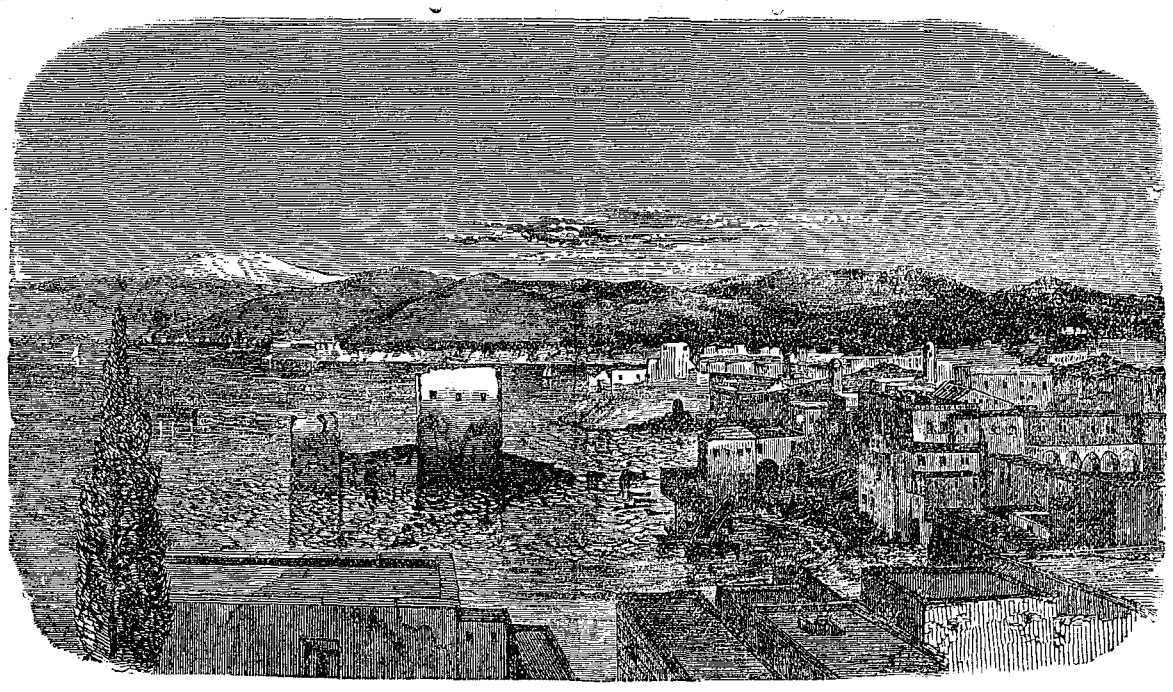
Later on we passed by the small island Yoli, and between Cape Kris, an extended projection of the main-land and the island of Nisgro, leaving Telas considerably to our right and Symi on the left. Early in the evening we reached the famous island of Rhodes, and stopped for two or three hours before Rhodes, its principal town, putting off some passengers and taking on others, but the sea was so rough it was attended with difficulty. The steamer does not go much nearer than within a mile of the towns, and small boats have to come out with mail and passengers and take out whatever is to be sent ashore. It was all the watermen could do to get their boats along against wind and waves.

Rhodes, from the most ancient periods, has occupied a distinguished position in the pages of history. The ancient Rhodians were eminent for their early civilization, their valor, their knowledge of marine affairs, and their cultivation of art and literature. It will require too much space and time to give even a hurried sketch of the marked events in the history of the people of this island, and I will not attempt it. The most primitive Greek records make mention of it. Mythological stories ascribe its origin to the power of Apollo, who raised it from the sea; and several traditions traced the early prophecy of the island by the inhabitants of the countries of western Asia, probably the Phœnicians. Long before the Trojan war they made long voyages to distant countries and were so enterprising as to establish colonies in many places, the principal of which was Rhoda in Iberia, Gela in Cicily, Parthenope and Sybaria in Italy, besides various settlements on the coast of Asia. The government of the island was divided between its three principal cities, each of which seems to have been a separate monarchy, but later on they united under a sort of republic or confederation. In the Peloponnesian war it changed sides for twenty years, coöperating with the other Dorian states in supporting Athens, but after that it turned over to the Spartans, joining the alliance against Athens. In 408 B.C. the city of Rhodes was founded and peopled by the inhabitants of the three more ancient cities. It was built by Hippodamus of Miletus, whom the Athenians employed to embellish Piræus. The new city soon became distinguished for the splendor of its public edifices, and of the paintings and statues with which they were enriched. It was, indeed, one of the most magnificent cities of the ancient world. Strabo, who had seen Rome and Alexandria, gave the preference to Rhodes, and Pindar had long before extolled the grandeur of Rhodes in one of his noblest odes. The wealth of the Rhodians was derived partly from their fertile soil and advantageous situation, but still more from their extensive commerce and the wisdom of their laws, especially those referring to maritime affairs. Such, indeed, was the estimation in which the latter were held that many of their regulations were embodied in the Roman civil law, and have thence been adopted into all modern codes.

After the Peloponnesian war, the history of the island presents a series of conflicts between the democratical and oligarchical parties, and of subjection to Athens and Sparta in turn, till the end of the Social war, 355 B.C., when its independence was acknowledged. Its internal dissensions were at length composed by a mixed form of government, uniting the elements of aristocracy and democracy. The Rhodians submitted to Alexander; but at his death they expelled the Macedonian garrison. In the ensuing wars they formed an alliance with Ptolemy, the son of Logus, and Rhodes successfully endured a siege by the forces of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who at length, in admiration of their valor, presented them with the engines which he had used against their city, from the sale of which they defrayed the cost of the statue to the sun, long celebrated under the name of the Colossus of Rhodes as one of the seven wonders of the world. It was the work of Chares, of Lindus, a favorite pupil of Lysippus. It was a statuary in bronze, one hundred and five feet in hight. It was twelve years in being erected, at a cost of three hundred talents. It stood at the entrance of the harbor of Rhodes, but there is no authority for the statement that its legs extended across the entrance of the port. It was overthrown and broken in pieces by an earthquake in 224 B.C., fifty-six years after its erection. Its fragments remained on the spot for 922 years, till they were sold by the general of the Caliph Othman IV. to a Jew of Emesa, who carried them away on nine hundred camels in 672. Hume says, in his "Populousness of Ancient Nations," that the siege of Rhodes by Demetrius Poliorcetes affords the only example to be found in antiquity of the establishment of a cartel for the exchange of prisoners.

In the wars with Antiochus and Mithridates the Rhodians gave the Romans the powerful aid of their fleet, and they were rewarded by the supremacy of southern Caria, where they had settlements from an early period. In the Civil war they took part with Cæsar, and suffered in consequence from Cassius 42 B.C., but were afterward compensated for their losses by the favor of Antony. They were at length dedrived of their independence by Claudius, and their prosperity received its final blow from an earthquake which laid the the city in ruins in the year 155 of our era. On the division of the empire this island was allotted to the emperors of the East. It was seized for a short period by the Saracens, but having been recovered by the Greeks, it was in 1308 presented by the Emperor Emmanuel to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who a short time before had been expelled from Palestine. The Knights, as the declared enemies of the Infidels, were engaged in perpetual warfare with the Turks, and sustained several blockades and sieges. They retained possession of Rhodes till 1522, when, after a steadfast resistance, they were compelled to surrender to Suleiman the Magnificent. The knights retired first to Crete and next to Sicily, where they continued till 1530, when the Emperor Charles V. ceded to them the island of Malta.

The island of Rhodes is of a triangular form, rising gradually from the sea, until toward the center it attains a considerable elevation, terminating in the lofty summit of Artenara, 4,600 feet above the sea, upon which once stood a temple of Jupiter. The hills and mountains were formerly covered by dense pine forests, which were cut off for ship-building. The country is dry, but quite fertile, producing oil, oranges, citrons, and other fruits. If properly cultivated it is capable of producing in profusion most of the necessaries and luxuries. The climate is the finest in the Mediterranean. Hardly a day is said to pass in the whole year when the sun is not visible; the burning radiance of the East is modified by fresh ocean breezes, while at night the heat is tempered by the cool wind from the Caramanian Mountains of the main-land. The only beasts of burden used on the island are mules and donkeys, there being no camels and but few horses, and those few are owned by the wealthy Turks. Partridges are said to be very abundant. Various species of excellent fish, with coral and sponges, are found in the surrounding sea.



The city of Rhodes is situated at the northeast extremity of the island, and has an imposing appearance from the steamer, with its two lighthouses shining brightly out at night. It is built in the form of an amphitheater, on ground rising gently from the water's edge, and is strongly fortified, having a moated castle of great size and strength, and being surrounded by walls flanked with towers. These works were constructed by the Knights of St. John, and bear evidence of the same skill afterwards evinced on the island of Malta. Above the ramparts rise the domes and minarets of the Turkish mosques, together with some palm-trees, while a highly ornamented Gothic gateway leads from the quay to the town. The moon was shining so brightly that we could see the town nearly as well as if it had been daytime.

There are said to be considerable Hellenic remains in the neighborhood and elsewhere on the island, and the scenery is of the more beautiful character. Mountain ridges divide the island by natural barriers into three divisions, of which the three ancient cities were the capitals. There are now forty-four villages, many of whose names are evidently Hellenic. They are thinly inhabited, the largest, after the city of Rhodes, containing 800 people. The population of the whole island amounts to about 30,000, of whom 6,000 are Turks, 1,000 Jews, and the remainder Greeks. Of this whole number, 10,000 constitute the population of Rhodes.

long fast, or lent, allow their devotees to eat of nothing but these carob beans, or cattle food. I have decided not to join the Greek church. These beans are pressed in bales about the size of cotton bales, and are exported very largely. From the steamer the town, and the plain which stretches back to the left of it, covered with a multitude of bright-looking green carob-trees, with the rugged mountains of rock for a background, present a most beautiful appearance.

Four hours' steaming along the southern coast brought us to the town of Larnaka, the ancient Citium or Chittim, and the principal seaport of the island. I think it contains some 10,000 inhabitants. We reached it just before sunset. It has two mosques, a bazar well-stocked with the usual variety of merchandise, and a Greek church named after St. Lazarus; and here it is pretended that Lazarus, after serving for many years as a bishop, was buried when he died the second time, and Jesus was not around to raise him again from the dead; but nobody who has sufficient good sense gives any credit to the silly claim. As Matthew, Mark, and Luke knew nothing of Lazarus, nor of his being raised from the dead, it is very safe to conclude that there was no such person, and that the person who wrote the gospel of John either had a vision, or drew largely upon his imagination for his facts. There are no bones in the tomb assigned to Lazarus, and where his bones are no man knows unto this day.

Larnaka is situated in the worst part of Cyprus, the country around it being arid and without verdure. We saw, however, some fine-looking palm-trees in the vicinity of the town. It was undoubtedly selected as a seaport owing to the safety of its anchorage compared with other places on the island.

BEYROUT, SYRIA.

Monday, Nov. 7th.—For half the day we steamed along in sight of the towering Caramanian Mountains of the main-land. The higher portions reach the hight of six or seven thousand feet above the level of the sea and are thoroughly white with snow. After losing sight of the Asiatic continent we will see no more land till the rocks of Cyprus heave in sight. The air to-day, like the preceding days, has been clear, and the sun bright, but the north winds have continued very brisk, which, with the removal of freight, causes the steamer to toss and roll too much for those of us who have rather sensitive stomachs. Several of us were glad to retain a recumbent position a good share of the time. There are some ills in nearly all conditions of life. If people will continue to go to sea, some of them must be seasick. It is only fair for those who dance to pay the fiddler.

CYPRUS.

Tuesday, Nov. 8th.—With the return of day this morning the highlands of Cyprus were close on our left, we having passed down on the southern side, where the two principal ports are located. Before 8 o'clock we had stopped before the town of Limissol, or Limasol, a place of 5,000 inhabitants, pleasantly situated at the water's edge, and semicircular in form. This is the point where the Turks first landed when they took the island in 1571. It is a clean, tidy-looking place. We lay there some four hours, taking aboard a few dozen casks of new wine, a hundred or two bags of raisins, and many tons of carobs, which are the pods and beans of the carob-tree, a species of the locust, which grow about the town and the neighboring forests in great quantity. The seeds or beans, which are sweet and nutritious, are ground up in Italy, Russia, and even in England, by wholesale, as food for cattle. They are said to be the "husks" alluded to in the parable of the Prodigal Son upon which the swine were fed, and of which the prodigal himself was fain to eat. Perhaps, in deference to this parable or fable, the Greek church, during their

There is little doubt that Larnaka is the Chittim, or Kittim, referred to in Genesis x, 4, and in Numbers xxiv, 24, as it is not at all likely that either of the books named were written more than six or seven years before the Christian era. It was for a long time the stronghold of a Phœnician colony, and in its commercial dealings became the rival of Tyre. In the time of Sargon, 707 B.C., the king of Citium was one of the kings of Cyprus who paid homage to that Assyrian monarch, as appears from a cuneiform inscription on an Assyrian bas-relief, discovered in Larnaka in 1846 and now in the Berlin Museum. Gesenius gives a number of Phœnician inscriptions from Citium in his "Scripturæ Linguæque Phœnicia;" these show that the city was long inhabited by the Phœnicians; and so late as the time of Cicero it appears to have been regarded as a Phœnician town, for he calls Zeno, the founder of the Stoics, a Phœnician, because he was born in Citium, though it is well known that his parents were Greeks.

Cyprus—in Turkish Kubris—is the most easterly island in the Mediterranean, and is but forty-five miles distant from the nearest point of land in Asia Minor, and sixty miles from the nearest point in Syria. Larnaka is two hundred and fifty miles from the Suez Canal, and three hundred from Alexandria; one hundred and fifty from Beyrout, five hundred and fifty from Smyrna, and six hundred and fifty from the Dardanelles. The island is one hundred and forty-five miles long from the extreme east to the western point, but the eastern part for fifty miles is simply a narrow, rocky ridge. In form the island has been compared to a deer's skin spread out, the eastern narrow ridge serving as the tail. The principal mountains are in the west, and the highest peak has an elevation of 6,590 feet. From its summit, it is said, a fine view is to be had of the entire island, as well as of the coast of Asia Minor and Syria. In an eastern prolongation of this range is Mount St. Croce, 2,380 feet high, on which once stood a temple of Jupiter. The whole northern coast of the island is mountainous, and the whole appears to have always been subject to earthquakes, as is the case with nearly all the islands of the Mediterranean. Paphos is in the center of the Cyprus Mountains.

In former times Cyprus was thickly covered with wood, which was first used in the extensive copper-mining operations carried on here, and afterwards ship-building. Its cedars are said to have even surpassed those famous ones of Lebanon. The copper interests were so great here that all the ancients knew of the fact, and it is with much probability claimed that it was from Cyprus that copper obtained its name. Æs Cyprium came to be shortened into Cuprum, and anglicized into "copper." Copper mining and the manufacture of swords, armor, and articles of bronze formed the staple trade of Cyprus from the heroic ages down to the time of the Romans. That the quality of the armor was highly prized in Homer's time is evident from his account of the present made by Cinyras to Agamemnon. Alexander the Great had a Cyprus sword given him by the king of Citium, and Demetrius Poliorcetes, when besieging Rhodes, got two suits of armor from Cyprus, which the maker is said to have tested by exposing them at two hundred paces to darts shot from an engine. It appears also that the fine arts, especially sculpture, were greatly cultivated in the island. In literature it occupied no mean place, having produced one of the celebrated epic poems of antiquity, the "Kypria." Solon spent the last days of his life in Cyprus.

According to heathen mythology, Cyprus is held to have been the birthplace and favorite abode of Venus, who was said to have risen from the foam of the sea, off Paphos. A fair, called by a Greek word signifying deluge, is annually held at Larnaka fifty days after the Greek Easter, which unquestionably derives its origin from the same pagan source mentioned by Herodotus and other Greek authors. Tradition states it to be the anniversary of the birth of Venus; and the inhabitants still flock from all parts of the island to attend it. No Cyprian would on any consideration dispense with going upon the water on that day. The festival in ancient times was proverbial for its lascivious rites, and even now peasant girls suppose that their presence at the fair facilitates their marriage, as formerly it was the custom for young men to come from distant parts in order to select wives from among the females attending the fair. It is possibly in connection with the rites and practices attendant upon the anniversary of Venus that females too much disposed to those indulgences came to be called Cyprians. Well, well; Venus may have done some naughty things, but there is, after all, something very attractive about the goddess of love. She may have been naughty, but she was unquestionably nice. Say what you will, love is the highest, the best, and most amiable quality that exists in the organization of man or woman.

Cyprus was known to the ancients under the various titles of Acamantis, Cerastis, Macaria, Æcosa, Amathusia, Paphos, and Salamis. According to Herodotus, the island was colonized by three different nation—Greeks, Libyans, and Phœnicians—who each founded cities on its coasts for the purpose of commerce. It was early tributary to Egypt, and afterward passed under the dominion of the Persians, whose yoke it several times ineffectually endeavored to throw off. It acknowledged allegiance to Alexander the Great and afterward came under the protection of Ptolemy Lagus, and was made a province of Egypt. Subsequently it passed into the hands of the Romans, and upon the disruption of that power passed under the control of the Eastern emperors. It remained under the dominion of Greek governors, who bore the title of dukes, till 1191, when Richard Cœur de Lion, to avenge the insults offered to some of the princesses of his family who had been wrecked on the coast on their way to the Holy Land, in a very Christian manner attacked and devastated the island, put the Duke Isaac Comnenus to death, and himself assumed the title of king of Cyprus. Two years later its captain made it over to Guy de Lusignan, "a rich compensation," as Gibbon observes, "for the loss of Jerusalem." By Guy it was ceded to Henry, count of Champagne, and was governed by the Lusignan family for some time during the insane and unsuccessful attempt to wrest the Holy Land from the Mohammedan. Becoming much weakened, it passed again under Egypt, until conquered by the Genoese, and held by them for ninet years, till they lost it in the reign of James the Bastard, after which it was taken by the Venetians, by whom it was held for eighty years. It was taken by the Turks under Sultan Selim II. in 1571. The island rose in insurrection in 1822, but the revolt was quieted with much slaughter, and the condition of the island was much injured. By the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1878 the government of Cyprus was handed over by Turkey to England, by which arrangement the government of England pledges itself to pay to Turkey the annual sum of $500,000. Up to this time she has found it a sort of white elephant upon her hands, the revenues of the island not amounting to the sum named. As a military station, however, it doubtless possesses much value in retaining the control of the Mediterranean islands and the western portions of Asia. The island is improving under British rule, and affords snug positions for several of her sons who wish to be drawing salaries from the public purse.

Antiquities of great interest were in former times discovered in Cyprus belonging to the Phœnician, Greek, and Roman ages, but it is only within the last few years that systematic explorations have taken place on a large scale. These were inaugurated by General di Cesnola, who resided on the island as an American consul for ten years. He began his explorations in 1866 in the neighborhood of Larnaka, where he discovered more than two thousand tombs, most of which dated from 400 B.C. to the beginning of the Christian era. He also discovered remains of temples of the Greek age. In one tomb was found a bronze urn containing about six hundred gold statues of Philip and Alexander. There were also Phœnician remains. He next excavated at Dali, the ancient Idalium, opening some fifteen thousand Phœnician tombs. Thence he proceeded to Golgos, where he laid bare the ruins of two temples containing nearly a thousand statues representing the best periods of Egyptian art, with bas-reliefs and other sculptures of the Assyrian, Greek, and Roman ages. He next went to Salamis, but other antiquarians had been there ages before him, and little remained. Proceeding to Cape Pedalium, he identified the site of Leucolla and discovered some curious terra-cotta coffins. Traveling onward, he found the cites of several ancient cities, and discovered some remarkable temples and tombs. After exploring Paphos, Pissouri, and Amathus, he made his final crowning discoveries at Curium. Here, in the subterranean treasure-chambers of the old temple, he was so fortunate as to find an immense number of engraved gems and ornaments, cups, vases, and other articles of gold, silver, crystal, and bronze, which in variety and archæological, as well as intrinsic, value must be regarded as one of the most important discoveries of the age. The discovery of the treasure of Curicum is a true revelation of the glyptic art, and its rise and progress from the earliest times down to the beginning of the fifth century before our era. It embraces Assyrian, Egyptian, Phœnician, and Greek objects, some of which are of the most exquisite workmanship. I have viewed a large collection of these antiquities, including vases, idols, terra-cottas, and pottery of many kinds, at the Museum of Antiquities, on Fourteenth street, New York, which I recommend such friends as have not seen them to call and examine. They will be found very interesting. I learn that a large collection of the antiquities excavated in Cyprus are also in London. Few things are more interesting than looking at the workmanship of artists who lived three or four thousand years ago.

The inscriptions found on the ancient monuments and objects of Cyprus are in three languages: 1. Cypriote, which is thought to be a branch of the great Aryan family. The characters resemble those of Lycia. 2. Phœnician; and 3. Greek. Di Cesnola gives a full account of all in his work on Cyprus.

The principal products are wheat, barley, cotton, silk, madder-root, oil, wine, raisins, carobs, and salt. The greatest drawbacks to production are the want of water, most of the streams becoming dry in summer, and the ravages of locusts, which one year with another are said to consume one-half the crops. If the raising and pasturage of goats could be discontinued for a quarter of a century, to allow forest trees to spring up, rains would undoubtedly be largely increased, and the products of the island trebled. The climate is varied, the northern part is the most hilly and wooded, and the heat in that district is tempered by the cool breezes from the Caramanian Mountains, in Asia Minor, which in the higher parts are snow-capped the most of the year. The heat is great in summer on the southern slopes, but upon the whole the climate is most agreeable and healthful.

To-day three splendid views were enjoyed by us: The first was a beautiful, clear sunrise, the sun coming apparently out of the waters in magnificent style. The next was an equally lovely sunset, the sun resplendently sinking down into the water. An hour or so later we had a double moon-rise; that is, the moon came up out of the Mediterranean looking like a ball of fire; and a little way above the horizon was a narrow strip of heavy, dark cloud, which, obscuring the moon for a short time, afforded another moon-rise equally as fine as the first. The magnificence, richness, and splendor of all could hardly be exaggerated.

Wednesday, Nov. 9th.—We left Larnaka about nine o'clock last evening, and had a quiet and pleasant night, sailing quietly toward the coast of Syria. With the early morn the mountains of Lebanon hove in sight, the higher parts of which are white with snow, while the sky in every direction is soft, and the air genial and warm.

At 9.30 we cast anchor off the coast of Syria, in front of the city of Beyrout, sitting beautifully in a crescent form, and rising gradually above the sea. We were glad to see the good-looking town, as you may well imagine. In half an hour forty boats were hovering around the steamer, having made a swift race to see which should arrive first, and such a clamoring and yelling one does not often hear. We saw a motley crowd of Turks, Arabs, Moors, Africans, or Ethiopians, and men of almost every conceivable oriental nationality. But in a short time we were duly installed in boats, gladly bidding the Saturno good-bye, feeling that the fare and treatment we had there received were not first-class. In another hour we were on shore. Here we are now in the orient. We shall look around the city today, and to-morrow morning mount horses and proceed to Baalbec, Damascus, and then the "Holy Land." I will try and keep you advised of what I see, and my impressions concerning the same. Good-bye to you all.

Beyrout, Baalbec, and Damascus.

MOUNT LEBANON, SYRIA, Nov. 10, 1881.

DEAR READERS: As you learned from the closing of my last letter that we had arrived in the principal seaport of Syria, I need not again apprise you of the fact. We put up at the Hotel Bellevue, and after dispatching a late breakfast, having failed to receive one on the Saturno, we had leisure to look about the city of Beyrout, containing 100,000 inhabitants, and I cheerfully bear witness that I am rather well pleased with it. It suits me better in many respects than any town we have visited since leaving Athens. It has not the tumble-down appearance of Constantinople, and is much cleaner than either that city or Smyrna. It is beautifully situated on a promontory, which extends some three miles into the Mediterranean. The shore line is indented with fine rocks and cliffs. The ground rises gradually from the first shelf or table, so that the town presents a most favorable appearance from the sea; and a few miles in rear of the town, in the background, rises undulation after undulation of the gigantic mountain-range called Mount Lebanon.

An ancient Phœnician city once occupied the site where Beyrout now stands, by the Greeks and Romans called Bérytus. When the Romans became masters of other parts of Syria, Beyrout came into their possession. Augustus made it a colony, Agrippa instituted games and gladiatorial sports, and Alexander Severus established a splendid law school, which lasted till the sixth century. When the Saracens overran Syria, Beyrout fell into their hands, and during the war of the Crusades it often changed hands.

In 1840 Beyrout was bombarded by the English, and recaptured by the Turks. After the massacre of 1860 many Christians came and settled there, and from that date the prosperity of Beyrout has been greater than in any previous period of its history. The houses are substantial and of semi-European build. Probably one-fourth of the inhabitants dress in the European style, and the balance dress in Turkish and Syrian costume, a portion of which is of a primitive character. The men and women have to some extent reversed the fashions of Europe and America—the men wear petticoats and the women pantaloons or drawers. I will not object to women getting on trousers if they can accomplish it, but men wearing petticoats I do view with a perfect abomination. Let me explain that the petticoats worn by the men are thin—a single thickness of striped, colored, or white muslin, and sometimes black stuff—which, fitting very closely around their narrow hips and shapeless shanks, looks far worse than the same garment upon a woman. Some of the men's petticoats are sewed together at the bottom, leaving two places for the feet to poke through, and sometimes left open, in which case the slit at the sides extends to the knees, after the style of a shirt. In many instances, the poorer classes have very short skirts, and their legs are entirely uncovered, and from the sun and the natural dark color of the skin, they are nearly as black as negroes'.

Tho bazars of Beyrout do not present an oriental appearance, like those of Constantinople, and the building and pavement are much better. Many of the places for stores are occupied by shoemakers and tailors. I think I never saw so many shoe-shops in a town of its size, and they all looked as though they were making good work. I left my blessing with them, for from early associations, as well as those of two years ago, I entertain a kindly feeling towards the disciples of St. Crispin. The mechanic shops there are of good size, and looked far better than in Constantinople. All hands seemed busy, and few idlers were to be seen. We walked up to the barracks, and saw a part of a regiment of soldiers pass out. I think I never saw a more hardy, resolute, invincible looking set of men. If they had good commanders I feel confident they would be equal to any in the world.

While looking through the bazar I saw some fruit new to me, and wishing to try some of it, I took two copper coins from my pocket, thinking I was making a very generous investment when I tendered them to the dealer and motioned to him that I wished the value in his fruit. He shrugged his shoulders, and looked very despondent, as much as to say, "You are spending a very small amount of money," and he consequently gave me a very small amount of fruit. I afterwards learned that the value of the coins is one-seventh of a cent, and then I did not blame the Syrian for shrugging his shoulders at an offer of two of them.

We walked about the town considerably, and saw fine orchards and gardens of fig, orange, and mulberry trees, with garden vegetables and many lovely flowers. I noticed a wonderful growth of cactus, which is cultivated for fences, being usually set out on the top of stone walls; and it seems to have the faculty of growing on the top of a pile of stones as well as in the earth. I saw miles of this kind of fence. Many of the plants are a foot in diameter at the crown.

There are no antiquities worthy of mention, but the city is somewhat noted for schools. The Christians of America sustain a college here, commanding an imposing situation on the high ground in the rear of the town, with departments in Arabic literature, mathematics, natural sciences, modern languages, medicine, jurisprudence, with, of course, biblical and religious literature, and what is called moral science. It is under the general control of trustees in the United States, where the present funds are invested. Our very pious Christian citizen of New York, Wm. E. Dodge, who some twelve or fifteen years ago was pretty extensively engaged in the importation of block tin, in the form of statuary, on which he has the reputation of trying to defraud the government of its legitimate revenue, and also an earnest member and contributor of Comstock's obscene society, is the principal pillar of the institution. Perhaps he cheated the government, on his block tin importations, to do a very nice thing for this school in Syria. His son also takes a warm interest in the same direction, and has been over here several times. The students are mainly native Syrians, and seem to be rather proficient in their studies. Such schools are of decided service in any country, even with the superstitions taught therein. This has a resident board of managers, composed of American and British missionaries. All sects are said to be admitted, and among those represented among its one hundred and forty students are Protestant, orthodox Greek, Papal, Latin, Maronite, Druse, and Armenian. Considerable effort is made to indoctrinate students in the orthodox Protestant creed, or what are denominated the correct and "distinct features of evangelical truth." A printing-press is connected with the college, and of course is an engine of power in disseminating true orthodox faith.

The Romish Jesuits have also a large school here, where the original articles of Christianity according to Gregory the Great, John XXIII, and Alexander VI. are duly instilled into such of the Syrian youths as can be induced to attend. Many of the Jesuits who were driven from France have come to Syria, and with their characteristic energy are strongly establishing themselves. The British Syrian schools, founded in 1860, include a normal training institution, day school (elementary, infant, Moslem), giving instruction to 680 pupils. There are also schools for the blind and cripples, which unfortunately seem to be plentiful in this country. There are six branch schools of Lebanon, with over 400 pupils. The Jews of Beyrout have a school under the auspices of the church of Scotland, but I have heard of no conversions here from Judaism to Christianity. There are several French institutions, including an orphanage, day schools, boarding schools, etc. The Italian government supports the Scuola Reale Italiana Elementare. The Germans have an orphanage and school with 130 pupils; thus it will be seen that Beyrout is pretty well supplied with schools.

A few miles north of Beyrout, Dog River, which takes its rise in the Sannin, one of the highest eminences of Mount Lebanon, 8,570 feet, empties into the Mediterranean. The river was so named from a tradition that once upon a time, when a foe approached, a dog, roughly hewn in the rock, gave an alarm by barking. The dog was thrown into the sea, though by whom it is not stated, and a rock is still pointed out as that same dog. For a wonder no fish is connected with this veritable legend save those that still continue to swim around the dog. Not far from this stone dog is the locality where St. George, the patron saint of England, killed the dragon, and the very place is pointed out where the valorous deed, which you have all seen most religiously pictured, was done. This is more fishy than the stone dog barking, but still there are millions of Christians perfectly able to believe it, for a chapel is erected on the spot. But when it is taken into consideration that there never was a dragon, and very likely never a St. George, the ability of Christians to believe fishy stories will be duly appreciated.

There are, however, some relics of antiquity, in the immediate neighborhood, a thousand times more reliable than that stone dog barking, or Saint George's fight with a dragon. On a bold promontory which projects out into the Mediterranean are nine sculptures, three of which are Egyptian and six Assyrian. One of the former is dedicated to the Egyptian god Phthah, the special deity of Memphis; another to Ra, the sun-god; the third records certain expeditions of Sesostris (Rameses II). The Assyrian sculptures are regarded as the work of Sennacherib, who invaded Syria 701 B. C. Before reaching them an inscription is observed, from which it is learned that the rocky pass was cut by order of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, who is here designated Germanicus, which fixes the date when the road was constructed as between the years 175 and 180.

We were wakened this morning, bright and early, by the singing of birds, which seemed to abound in numbers, and to possess a disposition to make the morning cheerful. Under such circumstances we could hardly do otherwise than feel their influence. At ten o'clock, all things being in readiness, the circus commenced; that is to say, the horses were brought out for our party, which we are to ride for the next thirty days. A Rev. Mr. James, of Northampton, England, of the regular English church, arrived here this morning by steamer, and joined our party, to journey with us through Palestine and Egypt. Judge Lawson, wife, daughter, and son, the latter of whom joined us at Limasol, Cyprus, will also accompany us as far as Damascus, whence they will return by diligence, and take steamer to Jaffa, thence by horses or diligence to Jerusalem, etc.; so there were just a baker's dozen of us to try our skill at equestrianism. Besides our regular party there is a strong force of dragomen and attendants, fifteen in number, with twenty-four mules and donkeys to carry baggage, tents, and food for the party; for it must be understood that we are to camp out while sojourning through the Land of Yahweh, he not having provided any hotels in his country when he undertook to run it, nor since. We have also changed conductor, still having a Mr. Clark (Herbert E.); not the one who accompanied us from Cyprus, but an elder brother, who has been longer in this country, and consequently is more experienced. The change is in our favor.

The embarkation per horseback was the occasion of some excitement, in which I participated. I never was much of a rider, and never fond of horseback diversion. I had not till to-day been upon a horse's back for more than nine years. The last time was in the vicinity of Paris, Ill., when I hired a horse at a livery stable to ride some fifteen miles across the prairie to a point not far from the village of Newman. The horse was a dangerous one, having had several runaways, of which fact, however, I was not apprised. I made the trip out without difficulty, and on the following morning started on my return, and rode some four miles, when I was obliged to alight to shut a gate through which I had to pass. While I was remounting, the horse sprung away suddenly, probably startled by some hunters who were near in the bushes, and being rather inexpert I was thrown to the ground and dragged a considerable distance with my foot in the stirrup. I do not know how far, for I seemed to be knocked senseless by the fall; but from what the hunters said afterwards, it must have been some twenty rods. It was fortunate that my foot left the stirrup, otherwise I must have been killed, for the horse ran like the wind for four miles. It was thought he stepped on me, or kicked me, for one of my ribs was broken, and I could feel the bones grating together for some time afterward, and I was extremely sore. I was wholly unable to mount the horse again, and was carried home in a spring wagon at the expense of considerable suffering. I remained unconscious for several hours after the injury, and some who came to my relief thought I would hardly recover, but I did, and have done a good deal of hard work since. I do not claim that my life was saved by an interposition of Providence, for if that imaginary individual did not want me to die, I cannot understand why he allowed me to come near it by being so badly hurt. If my Christian friends choose to consider that my time had not yet come, my "work" not yet accomplished, I will not quarrel with them about it, for I had not at that time started THE TRUTH SEEKER, nor begun to preach the glad gospel of truth. If I had died at that time I should not have made this tour around the world, and you would not have been inflicted with these long letters; so, if you can, let us try to be glad that that result was a favorable one.

You can hardly think strange, however, that after that untoward event I should have decided, Hibernian-like, that the next time, and ever after, when I rode on horseback I would go afoot; but one cannot tell what he may be compelled to do when he comes to God's country—a land where there is not, and probably never was, a continuous decent road fit to trundle a wheel-barrow or push a hand-cart for half a mile, and where carriage riding, to say nothing of railroads, is wholly out of the question. With all the ability claimed for the tutelar deity who made an attempt to conduct a country of his own special selection, containing less that 5,000 square miles—about one-twelfth the size of the state of New York—he seems to have done nothing toward instructing the people he was so partial to about road-making; neither did the great lights and teachers have any more conception of a macadamized carriage-road than a Bedouin Arab has to-day. It seems to be thought a thousand times of more importance to instruct the people how to dress a kid in its mother's milk, in what fashion the priests should cut their ephods, and how they should sprinkle the blood of bullocks and rams on their right thumbs, their right big-toes, on the tips of their ears, and all over their garments, than to tell how to construct good carriage-roads, or how to build comfortable dwellings.

MY HORSE.

I naturally felt a trifle anxious to see the horse allotted me, not knowing but that there might for my use be brought forth a fiery untamed steed that would fly away with me, Mazeppa-like, over valleys, hills, and crags, until I was reduced to such a state that my most intimate friends would not recognize me. But when No. 8 was called out, and I was told that No. 8 was for me, I was pleased to see that he did not look ferocious or malicious, but that he might be described as a demure, well-disposed little horse, not likely to give much trouble to a reasonable person like myself. I am not like death, to ride a pale horse, for mine is the deepest in color of the entire lot, he being a deep brown, approaching black. There may be a fitness in this, as I may be regarded as the black sheep of the party. But, at all events, I endeavored to place myself at once on good terms with my new acquaintance, and said to him that as we were to be close companions for the next thirty days, we ought to have a good understanding between us, and become very good friends. I do not suppose, however, that he comprehended the nature of my remarks, my language and my style being equally unfamiliar to him. I did not learn whether he has a name, but thinking he should have one, I cast about to see what the name should be. It was not long before occurred to me the name of the horse which transported Mohammed up to the seventh heaven in such a brief space of time. Though I did not expect my little Brownie to take me to heaven, he was at least to bear me to the "Holy Land," and so I called him Al Borak.

THE START.

We were soon all mounted and on our way towards Mount Lebanon, passing fertile gardens and orchards of figs and mulberry-trees, with an occasional palm-tree, and, on the plain, a pineret, or grove of pine-trees, set out some forty years ago by the order of some pacha. Before us lay the grand old mountain of Lebanon, which we had to ascend, and the road which we were to take stretched up its side like a huge serpent from one station to another. We met many of the natives of the country, some with donkeys, going toward the city. Among the rest we met with two or three bevies of girls half-grown, who saluted us very prettily as we passed, making use of the best English they could command, some saying "Good morning," and some "Good evening," as was most familiar to them. It is always pleasant to be saluted by the damsels of the rising generation, and it is but just to say that many of the Syrian girls are good looking and bright. Their eyes bespeak intelligence and good nature. The people of the country are all respectful towards us. Their manner of salutation is peculiar and beautiful. Sometimes they put their hands to the forehead, sometimes to the lips, and sometimes over the heart, but oftener over the three, the meaning of which is as follows: over the heart, "I love you;" over the lips, "I praise you;" over the forehead, "I revere you." It is all done with military precision. I try not to be outdone by Syrian politeness, and return this salute whenever given.

By twelve o'clock we had made considerable ascent of the mountain, and at every turn could look back and see the Mediterranean, the city of Beyrout, and the plain we had crossed. The view is beautiful all the way along. As we climb the mountain, we are struck with the difficulties under which agriculture is prosecuted. The steeper part of the mountain is cultivated in figs, in vines, and in mulberry-trees; also in grains; but the entire surface is terraced, a wall being built every ten or fifteen feet, to get the superabundant stones out of the way, and to prevent the soil from washing. These walls are some three feet in hight on the lower side, and even with the soil on the upper side, and but for them the earth would all wash down the mountain in heavy rains.

At twelve we stopped to lunch. The muleteer with the lunch fixings had preceded us somewhat, and had a carpet spread under a shaded place, and on it a good collation of boiled eggs, cold chicken, etc., with grapes and oranges in abundance. It was a fine picnic meal, and all seemed to enjoy it very much, and all congratulated themselves and each other on the success made at horseback riding. In an hour and a half we were again in the saddles, with our faces still turned towards the summit of Mount Lebanon, one of the higher points, called the Sannin, and capped with snow, being on our left, looking to be some five miles away, but really not less than twenty. The air is so very clear here that distances are very deceiving, being at least twice as great as they seem.

The road we are traveling—the regular diligence road from Beyrout to Damascus, and the only good road in Syria—is very smooth, of easy grade, and well made, without regard to expense. It belongs to a French company, who have a grant for it for the term of ninety years; they have been running it for eighteen years, during the first nine of which it was run at a loss, but since which time they have been making money. From this it is easy to judge the last half of their term must be profitable. I think two diligences go every day both to and from Damascus. There are also a good many freight wagons passing over the road, though the greater part of the carrying is done by camels, mules, and donkeys. Of the "ships of the desert"—camels—we see great numbers, carrying all sorts of commodities. A full load for a camel is six hundred pounds, and with that load they will keep up their slow, steady pace the whole day through. I think a certain Bible reader called them saw-mills. In reading the passage about straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, he spelt it out in this way: g-n-a-t, gate, and c-a, saw, m-e-l, mill, reading thus: "Strain at a gate and swallow a saw-mill. So it is a frequent remark among us, "There come more saw-mills."

SYRIAN HOUSES.

The houses of Syria are a style by themselves, and remind me of pictures we often see of Palestine and this part of the world. They are but one low story in hight, have a flat roof, and are without windows. The walls are of stone, and the roofs are made by laying strong poles from wall to wall, then a course of brush or flat stones, over which are laid six or eight inches of earth, and this forms the roofs of nearly all the houses in the country. To prevent the rain penetrating, the earth on the roof is packed firmly and rolled on the surface. Nearly every house is supplied with a stone roller, thirty inches in length, and weighing perhaps one hundred and fifty pounds. The rolling has to be repeated pretty often, or the roof becomes so loose and porous that the rains readily soak through; and with all the rolling that is done, there are but few of the roofs but what leak when anything like a protracted rain comes. If more descent was given to the roofs the rain would doubtless run off better; but they are made as nearly flat as possible. The roofs are much used for drying grains and other articles upon, also for sitting on in the cool of the day in the warm season of the year. If they used lime in the outer coat, making a kind of cement or concrete, these roofs would be much more impervious to water; but, owing to the great scarcity of fuel, burning lime is nearly out of the question. The houses look for all the world like the foundations for buildings—as though somebody had commenced a house and had succeeded in getting up a wall for the foundation, but his funds had run short, and he had to suspend operations. As they have no windows, as the floor is usually the earth, or sometimes stones; as they are only six or seven feet high, and not decorated or finished at all, it can well be understood that these houses would be considered cheerless places of abode by the bulk of Americans. And as it would seem not very desirable to become the tenant of such a house, so it is no great thing to get upon the house-top; to rise six feet from the surface of the earth—probably about the distance David ascended when he from his house-top stealthily and lasciviously obtained a view of his neighbor Bathsheba taking an evening bath, which so aroused his amorous passions that he at once committed adultery with her, and then planned the murder of her faithful husband that he might take the wife permanently to his own sensual bosom, the man after God's own heart that he was; and thus, as we are assured, securing the line from whence should descend, seven hundred years later, the great Prince of Peace, the only begotten of the Father, whose religion has caused more suffering and bloodshed in the earth than all other religions put together. Possibly if David had had no house-top to look down from, or if it had been steep, none of this mischief would have happened.

An Error Corrected.

WE were requested by a friend to say that Col. Ingersoll was not in the Guiteau case. It seemed superfluous, but we did so, and hav since received this card:

In your issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 31st, under the head of "Notes and Clippings," you say, "We are requested to state that the Mr. Ingersoll who is one of Guiteau's counsel is not Col. R. G. Ingersoll, nor a relativ of his." Your informant is mistaken. There is no counsel in the Guiteau case by the name of Ingersoll. Doubtless his mistake has arisen from confounding the Guiteau case with the Christiancy divorce case. Edward C. Ingersoll, Esq., is counsel in the latter case. He is not a relativ of Col. R. G. Ingersoll.

Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

Liberty, Science, and Humanity.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

LECTURE II.

THE SUBJECTIVE OR HUMAN ORDER; OR, THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY THE ONLY TRUE AND PRACTICAL SOLUTION OF MAN AND HIS WORLD.

Under the twelve heads of our last lecture we saw the World explained as far as science and Positive philosophy have been able to read and to classify it. From that review man finds himself to be the objective result and product of this whole World, extending from the Infinity of space inward until step by step, that is, from science to science, from Astronomy to Psychology, he climbs the pyramid of positive knowledge and finds his brain, with its wondrous thoughts and feelings, at the summit. From this purely scientific view man is seen to be the object, that is, the outcome and creation of the World, which is his maker. He is here, as he is, because all of the World has been, and has acted as it has, through to him unknowable time and space. Man is seen to be not a miraculous but a natural product, and science reveals the whole World as his true and only producer or creator.

But now the scene is to be reversed as we come to the subjective order. We are, in this lecture, to imagine man from the lofty summit upon which objective science has placed him, as the crown and intelligence of the World, to turn back, and to use this wonderful intelligence to inquire:

What of this World of Nature and of Man?
How am I related to it?
How shall I regard it?
It seems to tell me whence I am.
But what shall I be in it?
Whither shall I go, with it, or from it?
What shall I do, and why?
What am I here for?

Such are the questions Man has ever asked since he began to think at all, and the "Religions" of the world are merely his attempts at an answer. They were childish answers or religions in the infancy of our race, and they have developed more and more in science and sense from age to age. They have passed among intelligent peoples, from Fetich animism to Polytheistic art, to Monotheistic intensity and war, to Positive science and its human knowledge, industry, peace, devotion, and love.

Let it it be remembered, then, that Science is simply the last "Religion" of the world. That is to say, it is the last and best explanation of the World, which Man has been able to make.

It is not only the last, but as was shown in the previous lecture, it is the only true, verifiable, and reliable one.

The first and the great question, then, of our age is, Can the great ever-standing religious questions,

"Whence am I?
Whither go I?
What shall I do?"

be answered at all, under the Scientific or Positive solution of the World and Man. If they can be answered, is it not quite evident that the answer must be of transcendent importance? If we can get a true, verifiable, reliable response to these questions from Science, must it not, in every intelligent mind, take the place of the nescience and superstition of childhood, with its myths, goblins, gods, devils, and fairy tales? But as the first step, and in order to give any answer—that is, any religious answer—at all to these questions, the scientific man must recognize that he must reverse his position in the objective order, and look at the world from himself, as its subject, or nominative case. He must try to parse and construe the world as the object of his own feeling, thought, and activity.

In other words, the "Sentence of Existence" is read and parsed thus, as the grammar and basis of all Science and Philosophy:

	Object. 1.	Verb. 2.	Subject. 3.
1. Obj. Order:	THE WORLD	PRODUCES (develops)	MAN.
2. Subj. Order:	THE WORLD (uses)	PERCEIVES	MAN

All religions are the readings that Man has made of the World from this subjective point of view. That point of view is inevitable, because the world is infinite, and his synthesis or philosophy of it cannot be otherwise than his own at bottom. The trouble in the past has been that childish man had no objective science to underlie and correct his subjective view, and so he put theologic and illusionary imagination, or limited and superficial knowledge, as the foundation of his subjective interpretation or religion.

Now Science must take, because it cannot avoid, the same point of view, but it must place the true objective reading of the world, in the place of theologic ignorance or imperfect knowledge, in the solution of Man's lot and fate on earth. The greatest question of the age is, then, What is the subjective order of human life which will accord with, and be the correlative of, the objective and true order of the World. In a word, how shall the new and true religion take the place of the old and false with its base of illusions?

It will be impossible to read the list of works which precedes these lectures without perceiving that these new "Gospels of Science" recognize, or at least tacitly assume, this Subjective and religious position, and, we may say, obligation, of Science. The first harmony under this point of view is that recognition, viz.:

I.—"THAT IN ORDER TO DESTROY YOU MUST REPLACE;" THAT SCIENCE IS SOCIALLY AND MORALLY CONSTRUCTIVE, AFFIRMATIVE, AND RELIGIOUS* IN ITS TENDENCIES AND ULTIMATE RESULTS.

That is to say, that as man becomes more scientific he must become really and truly more religious, though less and less theological.

It is not necessary to explain again and again how this word, "religion," has at last become divorced from theology in the usage of Liberals and of most all intelligent people. Like many similar words, it has at last attained to a true and distinct scientific meaning. It is the sum and bend of Man to the World, his Fellows, and his Future. As we pass under the realm of Science old words, like old coins, do not become valueless. Their real value in the true currency of the world becomes defined, and with a new and true qualification they continue their mission of usefulness. Thus the New Faith need not strike, and really has not stricken, a single word from our language, but it has given clear and good meanings to many words which were before false or confused.†

Let no one then be repulsed by the use of the words "Religion" or "Gospel" of Humanity because they have been appropriated wholly by theology in the past. They now pass into the domain and use of the highest science, the science of collective Man. They mean that as the real relations of man, society, and the world become known, his practical and highest life must be administered, governed, and bound, i. e., re-ligated or re-ligioned by those relations.

Man's life will be solved by consciously and intelligently adapting his nature to the World or modifying the world, where he can, to conform it to him.

This is the subjective or religious problem in which he takes his position at and as the head of the World, and makes or regards it as a part of himself. This constructive, affirmative, human, and religious character of science is substantially asserted in the last two Harmonies of Prof. Fiske cited in our first lecture, and this tendency is now fully admitted and cherished by all Liberal scientists worthy of the name.

By that phrase we mean scientists who are free, that is, practically emancipated from theology and metaphysics.

It is this all-important religious use and meaning of science that makes it an inspiration to the noble souls of the age, such as Goethe, Comte, and Mill. It means that Science has taken as her own, not merely the objective world, but the destiny and duty of man's life as based upon it. Thus in our "Positive Classification," it not only includes the two lower divisions, sensation and intellect, but the two higher, will and emotion. All there is of man falls within the scientific province. No question or subject that concerns him can be omitted. The order of science is the foundation of the order of art, and of all human endeavor which ever lies and depends upon its objective base. The solution of human life is the adapting of these two orders each to the other.

How this adaptation of Man to the World should be made, to what end this human will should count, and how it may count most "in the order of events," is the question of life, government, society, and now of all science! For the human will from its mountain hight of objective science turns back upon the Cosmos and says, Be in order for me, for my needs, and uses, and ideals, and where I cannot modify or change thy order, let me annex it to me as if a part of myself.

"That to the beautiful order of thy works
We may conform the order of our lives."

So much seemed necessary to say to explain the change of the scientific and intellectual view under the SUBJECTIVE ORDER.

But what position do the emotions hold under this new point of view?

No question is more important than this, and it must be the next one considered.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

*This use of the word "religion" is explained at length, together with many similar words, in "An Epitome of the Positive Philosophy and Religion," written by the lecturer, and to be had at the TRUTH SEEKER office, price 25 cts.

Its old meaning under the Ptolemaic astronomy falls with that system, as was shown in our last lecture. The metaphysical meaning, as the totality of existence, also falls under the scientific idea of Infinity, which has no totality, whole, or system at all. But the word has gained a true meaning when applied to that which does "turn upon itself," viz. the Solar System, which more directly of all of the heavenly bodies concerns Man, and which is considered as a whole in and of itself. The derivatives, universal, university, etc., may thus still, and very properly, retain their old and familiar uses and meanings, though universe, from which they were formed or to which they are related, must change its base or become a pseudo theological or metaphysical conception.

The only new word as yet introduced by the New Faith is Comte's word, altruism (from French altrui—others), to signify the social and benevolent part of human nature, which is opposed by egoism. But for more of this see the "Epitome."

CHAPTER XXI.

THE DOGMAS AND METAPHYSICAL TEACHINGS OF THE PRIMITIV CHRISTIANS.—CONCERNING JULIAN.

Justin, who lived under Antoninus, was the first one who possessed a touch of that which we call philosophy. He was also one of the first who gave due credit to the oracles of the sibyls, to the new Jerusalem, and to the six years' sojourn of Jesus Christ upon the earth. He pretended that all the science of the Greeks came from the Jews. He certified in his second apology for the Christians that the gods were only devils who came in the form of demons and witches to lay with men and women, and that Socrates was compelled to drink hemlock because he preached to the Athenians that truth.

We do not see how any one before the time of Christ could hav spoken of the mystery of the trinity, as we speak of it to-day. If only Justin's work had not been falsified; he, in his exposition of the doctrin of faith, clearly says, "In the beginning there was only one godhead in three individualities, the father, the son, and the Holy Ghost. . . The father is not begotten, but the Holy Ghost proceeds from him."* But in order to explain the trinity in a manner different from Plato, he compares the trinity to Adam. He said that Adam was not created; he mingled himself with his descendants, and thus the father commingled with the father and the Holy Ghost. Justin also wrote against Aristotle. If, as we are assured, Aristotle did not understand himself, it is certain that Justin understood him less.

He assures us in Article xliii of his answers for the orthodox that men and women shall be resuscitated with their generativ organs, since they will be a perpetual reminder that without them they would never hav known Jesus Christ, and would never hav been born. All the fathers, without exception, hav reasoned like Justin; and in truth, to lead the ignorant it is not necessary to reason in any better way. Locke and Newton did not hav the true religion.

To conclude, Justin and all the fathers who succeeded him believed with Plato in the preëxistence of souls. They admit that the soul is a spirit—a kind of air, or wind, or invisible gas which is a composition of subtil material. "The soul is evidently composed of something," says Tatien in his sermon to the Greeks, "or else how could it manifest itself in the body?" Arnobe speaks more positivly of the embodiment of the soul. "Who could not see," said he, "that the soul which is immortal and simple cannot suffer from grief? The soul is only the ferment of life, the viscidity of an indissoluble substance." Fermentum vitae, rei dissociabilis glutinum.

CHAPTER XXII.

CONCERNING TERTULLIAN.

The African Tertullian lived after Justin. The metaphysician Malebranche, a man celebrated in his country, called Tertullian a fool, and the writings of that African justified Malebranche. The only work of Tertullian that any one reads in the present time is his "Apology for the Christian Religion." Abaddie† and Houteville regarded this work as a chef d'œuvre. They failed to cite any passage from it. The great merit of this book in their eyes consisted in abusing the Romans instead of praising them; in imputing crimes to them and petulantly repeating assertions which prove nothing whatever.

He reproached the Romans (chap. ix) because the

*It is very probable that these words were interpolated in the text of Justin, for how could Justin, who lived so long after Lactantius, hav spoken of the trinity, while Lactantius had only spoken of the father and son?

It is very evident that the Christians would never hav adopted the doctrin of the trinity but for the teachings of the Platonist of their sect. "The trinity is a doctrin from Plato, and is certainly not a doctrin of Jesus Christ's, since he never had spoken of it in his village [1771].

"Saint Justin," says Potter, "attempted continually to prove the duality or doubleness, never the tripleness or trinity, of the Christian God. And when he advances from this point he cites passages from the Old Testament where God manifests himself plurally, from which he draws favorable conclusions about the divinity of Jesus, without the least mention of a sacred spirit—a third god or a third part of the same god."

people of Carthage in secret sacrifices immolated their children upon the altars to Saturn, in spite of the express commands of the emperors forbidding such under the penalty of capital punishment.* This was an occasion for praising the wisdom of the Romans, and not for insulting them. He reproached them for permitting gladiatorial combats between ferocious animals and condemned criminals. This was merely a method by which the Romans permitted the condemned to save their lives. For this they deserve praise; but for their voluntary gladiatorial combats Tertullian should hav condemned them. He does not even speak of this.

He ventures to say (chap. xxiii): "Bring me your celestial virgin who promises rain, and your Esculapius who saves lives for those who would hav them after a little. If they do not confess that they are in league with the devil (and they dare not lie before a Christian), then let us spill the blood of that rash Christian. What is more manifest? What is more proven?"

At all this the wise reader will answer: What is more extravagant and more fanatical than that discourse? How could these fellows tell the first converted Christians that they were devils? In what age, and at what place was such a prodigy seen? It is possible that Tertullian was quite sure that the Romans would never read such a ridiculous apology, and that the statues of Esculapius were not given him to be exorcised, because he dared to advance such absurdities.

His thirty-second chapter, of which I hav never spoken, is a remarkable one. "We pray to God," he said, "for the emperor and for the empire; but that is beeause we know that the dissolution which menaces the universe, and end of the ages, will be delayed by it."

Unhappy man! You would never hav prayed for your masters unless you had thought that the world would still exist. What was it Tertullian said in his barbarous Latin? What did he mean by "the reign of a thousand years?" Did he understand that the end of the world was announced by Luke and Paul, but that the time had not come? Did he mean that a Christian could by means of his prayers prevent God from making an end to the world, after God had so resolved? Is not that the idea of one possessed by the devil, who is really able to put sense into some people?

*Is there anything more ridiculous than Tertullian's reproach of the Romans, because the Carthagenians violated wise and good laws, and secretly sacrificed their children?

But what is more horrible than, as he says in the same chapter (nine) que plusieurs dames romaines avient le sperme de-leurs amants? What relation can there be between such licentiousness and religion?

Tertullian was really a fool. His book on the Mantel is sufficient proof. He says that he changed his dress for a cloak because the serpent changes his skin and the peacocks their feathers. Such are the reasons by which he proves his Christianity. Fanaticism can hav no better reasons [1771].

Children's Liberal Literature.

It seems as if some of THE TRUTH SEEKER contributors who hav been agitating this subject were not aware that all the best children's books now in the world were written by Infidels. "Sanford and Merton," and "The Evenings at Home" were in my childhood standard. Neither of them contain an allusion to religion, except here and there a very slight one, in which the mature eye at once recognizes a sarcasm. "Helen's Babies," and the later works of the same author, deliberately hold orthodox education up to ridicule. I hav found them very amusing and disillusiv to my children. The "Nursery" and "Chatterbox" are, I believe, free from all taint of orthodoxy. I speak of the original "Chatterbox"—will not answer for the other. The stories of Miss Edgeworth, adapted to children from their very earliest period to maturity, are destitute of the least allusion to religion, their world-famous author being an Infidel or Deist of the eighteenth century type. Miss Martineau, a later and more extreme Infidel, wrote much for children. Mrs. Trimmer's and Mrs. Marcet's famous series are of a similar Agnostic character. These books are mostly rather old-fashioned now, but they liv, while the whole ambitious swarm of orthodox child-literature expires "before the sun." "Robinson Crusoe" was written by a Christian, but not originally as a child's story. A very little expurgation will take all the superstition out of it. The one-syllable version now so popular, contains, I believe, nothing worse than pure Deism. Some of Mrs. Marcet's scientific works may need a little revision; but I would be satisfied if I could get for my family a good new edition of the above, with one positivly Infidel child's history. I should think you could make money out of such an edition, if some one will write the history. History is a much-neglected branch of education—a very bad omen for the republic by-the-bye—and it is the battle-ground of both the orthodox and the Freethinker.

PART II.—NO. 67.

749. Mosheim bears this testimony: "The interest of virtue and true religion suffered yet more grievously by the monstrous errors that were almost universally adopted in this century (the fourth), and became a source of innumerable calamities and mischief in the succeeding ages. The first of these maxims was that it was an act of virtue to deceive and lie when by that means the interest of the church might be promoted; and the second, equally horrible, though in another point of view, was that errors in religion, when maintained and adhered to after proper admonition, were punishable with civil penalties and corporeal tortures. The former of these erroneous maxims was now of long standing; it had been adopted for some ages past. and had produced an incredible number of ridiculous fables, ficitious prodigies, and pious frauds, to the unspeakable detriment of that glorious cause in which they were employed. And it must be frankly confessed that the greatest men and most eminent saints of this century were more or less tainted with the infection of this corrupt principle, as will appear evident to such as look with an attentive eye to their writings and actions. We would willingly except from this charge Ambrose and Hilary, Augustine, Gregory, Nazianzen, and Jerome, but truth, which is more reputable than these venerable fathers, obliges us to involve them in the general accusation." He further observes: "At the time when he [Hermas] wrote, it was an established maxim with many of the Christians to avail themselves of fraud and deception if it was likely they would conduce toward the attainment of any considerable good." "And it was considered," he again says, "that they who made it their business to deceive, with a view of promoting the cause of truth, were deserving rather of commendation than censure" (Eccl. Hist., vol. ii, chap. 3). This policy of deception and falsehood has been kept up in the Christian church during all the centuries that have supervened. We see it in our own times and in both divisions of the church. It is but recently that Chancellor Howard Crosby, the leading divine of the Presbyterian church in America, stood up in a public meeting in New York city and defended fraud and falsehood, when at the same time he rejoiced over the imprisonment of the writer of these pages. He approved of the fraud that had been used in that case, and avowed himself an advocate of falsehood. I do not believe in that kind of religion; honest paganism is far preferable to it.

750. A French Protestant says: "It mightily affects me to see how many there were in the earliest times of the church who considered it a capital exploit to lend to heavenly truth the help of their own inventions in order that the new doctrine might be received by the wise among the Gentiles. These officious lies, they said, were devised for a good end." Le Clerc, assenting to these statements of Casaubon, observes that "dissemblers of truth are nowhere to be met with in such abundance as among the writers of church history." Paul himself proved himself an advocate of deception and falsehood; these are some of his moral sentiments: "But be it so, I did burden you; nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you with guile." "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" "For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more. And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law; to them that are without laws as without law (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ), that I might gain them that are with law. To the weak because I am weak, that I might gain the weak; I made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some." A truly honest man would hardly say this false course is more commendable than one strictly upright and truthful.

751. There are many individual cases of deceit, duplicity, and imposture all the way down till now. Bishop Horsely, in his reply to Priestly, stated that "Origen was not incapable of asserting in argument what he believed not, and that a strict regard for truth in disputation was not one of the virtues of his character." The bishop further adds, "Time was when the practice of using unjustifiable means to serve a good cause was openly avowed, and Origen himself was among its defenders." Next let us glance again at Irenæus. Dr. Whitby accuses him and Papias with "having scandalously deluded the world with fables and lying narrations." Mosheim says of Justin Martyr, "Much of what Justin says is wholly undeserving of credit." St. Jerome, who stood very high among the early fathers, and translator of the Vulgate, very pointedly says, "I do not find fault with an error which proceeds from a hatred toward the Jews, and a pious zeal for the Christian faith." Nazianzen, often surnamed "the Divine," frankly admitted to Father Jerome that "a little jargon is all that is necessary to impose upon the people. The less they comprehend the more they admire. Our forefathers and doctors of the church have often said, not what they thought, but what circumstances and necessity dictated to them." Bishop Heliodorus, in his "Romance of Theagues and Charicles," frankly admits, "A falsehood is a good thing when it aids the speaker, and does no injury to the hearers." St. Synesius declared early in the fifth century: "The people were desirous of being deceived. We cannot act otherwise respecting them." St. Hermas, one of the co-laborers with Paul, wrote a gospel from which the following passage is taken: "O Lord, I never spoke a true word in my life, but I have always lived in dissimulation and affirmed a lie for truth to all men, and no man contradicted me, but all gave credit to my words." To which it is claimed the holy angel to whom Hermas was addressing himself made reply thus: "As the lie is now up you had better keep it up, as in time it will come to be believed, and will answer as well as the truth." Honest lovers of the truth do not believe in this doctrine, and cannot affiliate with it.

752. In the reply from the Unitarians to Dr. Magee this language is used: "This text is an impious forgery. It appears to be little less than blasphemy to retain it in a book which is represented to be inspired." Similar charges are in other places made by the Unitarians against all the verses in the first chapter of Luke, after the fourth. The whole of the second chapter is pronounced "spurious," and only to "serve the purpose of certain sects." The same with the first chapter of Matthew after the seventeenth verse, and the whole of the second. The eminent Methodist, Dr. Adam Clarke, in his commentary on the Bible, protests against those passages in the third chapter of Genesis, which declare that Eve was tempted by a serpent, and insists that it was a monkey and not a serpent. Mr. Bellamy declares that the story in the Old Testament about Balaam and his ass is a complete misrepresentation, and ought to be immediately "revised." He further says: "Really, it is time you should get rid of such childish notions. To say any more on such absurd conclusions would be a waste of time. Depend upon it that whatever they may do now, asses never spoke in the time of Balaam." Bellamy must be credited with having more good sense than many who have more faith.

753. "According to the Unitarian version," says Cooper, "there are no less than one hundred and fifty thousand readings of the scriptures, all of which are more or less different. And this book about which such innumerable and serious difficulties exist, and that, too, against the most learned of our race, is the only book which is to guide us to everlasting truth and joy. I am apprehensive it will prove a blind guide, for if there are so many contradictory readings as declared by the Unitarians, it will be one hundred and forty nine thousand nine hunlred and ninety-nine to one if we have the right one." The foregoing quotations are taken from Cooper, and it must be admitted they are quite sufficient to shake the belief of any thoughtful person in the integrity and truthfulness of the scriptures. My belief in them as inspired words from heaven is slight in the extreme.

754. Truth compels the admission that thousands of errors of copyists, errors of translation, are to be added to the great number of wilful errors purposely inserted into the scriptures by false and designing priests and bishops who for centuries had the existing copies of the scriptures under their sole charge. King James's translation was published in 1511. In 1711 it was corrected by Bishops Tenison and Lloyd, thousands of errors having thus been discovered and expurgated. In 1669 Dr. Blayney corrected a multitude of errors, reformed the text in many places, and rectified many material errors in chronology. More recently the "British and Foreign Bible Society, after having circulated millions of copies, have declared that a faithful examination of it gives rise to serious doubts whether it can be truthfully called the word of God." The American Bible Society, in 1847, appointed a committee of its members to prepare a standard edition of King James's translation free from typographical errors. They prepared such an edition, correcting, as they stated, twenty-four thousand errors, but so alarmed did they become at the attacks made upon it by those who were opposed to correcting any errors that might exist, that it was withdrawn, as they dared not to put it in circulation. The Bible Society continues to this day to print and send over the world a book as the "word of God" containing by their own admissions not less than twenty-four thousand positive errors. And for ten years past the Bible Revision Committee, consisting of learned scholars from both hemispheres, have been busily engaged in London at getting up a revised edition of the scriptures. The New Testament has already been issued and has received a very extensive reading, but though great numbers of the errors have been corrected, it still abounds in errors, interpolations, and inaccuracies. Although it is said that the revision committee have corrected one hundred and fifty thousand errors of one kind and another, it is still a most imperfect, incongruous, remodeled, and bejumbled affair; and though it may have as many revisions as it has errors, it will still be a very imperfect, untruthful, inaccurate, misguiding, man-made affair. I do not believe anything else can be made of it.

Three Things.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: There are three things I try to call your attention to every year. Two are use of the twin abominations of liquor and tobacco as evils to be eradicated, and the third is the value of some good magazine for children. I've written my temperance articles, and now I will do my work for the blessing. It is far more pleasant to speak words of praise than of condemnation, so with a glad call of cheer I bring before your notice my new pet and favorit, Our Little Ones and the Nursery, two of the very best magazines for children combined in one and for the price of one. It is just splendid. My specimen number is literally worn out with lending. The school children hav learned pieces from it to speak, and old and young hav read it. It is beautifully illustrated, and the print is clear and plain. Th. articles are written by good authors, and contain good and useful ideas as well as valuable instruction. It is as nearly clear of religious teachings as any magazine of the day. I think few persons who hav children under twelve years of age will find any present as acceptable as well as as useful as this lovely little visitor, which will come a whole year freshly freighted with glad greetings for only $1.50. Christianity as a Civilizer.

Most men of intelligence will readily concede that the tendency of religion is to petrify men in one form. To be religious a man must believe just so much and no more. His mind must be stagnant. He must be a Bourbon—neither learning nor forgetting, neither going ahead nor retreating.

But the Christian asserts that his religion is an exception, that to it the world owes all progress, all material prosperity, while all the evil is ascribed to the influence of Infidels, to the spread of Freethought. Christianity must claim all this, else its influence and power wane and the priests must look elsewhere for a livelihood.

It has been always the case that the church has opposed innovation, progress, invention, in short, all science, as long as it could, and when compelled to retreat from its untenable position, has turned round and claimed the credit of championing the advance. So it was in the abolition of slavery, the church praying the negro into slavery and keeping him there with texts from the Bible, hurling anathema after anathema at the heads of the Abolitionists for wanting him free. But when the Infidel Lincoln struck his fetters off the church turned round and said, Behold our work. Proof that the church did nothing can be found in thousands of sermons, in the fact that the aiders and abettors of the whip-scarred slave were Infidels and Quakers, and further that all the old prominent Abolitionists are now in the ranks of the Freethinkers, lecturing and working for the emancipation of white men's minds from a slavery no less degrading, from a thraldom no less galling, than physical slavery.

The influence of Christianity upon the world has been conservativ. Its measures are the measures of hundreds of years ago. The church is the coffin of science, the graveyard of ideas. Churchman is but another name for a fossil; orthodoxy is a mausoleum wherein is laid the mummied intellects of all the centuries.

The late Prof. Draper, who is one of the best authorities on the conflict, says: "The history of science is not the mere record of isolated discoveries; it is the narrativ of the conflict of two contending powers, the expansiv force of the human intellect on one side, and the compression arising from traditionary faith and human interests on the other." This "expansiv force of the human intellect" is the brave heretics which every age has produced—pioneers in clearing the way through theological labyrinths; the traditionary faith is the church; the human interests the efforts of a priesthood to enslave mankind. The interests of the church was and is best subserved by keeping the people ignorant. Knowledge of the shallowness and falseness of the claims of the self-appointed ministers is a dangerous weapon to put into the hands of a layman, and the authorities of the church knew it. They know it now better than ever, and that is why we hear this persistent reiteration of the service Christianity has rendered to the world. If the priests can only make the people believe they are or hav been of some use they hope to retain their sinecures. To hear the churchmen talk one would think their establishment had done nothing but build colleges for the spread of science, when every one knows that the pages of history are red with the blood of thousands of martyrs to science. Every man who gave birth to a new thought was hunted down and slain, if priestly power could do it. "As to science, she has never," as the same author says, "sought to ally herself to civil power. She has never attempted to throw odium or inflict social ruin on any human being. She has never subjected any one to mental torment, physical torture, least of all to death, for the purpose of upholding or promoting her ideas. She presents herself unstained by cruelties and crimes. But in the Vatican—we hav only to recall the Inquisition—the hands that are now raised in appeals to the Most Merciful are crimsoned. They hav been steeped in blood. The church was overthrown in the conflict as to the shape of the earth; in her insistence that the earth is the central and most important part of the universe; and also in the controversy respecting the age of the world.

Who does not remember Hypatia and Cyril—philosophy and Christian bigotry! As Cyril treated Hypatia so has the church in all ages treated philosophy and science. The fate of the gifted woman was intended by the church as a warning to all who would cultivate profane learning.

Can any one believe that a religion that would burn a Bruno has any sympathy with the science he taught? Bruno was an Infidel. He doubted transubstantiation and the immaculate conception. He was also a devoted student of science, and for these things he was consigned to the flames. How the church did love the heretic! how she aided science! Sacred science was confined to four propositions, every one of which has been disproved. They were: 1. That the date of creation was not more than four or five thousand years before Christ; 2. That the world was made in six days from nothing; 3. That the deluge was universal, and the animals which survived it were preserved in the ark; 4. That Adam was created perfect, but fell in consequence of having been tempted to eat an apple.

All science outside of these ridiculous and untenable propositions was of the devil, and its promulgators were given in this world a foretaste of what their heavenly father was preparing for them in the next. Errors in religion, even, were punished with corporal tortures, and errors in this "sacred science" were promptly followed by death.

As for philosophy, the church, Protestant and Catholic, did all it could to discourage its study. The Catholics murdered Hypatia; and Luther and Melancthon, the leaders of the Reformation, were determined to banish it from the church. "Luther declared that the study of Aristotle is wholly useless; his vilification of that Greek philosopher knew no bounds. 'He is,' says Luther, 'truly a devil, a horrid calumniator, a wicked sycophant, a prince of darkness, a real Apollyon, a beast, a most horrid impostor on mankind, one in whom there is scarcely any philosophy, a public and professed liar, a goat, a complete epicure, this twice execrable Aristotle.' The schoolmen were, so Luther said, 'locusts, caterpillars, frogs, lice.' These opinions were also entertained by Calvin." The worthies held that the Bible contained the sum and substance of all knowledge useful or possible to man. Everything in physical science or in philosophy must lie upon the procrustean bed of the Pentateuch.

And yet the leaders of Christianity teach that to Christianity we owe the civilization of this century. They are, indeed, blind teachers of the blind. If there is one invention of importance, one step forward in progress, one new fact in science that has not been fought by the church, we do not remember it. Printing, the art that has done so much for the world, was to the churchmen of the middle ages the work of the devil. Steam locomotion was, according to them, an idea which proceeded from the same source; the idea of sending a vessel across the ocean propelled by steam was thought by a Christian community to be flying in the face of providence. God had made the winds to fill the sails, and to use any other power was sacrilege. The telegraph met with pious opposition. Grave old deacons solemnly protested against putting lightning-rods upon houses because God made the lightning and hurled the bolts from his own hand. To thwart his will was, to say the least, very impious. The fanning-mill was blasphemy.

No one dares claim that Christianity ever had a kindly feeling for science. The primitiv church was for abolishing all philosophy from within its limits. During the hundreds of years when the church swayed her scepter over the old world all was intellectual darkness. Scarcely a layman could be found who could sign his own name. While the Moors and Mohammedans were making vast strides forward the Christians were persecuting them, burning every book it could lay its hands on and beheading every man who wrote them. Magnificent libraries were ruthlessly consigned to the flames. The astronomy of the church consisted in saying the earth was flat, and the sun, moon, and stars were lights set by God in the firmament. Its physicians consulted the entrails of sheep and nailed bloody tokens to the doors of houses to influence the sex of children. All the knowledge they got must first be measured by the Bible.

If persecuting every student of nature, every one who endeavored to help mankind rise from low savagery to enlightened civilization, is retarding progress, then the Christian church has certainly been a bane to the world. It opposed astronomy and imprisoned the astronomers. It opposed medicin, and burned the doctors. It has waged a continuous warfare upon science. In the fourteenth century the church burned alive a man of seventy years because he said the earth was round, and one of the greatest painters of the time represented him as struggling in the flames of hell. Every one knows what Galileo suffered for his heresy. The existence of the antipodes was denied because "the apostles were commanded to go into all the world and to preach the gospel to every creature. They did not go to any such part of the world as the antipodes, they did not preach to any creature there, ergo, no antipodes exist."

When Columbus said that by sailing west a new continent might be discovered, he was laughed to scorn by the learned men of the church. No such continent was mentioned in the Bible; therefore it did not exist. The theologians overwhelmed him with quotations from the Psalms, from St. Paul, from Augustine. Even after he had demonstrated the truth of his theory of the earth's sphericity the church, by its highest authority, again committed itself to the theory of its flatness.

Magellan encountered the same opposition from the Christians. Even after he sailed around the earth the church still swore it was flat.

Can it be said that the science of geography owes anything to the church?

For thirty-six years Copernicus did not dare publish his "Revolution of the Heavenly Bodies." And when he did the church burnt his book, and had he not died would undoubtedly hav served the author in the same way. Martin Luther, the great apostle of Protestant Christianity, said: "People gave ear to an upstart astrologer, who strove to show that the earth revolves, not the heavens or the firmament, the sun and moon. Whoever wishes to appear clever must devise some new system, which of all systems is, of course, the very best. This fool wishes to reverse the entire science of astronomy. But sacred scripture tells us that Joshua commanded the sun to stand still and not the earth." Melancthon, another great light of the church, said substantially the same. And so did the whole Christian world.

The doctrin of Copernicus was denounced by the church as "heretical" and "atheistic." The Dominican father Caccini said that "geometry is of the devil, and mathematicians should be banished as the authors of all heresies," and for this scientific utterance he was promoted by the church. The bishop of Fiesole screamed in rage against the system. The archbishop of Pisa sought to deliver Galileo to the Inquisition. The archbishop of Florence condemned the doctrin as unscriptural. The whole Christian church took up arms against the heresy, and Galileo was finally imprisoned by the Inquisition.

Christianity was in existence fifteen centuries before it produced an astronomer, and when one arose the church persecuted him so that he delayed publishing his work over thirty years.

Can it be said that the science of astronomy owes anything to the Christian religion?

Medicin was also opposed to the church. St. Augustine speaks of the "medical men who are called anatomists," and says that "with a cruel zeal for science they hav dissected the bodies of the dead, and hav pried into the secrets of the human body to learn the nature of disease and how it might be cured." In the thirteenth century Pope Innocent III. forbad surgical operations. Pope Honorius forbad medicine to be practiced by those under his spiritual authority. The Dominicans banished books on medicin. Pope Boniface VIII. interdicted dissection as sacrilege. The greatest physician of the time was accused of sorcery, and of dealing with the devil. The archbishop of Tarragona excommunicated him. He was driven from Paris and Montpellier, and finally every place in France was closed against him and he became an outcast. According to the church all the astronomers were Infidels and Atheists, and the chemists and physicians were sorcerers and leaguers with the devil. Even inoculation for the cure of small-pox, for which Christian physicians contend so strenuously now, was denounced as of the devil; and the use of chloroform in obstetrical operations was opposed as avoiding the primeval curse of woman pronounced by God in the Garden.

Can it be said that medicin is indebted to Christianity for the progress it has made?

Geology and geologists suffered the same persecutions at the hands of the churchmen. From the first inception of this science war was waged upon it, for the church saw in it, as it had in astronomy, the complete overthrow of the Mosaic account of creation. The Christian idea was that God made everything just as we see it at the beginning, and to say that anything had been made since was heresy. In the sixteenth century the faculty of Paris destroyed all treatises on geology, banished the authors from Paris, and forbad them to liv in towns or enter places of public resort. In the middle of the eighteenth century Buffon attempted to state simple and fundamental geological truths, when the theogolcal faculty of the Sorbonne set upon him, forced him to recant, and to print his recantation. And the most bitter war upon this science was waged by Protestants, English theologians being the most fierce.

It can hardly be claimed that Christianity did much for geology.

And so it has been with all sciences. Even the rude science of agriculture was opposed by the church. The peasants of Russia were at one time interdicted from raising and eating potatoes. As before mentioned, the use of the fanning-mill was blasphemous, and contrary to the text that the "wind bloweth where it listeth;" and in the early part of this century such use was considered as being in league with the devil, and sufficient excuse for excommunication from the Scotch church. The introduction of railways into France was declared by an archbishop to be an evidence of divine displeasure against country tavern-keepers who had given their guests meat on fast-days, and railroads and telegraphs were denounced from hundreds of pulpits as being "heralds of Antichrist." The discussion of the question whether man sprung from one pair or several pairs was in our own country but a few years ago declared Atheistic, and the proposer of the question was called to order and silenced by a noted Protestant divine. At one time it was held by the church that any map of the world that did not place Jerusalem in the center was impious. The taking of a census was denounced in Sweden and our country by the church. Life insurance, too, has been regarded as blasphemous. The writings of Darwin, Huxley, Lyell, and others hav been denounced by archbishops as "shameful theories," and fatal to morality. A college of medicin was, but a few years ago, denounced because one of its professors could find no soul in man.

Christianity, as a religion, has never done anything for the education of humanity. Some men hav arisen in all ages, who, although Christians, could not be kept down by the church, and they hav founded schools and advanced science. But the church has always hunted them as heretics. Could Copernicus, Galileo, Bruno, Bacon, speak from their almost forgotten graves they could tell how Christianity aided science in the Middle Ages. And wherever the church got control of a school it either destroyed it or confined its teachings to the arithmetical problem of how to make one three or three one. It was not Christianity that founded universities, but the irresistible spirit of progression which the church could not wholly repress. The Roman Catholic church hated the Reformation, yet the Reformation came. Christians might as well claim that the Church aided that as to say Christianity aided science. The nearest approach to a perfect Christian institution was the Inquisition, which Paramo of Sicily traces from the Almighty down through the patriarchs Moses, Nebuchadnezzar, and King David.

The church has been the great drag upon the world, keeping it back as long as she was able, and then when anything has been accomplished in spite of her she has claimed the credit. We could multiply these instances a thousand fold. But we hav said enough to show that to the Christian religion the world is indebted for nothing, while to the brave, persistent efforts of heretics it owes everything. Thus far science has conquered in every case. As Prof. White says, "There has never been a scientific theory framed from the use of scriptural texts, wholly or partially, which has been made to stand." Every time the Bible and the church hav had to giv way to science and scientific methods. Religious men hav accomplished much; the Christian religion has done nothing. It has been a tremendous obstacle to all reforms, all advancement. But men are rapidly learning its true worth, and it will not be many years ere they will laugh to scorn its pretensions as a civilizer, and he will be a brave minister indeed (or else idiotic) who will claim that it is anything but a bundle of superstitions and traditions which should be laid on the same shelf as the mythology of the pagan gods.

If any of our friends hav a Truth Seeker of August 27, 1881, No 35, and will send it to us we shall feel very greatly obliged, as we are short that number for our bound volumes. If those who send will mark their name and address upon the wrapper, we will send them any 10 cent pamphlet they may wish.

We hav just received from Mr. Bennett several long letters, which will defer the publication of the first volume of his travels for several weeks, so the Round-the-World list will be open for some time yet, and we shall be pleased to add more names. We want a thousand to make expenses, as the New Englanders say.

"Whence and Whither."

In a remote corner of the Congressional cemetery yesterday afternoon, a small group of people with uncovered heads ranged around a newly-opened grave. They included Detectiv and Mrs. George O. Miller, and family and friends, who had gathered to witness the burial of the former's bright little son Harry. As the casket rested upon the trestles, there was a painful pause broken only by the mother's sobs, until the undertaker advanced toward a stout, florid-complexioned gentleman in the party and whispered to him. This gentleman was Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, a friend of the Millers, who attended the funeral at their request. He shook his head when the undertaker first addressed him, and then said suddenly, "Does Mr. Miller desire it?" The undertaker gave an affirmativ nod, Mr. Miller looked appealingly toward the noted orator, and then hastily Col. Ingersoll advanced to the side of the grave, made a motion denoting a desire for silence, and in a voice of exquisit cadence delivered one of his characteristic eulogies for the dead. The scene was intensely dramatic. A fine drizzling rain was falling, and every head was bent and every ear turned to catch the impassioned words that fell from the lips of the speaker. Col. Ingersoll was unprotected by either hat or umbrella, and his invocation thrilled his hearers with awe, each eye that had previously been bedimmed with tears brightening, and sobs becoming hushed. Col. Ingersoll said:

My Friends: I know how vain it is to gild a grief with words, and yet I wish to take from every grave its fear. Here in this world, where life and death are equal kings, all should be brave enough to meet what all the dead hav met. The future has been filled with fear, stained and polluted by the heartless past. From the wondrous tree of life the buds and blossoms fall with ripened fruit, and in the common bed of earth the patriarchs and babes sleep side by side.

Why should we fear that which will come to all that is? We cannot tell, we do not know, which is the greater blessing, life or death. We cannot say that death is not a good. We do not know whether the grave is the end of this life or the door of another, or whether the night here is not somewhere else a dawn. Neither can we tell which is the more fortunate—the child dying in its mother's arms before its lips hav learned to form a word, or he who journeys all the length of life's uneven road, painfully taking the last slow steps with staff and crutch.

Every cradle asks us "Whence?" and every coffin "Whither?" The poor barbarian, weeping above his dead, can answer these questions as intelligently and satisfactorily as the robed priest of the most authentic creed. The tearful ignorance of the one is just as consoling as the learned and unmeaning words of the other. No man, standing where the horizon of a life has touched a grave, has any right to prophesy a future filled with pain and tears. It may be that death givs all there is of worth to life. If those we press and strain against our hearts could never die, perhaps that love would wither from the earth. May be this common fate treads from out the paths between our hearts the weeds of selfishness and hate, and I had rather liv and love where death is king, than hav eternal life where love is not. Another life is naught, unless we know and love again the ones who love us here.

They who stand with breaking hearts around this little grave need hav no fear. The larger and the nobler faith in all that is and is to be tells us that death, even at its worst, is only perfect rest. We know that through the common wants of life—the needs and duties of each hour—their grief will lessen day by day, until at last this grave will be to them a place of rest and peace—almost of joy. There is for them this consolation: The dead do not suffer. If they liv again, their lives will surely be as good as ours. We hav no fear. We are all children of the same mother, and the same fate awaits us all. We, too, hav our religion, and it is this: Help for the living, hope for the dead.

At the conclusion of Col. Ingersoll's remarks, the little coffin, covered with beautiful and fragrant flowers, was lowered into its resting-place.

Liberal News.

We are obliged to the Weekly Record, of Scottdale, Pa., for its favor.

Charles Bright, the Australian Liberal lecturer, recently arrived at San Francisco.

The meetings of the Second Society of Spiritualists in Frobisher Hall hav been discontinued.

The House and Home newspaper didn't stay long out in the cold where ounce rates of postage prevail. Dr. Foote got his back up, and the government backed down.

The Toronto Globe says that one of Col. Ingersoll's daughters has joined the Presbyterian church. The Globe is a good Christian paper, and consequently don't mind lying a little for the glory of God.

The Rev. Joseph Lehman, a Berlin, Germany, minister, says that in that place the people hav for the most part given up the belief in God, and that the Bible has become a forsaken oracle. Good for Berlin!

T. B. Wakeman delivered the first of the course of lectures before the Society of Humanity, at Science Hall, last Sunday evening. The next one will be by Dyer D. Lum, on "Humanity and Castes: The Significance of the French Revolution."

The Liberal League executiv committee for the state of New York has been appointed, and consists of H. L. Green, chairman, Salamanca; O. H P. Kinney, Waverly; W. F. Graves, Castile; S. S. Ball, Penn Yan; Eugene M. Macdonald, New York city.

W. F. Jamieson gave lectures in Greensboro, Spiceland (where the Quakers have a large church of 700 members), and Knightstown, Ind., Dec. 29th, 30th, and 31st, and Jan. 1st; and six in Paxton, Ills., Jan. 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th. For lectures, address him at Albion, Mich.

Col. John R. Kelso recently lectured in Rochester on "Spiritualism from the Standpoint of the Bible." He has returned to Modesto, Cal. His book, the "Deity Analyzed, and The Devil's Defense" (price, $1.50), which we are printing, is nearly completed, and will be ready in a few weeks.

Warren Chase, of California, who has just closed a course of ten lectures in New York, lectured in Dr. Rhodes' hall, No. 505½ N. 8th street, Philadelphia, on Sunday, January 8th, at 11 A.M., on "Mediums and Mediumship," and at 7:30 P.M., on "What we Know and what we Believe about Spirit-life."

A series of able articles by Courtlandt Palmer, on "The Religion of Humanity," appeared lately in the N. Y. Sun. They hav called out much comment and discussion—so much that the editor givs notice that he must shut down. One anonymous divine, behind the screen of "A Reader," takes a wide survey of his own little parish, and denies that there is any rise in the Religion of Humanity or decline in the religion of God. He will "hear something drop" one of these days.

The Freethinkers of Greece hav determined to affiliate themselvs with the International Freethought Federation. The Syllogue Litteraire de Byron, of Athens, has written Mr. Bradlaugh, as chairman of the General Council, notifying him officially of the appointment of two representativs for the year 1882.

Charles Bradlaugh writes to the Investigator that he will probably visit this country next summer. He wishes to be kindly remembered to all his American friends. We hope he will come, and we know he will receive a hearty welcome. He has done an incalculable amount of good for Liberalism in England.

Dr. J. L. York is stirring up the dry bones of orthodoxy, and waking up the Liberal element in Sacramento, Cal. He will remain there until the 15th. He will be in Stockton Jan. 22d, 23d, and 24th, and in Modesto, Cal., on Jan. 27th, 28th, and 29th, at which time the Liberals of Modesto propose to hold a red-hot Paine Memorial meeting.

On the 16th of last month, Mr. Bennett writes us, he was just leaving for a nine-days' trip up the Nile. Two hundred and twenty-five miles were to be made by rail, and the rest by steamer. On his way he was to visit Thebes and Kamae. Letters to reach him should be directed care Oriental Bank Corporation, Colombo, Ceylon, Asia.

Mrs. H. S. Lake "had a run," as the theater folks say, of three month's lecturing before the League at Elgin, Ill. She is now called for two months of ministration at Burlington, Iowa. She will do well to look out—the Hawkeye will be upon her. W. F. Peck succeeds Mrs. Lake at Elgin. There will be music wherever he is around, and the children will flock to his Sunday-school.

Geo. P. Fisher, professor of ecclesiastical history in the Yale Divinity School, will attempt to answer Ingersoll in the February number of the North American Review. Judge Black seems to know when he is beaten, and withdraws from the contest. Let's see, isn't there somewhere something about somebody stepping in where angels don't like to walk? But then, Black isn't an angel, that we know of.

Notwithstanding the storm of last Sunday evening, a fine audience greeted Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith at Harvard Rooms, cor. 42d st. and Sixth ave.; and the interest manifested looks toward a new impetus so long needed in this city among that branch of Radical Liberalists known as Spiritualists. The lectures will continue during January at the same place, Sunday morning and evening. Their address is 1294 Park avenue.

The first number of This World is at hand, and is an exceedingly neat pamphlet. It consists of sixteen pages, divided into three parts. The first is, of course, Mr. Chainey's lecture in Paine Hall; the second a radical story by S. P. Putnam, of this city, entitled, "The Golden Throne;" the third contains a short story for the education of children in Liberal sentiments and principles. The story this week is by George Chainey, but hereafter it is to be by Aunt Elmina. The title of the main discourse is "This World," and is up to the usual high standard of excellence.

Moses Hull says "For some reason the Linesville, Pa., Liberal League hav not got quite ready to publish their program of the anniversary celebration of Thomas Paine's birthday, Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, January 28th, 29th, and 30th; but this much the president requests me to state, that is: We are going to hav the largest celebration ever held in western Pennsylvania. The speakers already positivly engaged to be here are J. H. Burnham, of Michigan; O. P. Kelley and A. H. Wright, of Ohio; A. B. Bradford and Moses and Mattie E. Hull, of Pennsylvania. Other speakers hav partly promised to be here. The friends hav arranged to entertain some from a distance, for others they obtain reduced fare at the hotels. The Liberals extend an invitation to ministers of good standing in their respectiv denominations to be present and take part in the exercises.

The 145th anniversary of the birth of Paine will be celebrated by our Boston friends at Paine Hall on Sunday and Monday, Jan. 29th and 30th. The following is the program:

A Letter from London.

Some excitement has been caused in this country by the report of a government balloon having carried away with it a member of the British Parliament, and there seems but little likelihood of its ever being heard of again. If such an event had occurred some centuries ago, among a barbaric people who knew nothing regarding these aerial vessels, it would hav excited great awe and wonderment, and some vague tradition would hav been handed down from generation to generation, embellished and enlarged upon by each successiv narrator. The unfortunate aeronaut would hav been represented as a deity or an angelic messenger who came down from heaven on a divine mission and mysteriously disappeared in course of time in a vehicle sent down for him by the great father of all.

In the Bible we see narrated the departure of Moses, Enoch, and Elijah in a most unaccountable manner. Jehovah killed and buried the first, took away the second, and sent down a fiery chariot for the last-named.

Presuming these tales are not pure fictions, they were doubtless founded on some very simple occurrences, though of a very remarkable nature to the ignorant people by whom these notables were surrounded. Judging by the biography of Elijah, he was a knowing sort of a man, and occasionally "astonished the nativs;" and as he would most likely prefer to end his life in a dramatic style, it may be within the range of probability that he went off in some sort of a flying machine one fine night with a supply of fireworks to highten the effect. To the devout believer this may not seem a very satisfactory explanation, but I think it is more feasible than the red-hot chariot and horses.

It appears to be a general belief with Freethinkers that the Bible is a book that should be kept out of the way of women and children, and, to a great extent, no doubt, the feeling is quite right. It is often said, "Why waste time in reading such nonsense, when it might be so much better employed?" If all looked upon the book in the same light that Freethinkers do it would speedily fall into oblivion, but as there are so very many who believe its contents are divinely inspired, and take all it says as truth, the Freethinker must be as well informed about it as the believer. In fact, he must hav a better acquaintance with it, or he will never be able to confute his opponent. But he must not stop there; it is necessary that he should study the sacred writings of the other great religious bodies, and find out the points of similarity, and be able to show clearly that a great deal contained in the Bible is copied from the older writings of the east. In perusing the scriptures of the Parsees, known as the Zend-Avesta, one cannot fail to be struck with striking similarities between certain portions of it and what are called "The Psalms of David;" and we also find that the Jews hav given their God the same names that the Parsees claim for theirs, such as "I am," "I am that I am," etc. A short time back I was mentioning this to a Parsee of my acquaintance, and he informed me that it was commonly said by them that the Jews made up most of their religion from the Zend-Avesta during the captivity.

The Christian church may deny it, but it is an undoubted fact that during the last few years Atheism has exercised a wonderful influence upon the orthodox religion. The priests are willing and anxious to make many concessions to retain their power as long as possible. They are quite ready to throw overboard the account of the creation narrated by Moses; they will admit that the sun and moon did not stand still at the command of Joshua, and that the sun did not go back even one degree on Hezekiah's sun-dial; and many of them will giv up the miracles, and I suppose the next thing will be that they will have to pitch overboard the whole lot. There will then be a chance for the religion of humanitarianism; and when this is understood and acted upon there will be no occasion to look for any millennium, or the second coming of any individual to cause a further disturbance.

In the mean time let us do our best to spread the light, disabusing men's minds of superstition's longings, and, by fixing their thoughts upon the only world of which they know anything, bring them to the knowledge that they will serve best their own interests by serving the interests of others. J. D.

Slightly Mixed.

Did you ever consider what was the relationship between Jesus and the Holy Ghost? According to Luke i, 35, the Holy Ghost was Jesus's father. Jesus, however, did not mean the Holy Ghost when he spoke about his father, for he says (John xv, 26), "When the comforter is come whom I will send from the father, even the spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the father, he shall testify of me." It has never been disputed that this spirit is the same person as the Holy Ghost, and since he "proceeds from the father," the latter might, in fact, be the grandfather, and the Holy Ghost the father of Jesus. Such seems to have been the doctrin of Photius, the famous patriarch of Constantinople, admitted by his enemies to have been the greatest theologian and thinker of his age. His doctrin was, however, judged heretical by both the Eastern and Western churches, which decided, on the strength of the words in italics, that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the father and the son. Jesus thus appears to be his own *grand*father. But the Greeks, sympathizing with Photius, afterwards got up another heresy, which flourishes in their church to the present day.

The Holy Ghost, according to their doctrin, proceeds from the father through the son. This makes Jesus his own grandmother. The man who married his son's wife's daughter was no circumstance to this! The conference of Bonn, which reunited the Greek and English churches, declared Jesus his own progenitor in the second degree, condemned the Roman doctrin that he is his own grandfather, but left it doubtful whether he should be called his own grandmother or not.

Do not suppose, O Truth Seeker (well may you seek), that you hav now got to the bottom of the matter. For all orthodox Christians hold that the father is Christ's very father, and not his grandfather or his mother, and that Jesus is his son and not his daughter. They hav good reason to dodge the question how the Holy Ghost was got between them.

But, besides all this, Jesus is the son of Mary, his own creature ("for without him was not anything made that was made"). And, if any Christian is disposed to get out of it by distinguishing the man Jesus from the eternal son of an eternal father, I can tell him that this is impossible without reviving heresies much older than the Reformation. It is the Nestorian heresy to deny that Mary is the mother of God; and, by parity of reasoning, the Holy Ghost is the father of God. Jesus is thus his own grandfather, or perhaps grandmother, on the God side, while on the woman side he must hav been his own ancestor by thousands of generations.

Now, Mr. Truth Seeker, I don't want you to get into trouble about obscene literature any more, so I will only say that if you will read up the book of Deuteronomy you will find that the Christian gods hav smashed pretty much the whole of the laws they made against the deeds not to be named to (but only seen by) Comstock.

It was once said of the South that she went to war and lost all but honor, after which she went into Congress and lost all that she had saved from war. May we not say of the Hebræo-Christion God that he came out of the Old Testament with no virtue but chastity, and lost in the New Testament whatever virtue he had saved from the Old? C. L. James.

The Wail of Protestants and Roman Catholics Over France.

Gambetta is the republican president of France; and he is making a record in his official career which causes all Christendom to tremble. Rev. Dr. Field, editor of the N. Y. Evangelist, one of the leading organs of blue Presbyterianism, is now writing letters from France to his paper. He states that only one person in every forty of the population of France is nominally Protestant. He also states that Gambetta is the man of the hour. He is to-day the most powerful man, not only in France, but on the Continent, with perhaps the single exception of Bismarck, and it may be doubted whether even he is an exception, since the recent German elections hav crippled his power. Gambetta has also the advantage in age—he is twenty years younger. He is only forty-three years old, in the prime of manhood, with a reasonable hope of thirty years—the life-time of a generation, as we are wont to measure the period in which one division in the great army of workers in the world's affairs moves off the stage and another comes on—in which to exercise an immense power for good or for evil. How will he use his great opportunity? That remains to be seen. If he fails it will be from his over-confidence leading him to assume too much the tone of a master, and regarding too little the feelings of the nation which he undertakes to govern.

Gambetta is at this moment the most popular man in France—a year hence he may be the most unpopular. All will depend on his wisdom and judgment. He will have to know the times and seasons, and to balance diverse interests, if he is to be able to rule a country of diverse parties and populations. If he begins by insulting where he ought to conciliate, his rule will not be long. He will raise up enemies faster than he can put them down. One thing only is certain, that the career of Gambetta will not be one of tameness and mediocrity, it will be either glorious or inglorious. As to the general policy of Gambetta, of one thing at least we are sure—that it will be thoroughly republican. He is a strong, almost fierce, republican. All his traditions are associated with the republic; all his honors have come from it; its failure would be his personal humiliation, and his pride and his ambition are involved in its success. His cabinet is, like himself, out-and-out republican. There is not a single royalist in it—neither legitimist nor imperialist has any place there. There is no attempt to conciliate opposition by admitting men whose position is at all doubtful or uncertain. The cabinet is a unit. From head to foot, from top to bottom, it is for the republic first, last, and always.

From this first movement it is apparent that religion of any kind has nothing to expect from the present government. It will be tolerated, and it may even be supported; for with Gambetta at the head, and Paul Bert as the right hand, the question of church and state is simply a question of policy, which has nothing to do with the private beliefs of either. They are ready to support one church or half a dozen, for they are probably of the opinion of some of the old Roman emperors, who "regarded all religions as equally true, or rather as equally false," and were willing to indulge all classes, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, wise and ignorant, in their favorit superstitions. But this kind of contemptuous toleration, or a national support bestowed like the giving of alms to the poor, is as galling as open hatred and persecution.

Not long ago the police made a raid upon all the elementary schools of Paris, and seized the crucifixes, which were tossed into cabs and carts and carried off with little respect for the feelings of those who were outraged by such desecration of emblems which had for them sacred associations. The thing was done with a degree of harshness and brutality which gave offense not only to Catholics but to Protestants as well, who preferred that even the work of destruction should be done with order and decency.

After such a demonstration naturally the public were curious to know what attitude the new government would take towards religion, and on this point they are not left in any doubt. The war against the religious orders is to be continued, and to become more relentless than ever before. It is to be a war not only of suppression, but of extermination; and it will be well if this war against the religious orders be not turned into a war against religion itself.

As if to emphasize the hostility of the government, Gambetta has chosen for the minister of public worship (of all positions in the world) a man who is an avowed Atheist! This is Paul Bert, a man of some note in the scientific world, but who is a Positivist of the school of Comte, and to whom all religion is superstition and folly. A few months since he delivered a lecture at which Gambetta presided, in which he spoke of the doctrin of a Creator as an exploded idea. He said that "the morality of a country increased in proportion as religion declined." To appoint such a man to the charge of religion, says Dr. Field, is about as appropriate as it would be to put Bob Ingersoll at the head of the churches in America!

Naturally the appointment of such a man has given great offense. The Catholics look upon it as the greatest insult and outrage. The Roman church is still the church of France. It is supported by the state, with which, of course, it must have very intimate relations. To put it in any way under the control of an Atheist, Dr. Field thinks, is shocking. Devout Catholics regard it as a blow aimed directly at the church. This impression is enforced by what is known of the purpose of Gambetta himself, who probably hates the church as much as his minister of public worship, but who, against the views of many of his own party, holds to the concordat by which the church is bound to the state, whispering sotto voce to his more violent associates who would cut the cord at once, that he "will use the concordat as a rope to strangle the church."

Food for Fools.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Each day discloses the audacity and the coolness of orthodoxy as published and otherwise promulgated as "food for fools" by the so called religious press. I clip from the Syracuse (N. Y.) Journal, of Dec. 24th, among other articles under the heading of "The Religious Press," as follows:

"The Wesleyan publishes a letter from a mother giving an account of the cure of her daughter from what she deemed a fatal illness. A journey to California was abandoned because the physician refused to take the responsibility, saying, 'It is too late.' The daughter and the latter's husband then went to Boston, where the 'cure' was effected at Dr. Cullis's establishment as follows:

"'On Sabbath evening, Nov. 13th, while in the Beacon Hill church or "Faith Training College," as it is called, she was kneeling with Dr. Cullis, giving herself wholly to God, with faith that God would verify the promis, "The prayer of faith shall save the sick," when healing power fell upon the poor, suffering body, and she felt that she was made whole She arose healed and renewed in all the life of God. She approached her husband (who was standing a little way from her) so changed that she said, "I think he was afraid of me." On the 16th of November they returned to Pittsfield, and the feet that went out so recently trembling and faltering came flying in with no arms around her to bear the weak, emaciated body, but with vigor she clasped me in her arms, exclaiming, "O mother, I am well, very well; all the chills and fever and night sweats and dainty appetite are gone." She walked a mile without weariness, played and sang several pieces, sleeps all night like an infant, eats as heartily as any one at the table, works when she finds any work to do. When she returned to Pittsfield so changed, the friends who were so skeptical about the healing when she left were deeply affected. Some wept, some were speechless, some doubted still. All felt that she had come to Pittsfield to die.'"

The sight of such an article in a newspaper claiming any title to respectability in this enlightened age is truly disgusting, and urges the necessity of education among the masses, and especially the need of general circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the two-edged sword of truth, doing noble service in the scientific and Liberal lines of march it has taken up, until those who are now struggling under the old papal banner stained with human gore, and the villainous rag stained with every species of cussedness first borne by black Henry VIII., and since by the contemptible Comstock conspirators, become enlightened men and women. Let the word be onward until truth, science, and intelligence shall be the motto and watchword of every household in our land, and the thousands of church buildings shall be converted into printing-houses for the dissemination of scientific and truthful literature instead of the stuff now scattered broadcast over the land, ancient and modern, of what are claimed as inspired Bible writings. M. C. WAGGONER.

Death of Prof. Draper.

John William Draper, M. D., LL. D., the oldest, as he was the most eminent and widely known, of American students of natural science, died early on the morning of the 4th inst. at his home on the hill at Hastings-on-the-Hudson, in his seventy-first year. Prof. Draper's father was a Methodist clergyman, but among his ancestors were men devoted to scientific research, and it was one of his good-humored boasts that he could trace his own taste for chemittry away back to the days when alchemy flourished, and before the science of chemistry had arisen. Prof. Draper was born at St. Helen's, near Liverpool, England, on May 5, 1811. He attended as a boy the Wesleyan Methodist School, Woodhouse Grove, and there was placed under the care of tutors. With private instructors he first studied chemistry and natural philosophy, and as a boy he showed the taste and aptitude for study and scientific investigation which hav since placed him among the first men of his time and profession. He chose to devote himself especially to the study of chemistry, and to that end entered the University of London.

Before the war of the revolution in this country some of the early members of Prof. Draper's family had come to America, and others of his relativs had followed, so that when, in 1833, he himself came here, he found himself not entirely among strangers. He continued his studies in the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1836, after a three years' course there, he received from the university the degree of doctor of medicin. His graduating thesis was selected by the medical faculty as worthy of publication. A very few weeks after his graduation Dr. Draper was elected professor of chemistry, natural philosophy, and physiology in Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia. It was there that he began his original experiments in chemistry and made investigations in novel channels in physiology. He published the results of these studies at the time in the American Journal of Medical Sciences. He also wrote much for European magazines, and, indeed, nearly all of his earlier writings were first published across the Atlantic. He pursued this course because of the backward condition of science in this country at that time. Indeed, when he first suggested the idea of spectrum analysis he was publicly laughed at, and the idea was ridiculed by a prominent gentleman of Boston. By reason of his contributions to foreign periodicals, Prof. Draper's reputation in Europe was established long before he was widely known in this country.

He found frequently that discoveries which he had made and described in European publications ten and twenty years ago were being rediscovered and claimed in this country. To preserve his own credit and reputation he therefore collected these earlier papers in a single volume, which was published under the title "Scientific Memoirs," by Harper & Brother.

Dr. Draper became professor of chemistry and natural philosophy in the University of New York in 1839. He was connected with the University until the time of his death, and, with one exception, was the senior professor in the faculty. During the past year he has not been able, on account of sickness, to attend to his duties there, and his son and his son-in-law, the Rev. Mr. Morey, hav heard his classes. Prof. Draper was one of the founders of the medical department of the university, and in 1841 occupied its chair of chemistry. In 1850 he was professor of physiology in addition, and in 1874 he became president of both the scientific and the medical departments.

Prof. Morse, the inventor of the wording telegraph, was chosen a professor of the the university in 1855. He had a little room in the building in Washington square, directly over the lecture-room of Prof. Draper. It was at that time that he was experimenting with his telegraph, and much of his work was done in Prof. Draper's studio and with his assistance. Afterward, when Morse was in Paris exhibiting his telegraph, he first saw the pictures of landscapes and statuary taken by the inventor and artist Daguerre. He undertook to introduce the process in America. It was, however, very imperfect at that time, and Prof. Draper developed it. He introduced bromin to quicken the process, and by that means too he secured a clearer and more sharply defined picture. Prof. Draper was the first to adapt the daguerreotype to the purposes of portraiture, and his wife and two daughters were his first subjects.

Prof. Draper was a most industrious worker. His life has been devoted to experimental research, and he has written much. He has studied especially the influence of sunlight upon the growth of plants. The results of much of his study have become incorporated in the body of accepted scientific fact all over the world. He made discoveries of the first importance in spectrum analysis, and has contributed much to science by his experiments in the endosmosis and exosmosis of plants.

Prof. Draper wrote many papers for the London and Edinburgh Philosophical Journal and the American Journal of Science and Art. His "Treatise on the Forces which Produce the Organization of Plants" was published in 1844. This was followed in 1846 by a text-book on chemistry, and later by his "Human Physiology." In 1862 his "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe" was published, and it has since been translated into French, German, Italian, Polish, and Russian. His largest work was the "History of the American Civil War," published in three volumes, between 1867 and 1870. It has been criticised, but Prof. Draper always regarded it as a work which would be better appreciated later when the prejudices of the time were worn away. Four lectures, in which he gave his "Thoughts on the Future of Civil Policy in America," were delivered before the New York Historical Society in 1865, and were afterward printed. His "Conflict of Science and Religion" created a great deal of discussion when it was published, and its influence for good has not yet ceased to be exerted. It was widely circulated, and has been translated into twelve European languages. One of his latest works is a memoir of importance, the tenor of which is that what is known as chemical force in the sun's ray is not limited to the violent region, but that it is uniformly distributed throughout the spectrum, and displays its activity according to the nature of the receiving substance.

Prof. Draper was a man of great common sense. He did not accept any scientific whims without first putting them to the test of experiments. Most of his work for these many years was done in the university building. In personal intercourse he was a man of cordial and amiable manners. His wife died some ten years ago. He leaves three sons and two daughters. His son Henry, the well-known astronomer, and also a professor in the university, sailed from Havana for New York on the 4th inst. Daniel has made a specialty of meteorology, and Dr. John C. Draper is professor of physiology in the College of the City of New York.

H. L. Green's Lecture Trip.

AROUND HOME.

When I returned home from my first lecturing trip I intended to start west again very soon, but as I received a number of invitations to lecture in this vicinity I desired to remain here and fill them, and I was glad of the opportunity to longer remain with my family. I now expect to go west about the 15th of the present month, but for some time my post-office address will be Salamanca, N. Y.

Last week, Thursday evening, I lectured in Youngsville, Pa. I was invited there by Mr. Darius Green, one of your subscribers. It was the third time I had lectured in that town, and always under Mr. Green's supervision. Mr. Green is a very intelligent, earnest Liberal, and is the best posted on the Bible of any man I ever met. He called my attention to a great many strange things in God's holy word that interested me much, for instance, as to who was the grandfather of Jesus. In Matt. i, 16, we read, "And Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus who is called Christ." And in Luke iii, 23, we read, "Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age, being as was supposed the son of Joseph which was the son of Heli." If both of these passages were inspired by God it is a little singular how he got them so mixed. But "God's ways are not our ways." "Great is the mystery of godliness."

From Youngsville I went to Oil City, where I met a number of earnest Freethinkers. I enjoyed the hospitality of D. W. McLane, whom I found an intelligent Liberal. He is a subscriber to the Index, and has been heretofore somewhat opposed to the League movement since the Syracuse split; but he says that the action of the late Chicago congress is perfectly satisfactory to him, and he is now in favor of starting an auxiliary League in Oil City, and he will soon take measures to that effect. I must not forget to state that Bro. McLean has a brisk, pretty little dog that he has named Robert G. on account of his inclination to chase and worry black squirrels and black cats.

From Oil City I went to Pittsburgh, where I lectured last Sunday for the Pittsburgh Liberal League. The audience numbered some three or four hundred people, and I learn that is about the size of the audience at every meeting. The Pittsburgh Liberal League is an activ body and is doing a grand work in that superstitious city, the most superstitious city, I judge, there is in the Northern states. Here they fined Col. Ingersoll and B. F. Underwood when they lectured there, or the committee that engaged them. Here the Presbyterian churches are so pious that they will not permit a musical instrument to be brought into the church. I asked one of the members what objections they had to having musical instruments in the churches, and she replied, "We do not find any authority in the scriptures for it." I wonder if they find any authority in the scriptures for using sewing machines, telegraphs, and railroads.

And I am pleased to know that such a live League is planted to stay in this dark and benighted place. At the League meeting every Sunday they hav a person stationed at the door who hands out Liberal tracts and Liberal literature. And permit me to suggest to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that those who hav any back numbers of the paper or any other Liberal publications that they want to place where they will do the most good, mail them at once to S. F. De Jones, the activ president of the League, at 99 Fifth avenue. Pittsburgh is a good missionary ground, and we should all aid this League in its good work. So send on the Liberal literature to brother Jones.

While at Pittsburgh I enjoyed the pleasant home of Bro. Robert Peet, one of the number who favored the Grand Pacific connection last fall, and who now givs in his support earnestly to the Liberal movement. I was also pleased to take by the hand at Pittsburgh the late "Rev." Thomas Grunday, recently a Methodist minister, who has been converted to the gospel of reason, and who often lectures for our Freethought friends in the vicinity. He should be constantly employed. And among other friends I met at Pittsburgh I can remember now the names of Roman Stanley, Robert Graham, Charles Martin, and Dr. Lee.

I am pleased to learn that the Pittsburgh League is preparing to celebrate Paine's birthday in fine style. Hon. A. B. Bradford, Parker Pillsbury, and other able speakers are engaged for the occasion.

And now allow me to make what I consider a most important suggestion, and that is, that on the evening of the 29th day of this month wherever our Liberal friends are celebrating Paine's birthday, they telegraph to the Associated Press, New York city, the fact. Then on the day following we shall see in the papers of the country a brief account of all the celebrations of that character. The effect will be good on the general public and pleasing to the Liberal public. Friends, do not forget this suggestion.

My next lecture was given in Conewango Valley. I was invited there by James P. Allen, a subscriber and admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER. On account of a heavy rainstorm the audience was small, but those present listened very attentivly for an hour and a half to what I had to say. The audience was made up largely of young men, and I hope some good seed was sown. Mr. Allen and his brother Henry and other friends are moving there to form a Liberal League. I was the guest of Bro. James P. Allen, and enjoyed my visit there very much. He has a pleasant, intelligent wife, and three bright, pretty little girls.

Friday evening I spoke in Rixford, Pa., an oil town, to a large audience in the Opera House. The audience was an intelligent one and listened attentivly for over two hours.

I went to Rixford on the invitation of H. A. Scoville, Esq., a popular young attorney of the town, and I had a very interesting visit with him; also with J. L. Brooks and his family, who is a great admirer of Mr. Bennett and his paper. He paid me for Col. Ingersoll's, D. M. Bennett's, and Thomas Paine's pictures. Mr. Brooks has an interesting family, all intelligent Spiritualists and Liberalists. I also made the acquaintance at Roxford of Mr. H. Krohn, P. S. Campbell, and Earle Van Slyke. At Rixford they contemlpate forming a League soon.

I very much enjoyed my ride from Bradford to Rixford over the mountains or the narrow-gage railroad. Persons who hav never visited this wonderful country will find it interesting to do so.

On my way to Rixford I had to spend an hour or so in Bradford, and was pleased to meet the following named Liberal friends there, all live workers in the Liberal vineyard, and all, I think, subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER: G. W. Hardenberg, D. L. Lewis, Hart Harris, H. Webster, C. F. Blakeslee, John M. Willis, and C. J. Curtis. Mr. Curtis very generously invited me to dinner with him, where we enjoyed a pleasant chat. They hav a League here, but at present it is not very lively. But they intend to commence activ work soon. H. L. GREEN.

MATTERS hav reached a fine point in Russia, where, as reported by cable to the London Times, an American Jew at St. Petersburg, performing in a circus, has received orders to quit the capital, on account of his faith. There should be a protest from the civilized world against such bigotry.

For the balance of the money inclosed please send me some of your Liberal tracts.

I am a friend to Liberalism, and I like your paper; and when I read of the imprisonment of D. M. Bennett for the stand he had taken to liberate the human mind from credal bondage, I determined to send in my mite to perpetuate the paper and advance free thought, free speech, freedom of the press, and eventually a nation freed from the bondage of orthodoxy and everything that retards progression, without which the existence of the human family would be a farce and the whole plan of creation a grand failure.

Yours for freedom, MRS. E. E. KIMBALL.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed money order for $6.50—$1.50 on subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and $5.00 on the trip Around the World.

I should be glad to pledge five dollars more to organize a Liberal traveling theatrical company. People want theatrical representations, and more and better novels. Singing, novels, and theaters are excellent mediums through which to propagate morals.

LOST CREEK, TENN., Dec. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, which I wish to contribute to the fund to take our noble friend, D. M. Bennett, around the world. Although I came at the eleventh hour, it was not for the want of devotion to the good cause we are all enlisted in. Therefore, wishing to hav my name on that starry roll of honor of which you speak, I, at this late hour, send my little mite, hoping it will be accepted and my reward equal to those who sent at an early day.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I am, your friend indeed, JOHN DUNLAP.

LEROY, ILL., Dec. 26, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The time has come for me to renew my paper. I inclose money order for eight dollars—three for the paper and five for the Round-the-World trip, to bring Brother Bennett home. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER the best paper I can find to read. I am well pleased with the letters from abroad. I am seventy-eight years old, and very deaf. I can't hear much, and I take pleasure in reading your paper and hearing from different minds. Some people make a great wonder about King James's Bible. It is merely a record of mankind—of their good and evil works. It takes a great deal of sifting to separate the good from the evil. If people would read their Bible more, and look at it with the eye of reason, they would certainly understand it better. I am glad to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and hear from Freethinkers all around the world. I bid adieu for this time, hoping Brother Bennett may return safe. D. NETTLETON.

WHEELING, W. VA., Dec. 31, 1881.

MR. MACDONALD: On May 27th, 1881, I had the thanks of Mr. Bennett for five dollars. That was to help make him commander of the old line-of-battle ship, and to send him to foreign lands to cruise and harbor in theological waters and send us such information as he found to be facts. Herewith find another five dollars to bring him back. And you as mate—don't stop crying "Money ahoy" until you duplicate the fives that sent him away. Then when the commander hears "Ship ahoy" from home, he can cheerfully loose the old ship from her mooring, right her helm, and lay her keel straight for the port of San Francisco with her jib-boom as an index pointing to truth. And on the commander's arrival in America he should be furnished with a special Pullman palace car. And as the iron horse, with his fiery breath belching forth hell and damnation through his nostrils, speeds his way across the continent and bears him home to friends and glory, let all Liberals along the wayside wherever he stops to quench his burning thirst gather for miles to see the old veteran of the Liberal army and pay him respect for his works of victory over superstition. Let the dry bones be shaken up, and the rams' horns be blown, until the people in every Jericho become alarmed at the coming of the commander of Materialism. Truly yours, JAMES M. WHEAT.

BELOIT, WIS., Dec. 29, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: My tab says Dec. 1, 1880, and I suppose you hav put me down as a dead beat, but you won't find me half as bad as you hav reason to believe. Please find inclosed $5 to put me on the square with THE TRUTH SEEKER again. My religion don't spoil me or mar my integrity in the least. Hypocrisy and indifferentism is the state of things here, with few exceptions. There are many milk-and-water Liberals here. I think success will make them bold. There are followers as well as leaders in our ranks, as well as all others, and we must disciplin them to fight this monster which has been gnawing the vitals of society, glutting its insatiate rapacity to its utmost. I am young—twenty-five years—and am occupied at farming, so that I hav not the opportunities I wish for studying books since I left school. I hope to be able to get a good Liberal lecturer to come here soon. I think that good seed would not fail to take root here and bring a bountiful harvest. I circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER far and wide, and hav opened the eyes of many. I was reared a good Lutheran, but hav always been a doubter.

I am, your Materialistic friend and co-worker,

NELSE CHRISPENSEN.

WINCHESTER, ILL., Dec. 26, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Once more that day of heathen and Christian festivity has come and gone, that day on which more than one demi-god, so claimed, has made his advent into this life through the weakness of some foolish maiden and the lust of some god as a mediator between some whole-god and poor fallen humanity.

Now of course I am one of those who believe all the stories about Christ and the rest of the God company being born on the twenty-fifth day of December, because we get the account through THE TRUTH SEEKER; and as it is inspired, and is edited by that noble god, Bennett, there is no reason why all true believers should not believe.

Now, Mr. Editor, as I am one of Bennett's followers, and read and believe his Bible to be true, I think that I hav a right to make a small request by the way of a short prayer to him. I will try to make my prayer short, as I know he is too busy to listen to a long one.

MY PRAYER.

Our Father, who art in Asia; thou who hast ever shown by word and deed that thou lovest thy followers with a love equaled by no other god; thou who givest thy time, yea, and who freely offerest thy life for the happiness of thy children; thou who suffered revilings, persecutions, and imprisonment that those who would be saved might be saved from the black and eternal night of superstitious ignorance and woe; thou who art even now traveling in a foreign land where pestilence and famin, deceit and treachery, abound; thou hast gone even there that we, thy adorers, might learn the ways and conditions of the children of men, the false teachings and works of other gods, not so noble, grand, and loving as thou. Hear thou my prayer, and grant this my petition. Thou didst, through thy spirit of love, send me thy Bible (THE TRUTH SEEKER), which took the scales from my eyes, and the blind did see. Thou didst thus enable me to change my course in life, and as I did follow thy words of wisdom, wherein thou teachest us to love one another, and did thereby obtain a wife, also one of thy children; and as she did aid me to increase and did bear me a son, and he, O Bennett! was born on the twenty-fifth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, thereby, through the power of thy word, he is thy son and also a god with thee. Now, O Bennett! hear thou this my prayer, and grant this my supplication. Breathe thy holy spirit upon him, anoint him with the oil of thy love; clothe him with thy wisdom; gird upon him the sword of thy power, and let him be a god like unto thee. Bless thou my son, thy son, James Bennett Travers, and thine be the glory, the power, and the supremacy now and forever. So be it. J. B. TRAVERS.

INGALLS, KAN., Dec. 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: My father was a Methodist exhorter who believed that to spare the rod would spoil the child, and he calculated that if they were spoilt God Almighty would not hav the chance to lay it at his door, and so he would ply the rod until his children had at least as many stripes as ever a zebra had. He wanted to be Christlike. He had read how the meek and loving Jesus made a scourge of small cords (probably out of the string of an old harp) and then flogged the people. Well, the old man died, and, of course, he went to heaven, because he was a firm believer. He believed Moses turned all the dust of the earth into lice, and I recollect telling him it was a damned lousy piece of business, and I had to dance for it with no more clothing on than old David had on when he danced naked before the Lord. I had been taught when a boy to believe that he who had sinned in the least was guilty of all, that God would set down every idle word and wicked thought, and that the man who looked upon a woman to lust after her had committed adultery in his heart and was just as bad as the man who committed adultery nineteen times a day, and that all such wicked people would be plunged into the sulphuric flames of an endless hell, where the worm dieth not and the fire is never quenched; where there will be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth; and, of course, if one should be so unfortunate as not to hav any teeth his gums would hav to catch it, for his old jaw would hav to work any way, while God sat on his heavenly throne laughing at his calamity and mocking at him. That is my old dad's God, and if you should meet him in your trip around the world you will know him from his description. His hair is white as wool and his eyes like two balls of fire, and in his mouth is a two-edged sword, and out of his nostrils go fire and smoke, and his nose turns up like a squash, and when you see him he'll make you laugh. This is dad's God; he's a buck-cat bully god, and the God of old rotten orthodoxy. He is the same old God that sent two old bears to tear to pieces forty little children because they laughed at an old man that had no capillaries on the top of his cranium where capillaries ought to grow. I could tell you many other things about this God, how about six thousand years ago he jumped out of heaven and lit straddle of the equator, with both feet on one side, made the earth out of nothing, man out of mud, and woman out of a crooked bone, pronounced them good, how he repented that he had made them, got mad and drowned them, and then repented that he drowned them and put the bow in the heavens that he would never do such a piece of infernalism again. He will never drown the earth again; he's going to burn it up the next time. When I used to believe these things my most earnest prayer was that I might be as though I had never been born. My hair turned gray at the age of ten, having the nightmare over hell, and life was a curse. I lived with a full determination never to be the means of bringing into existence a being that would hav to run his chances of hell. But Bennett's writings years ago changed me, and to-day I thank kind providence that I am in the world. My earnest prayer is that the world will be better for my having lived in it. Life is a joy. I stand in fear of no hell, no devil, no ghost, holy ghost or any other kind of a ghost, and I feel as though I owe Bennett a debt of gratitude. May his work go on, and his life be spared.

A. BUTTERFIELD.

BOWLING GREEN, KY., Dec. 30, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you post-office order for $3. Please renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the current year. Permit me to say that the letters of Mr. Bennett are one of the great attractiv features of the paper. The many historical facts placed before the public, heretofore unknown, will inevitably redound to great good in the advancement of Freethought, in breaking down the barriers of bigotry and religious creeds and dogmas founded upon superstition and ignorance. I refer particularly to his letters from Athens. I do not agree with Mr. Bennett's ideas of the Irish Land bill referred to by your correspondent, Mr. Joseph Frankowski, from West Meriden, Conn., as I believe nothing but an Irish Parliament, the complete abolishment of landlordism as it now exists, an act of Parliament by which the people who liv upon the soil can be enabled to purchase it in a limited quantity of acres upon a reasonable time to pay for it. In other words, no man should be permitted to own more than a limited number of acres, say fifty or one hundred, and make the title to it as easily transferrable from one to another by deed, as it is in America; still Mr. Bennett is not presumed to be able to be thoroughly conversant with every social question of foreign countries. His letters display great research in unearthing facts which the Christian world, from some cause, we know not why, hav seen proper to pass over or leave unsaid.

FOX LAKE, WIS., Jan. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order for $6 for two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1882. I think I was the first to introduce the paper in this town, and I think there are not more than half a dozen taken here now, but what few there are hav done good missionary work. There are six churches in this town, and five years ago they were all running on regular time. Now the Methodists and Congregationalists are running a partnership concern. The colored Methodists hav a concern of their own. The Catholics are without a pastor, the Episcopal without a rector, and the Baptist without a shepherd. Now if evangelical religion is on the increase, as Mr. Frothingham says, what is the matter with all these churches? Why are they not running as usual? I would say that saloons hav fallen off in about the same proportion, so the town is much more quiet and peaceable than when churches and saloons were in the hight of prosperity. Has THE TRUTH SEEKER had anything to do with this change of things? Maybe not, but I would recommend any town that is cursed with too much religion and whisky to try a few copies.

Yours truly, J. H. WILLIAMS.

NORTHFIELD, MINN., Dec. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: This year, 1881, is fast going to join her previous sisters, never to return again.

Twelve seemingly short months hav gone by since I made your very agreeable acquaintance, and not wishing to do without your company and weekly visits, as long as we will agree, I renew my pledge to entertain you another year to gladden and brighten my home. To-day is Christmas. One thousand eight hundred years ago to-day our savior made his appearance on this little globe of ours, so they say, but I do not wish to be held responsible for the authenticity of this story, for I did not happen to be in Bethlehem at the time. As it is not of much consequence whether it was our Lord or some other lord born on that day, we will pass it by. I wish to our beloved editor who is on the other side of the globe a merry Christmas and a happy New Year. We wish the same to those friends at home who are piloting THE TRUTH SEEKER safely through while the captain is away. Yours for truth, justice, love, and liberty,

MRS. S. J. LENONT.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Dec. 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The Jewish scriptures are replete with examples of murders, assassinations, and crimes of the blackest dye, therein justified mainly under the plea of inspiration and the command of the Jewish Jehovah. And now we hav the plea of Charles Guiteau, claiming that he was governed by the same inspiration in the act of killing the President; that the same irresistible pressure, the same faith and justification by which the knife of Abraham was raised to slay his son in obedience to the command of the Jewish deity impelled him to raise his arm and fire the fatal shot. Inconsistent as this claim may seem to be as a matter of defense, does it not find its audacious parallel in the persistent claims of the clergy that the said scriptures, which furnish so many killing examples of inspired men, should be regarded with absolute veneration as an infallible guide to morals? This book of Yahweh's divine commands should, in my opinion, be placed in the prisoner's dock for trial along with Guiteau, and whether the latter escapes the halter or not, the former should be hung up forever. WM. J. CONDIT.

ALTOONA, PA., Dec. 28, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I hav heard a great many lady orators, but do not think that I ever heard as able a one as Mrs. H. S. Lake, of California. I had the pleasure of hearing her lecture at Hornellsville last September, and all Liberal Leagues or Freethought societies wishing a speaker should not fail to obtain this eminent lady. She is a finished and eloquent orator, a superior elocutionist, a deep and radical thinker, and one whose whole heart is enlisted in the noble cause of mental liberty. Though unacquainted with her, yet I will venture to assert that there is not upon the American rostrum to-day a finer thinker, a more brilliant speaker, a grander or nobler worker in the cause of truth, than Mrs. Lake. Yours truly, W. J. BURNS.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, Jan. 2, 1882.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Friend W. C. Clow inquires about the Liberal colony in Iowa which became so bad that the better-disposed members had to send for a Christian missionary. Don't know anything about it out here. Didn't know there was a Liberal colony in the state. Will some one please locate this colony? No! there are no missionaries here to spare to send to Liberal colonies. They are all kept busy ministering to their brethren and late co-workers, in the Anamosa and Fort Madison penitentiaries, and in praying to the legislators in Des Moines assembled that they may not tax church property, and may murder personal liberty. What infamous hypocrisy for the church to make such claims of superior goodness as that voiced by the Oregon lawyer whom friend Clow mentions! E. C. WALKER.

WEBSTER, MASS., Jan. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Your note reminding me of my indebtedness for THE TRUTH SEEKER came duly to hand, and to tell you that I am very much ashamed of myself for being so slack and shiftless does not half speak my feelings. I say slack and shiftless because there was no real need of this delay on my part, and it is so unlike what I once thought myself to be. In my past life, when I hav dealt with people who seemed purposely slack, my most charitable feeling for them was, if I could take them by the nape of the neck and throw them out of a third-story window, it might possibly wake them up to business. But I was afraid of the law, and had to get along with a much poorer kind of swearing. But now that I hav committed the same crime I am heartily glad that I did not happen to kill anybody for the same offense. Accept my apology if you can, and please find inclosed a check of six dollars to cancel my present indebtedness. For the coming year I wish THE TRUTH SEEKER and all its patrons most unbounded success, and hope that none of them will allow their accounts to drag them down to the mortification that I feel in owing a year for a Liberal paper.

Very truly yours, MARGARET FLINT.

ALDEN, N. Y., Dec. 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $4—three of which is to renew my subscription, and one for the lithographs of D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll.

Your paper is well gotten up in all respects; the print is clear and open, being well adapted to "old eyes." I am now in my eighty-third year, and I will probably read it as long as I read anything. I hav long been a reader, a thinker, and an advocate of Liberal views. Twenty years ago there were but two Liberal thinkers besides myself in this town, but now there is a large number of stanch Liberals, and many of them are the very best men in this world. Mr. Bennett's letters are pleasing and very instructiv to me. I shall not regret contributing my mite to further his Round-the-World project providing he shall return in safety. Hoping I may liv to hear of his safe return, I remain, Yours, ISAIAH FULLERTON.

SOUTH DARTMOUTH, MASS., Dec. 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: It is a good plan to occasionally take a retrospectiv view of matters and things appertaining to the cause of Freethought, and so I will at the present time go back in memory's golden chambers and giv the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER some idea of the past and present status of Freethought in this immediate vicinity. As long ago as the year 1850 or '51 I first became interested in the cause which we all prize and value so highly. It was then I became aware of the existence of the Boston Investigator and first had access to its columns. It was through the instrumentality of Mr. James Law, who came to this place from the sea-girt isle of Nantucket, that I became cognizant of the fact that there was such a paper. There was, at the period to which I refer, in this village very little, if any, interest manifested in Freethought ideas. The church had everything under its thumb, and I believe Mr. Law was the only pronounced advocate of Liberal views in this place. About five miles from here, at a village known as Russell's Mills, was a man of much natural talent, as also eloquent flow of language, who did much to disseminate Liberal thought. This man, Oliver H. Seaburg, and also a not far distant neighbor, Philip Gidley, testified against the churches in no uncertain manner. And I think they succeeded in inducing many to giv in their adhesion to Liberal views. Both these pioneers in the cause of Freethought in this town of Dartmouth hav left the scenes of life. All this occurred about 1850, or possibly a very few years previous thereto.

I may next bring to the notice of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER the advent of Spiritualistic ideas in our midst. This occurred, I believe, either a very little before or immediately after the year 1552. Prominent among the advocates of this form of Liberalism were Mr. Barker Cushman, Mr. Wing Russell (both of whom are not living), and Mr. Thomas C. Smith, who still remains, and is somewhat advanced in years. Spiritualism got quite a foothold at Russell's Mills, and also at what is termed the "head of the Apponagansett River," about two and a half miles from this village. It did its best toward breaking the thick crust of orthodoxy here and in our near vicinity. And the decline and fall of the Methodist church at the head of the Apponagansett River and the Baptist village (both of which places hav long been closed), the tottering and shaky condition of the one only remaining church—the Congregational—in this village, are in no small degree due to the efforts of Oliver H. Seaburg, Philip Gidley, and the progress made by Spiritualistic ideas. Not far from the year 1852 there was also considerable progress made in Freethought ideas in this village through the agency of Jeremiah Hacker. His paper, published at that time, called the Portland Pleasure Boat, was quite largely circulated here. I think it was also the means of driving deep the plowshare of Freethought through the hard, arid soil of orthodoxy. I remember about this time the appearance in our midst of Owen Wilbur, of Little Compton, in the neighboring state of Rhode Island. He spoke in a direct and forcible manner against the superstition and priestcraft of the churches, and, like others to whom I referred, has passed away. Coming down to the immediate present, I may state that, although there may not, perhaps, be so much direct evidence of the existence of Freethought in our midst as in years past, still the result of past efforts in that direction is very plain and apparent. As I said before, two churches hav been closed, and the only remaining one is in a fair way to share the fate of the others in the same respect. The future looks auspicious for Freethought and quite the opposit for orthodoxy.

Yours, EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find thirty cents, for which send me by return mail "The Holy Bible Abridged." I sold mine and must hav another. This book should be in the hands of every Freethinker in the land. If this recommendation will do you any good publish it. Yours truly, D. HOCHSTETLER.

OXFORD, O., Dec. 18, 1881.

MY DEAR FRIEND MACDONALD: This is the first time that I ever raised my pen to scratch a few words to you. I hav always had my old friend D. M. Bennett to write to, but he is now on his way around this little ball that is swinging in mid-air. I had the pleasure once to take him by the hand and giv him a hearty shake. I don't believe I ever shook hands with any one that I thought so much of as I did of him. I hav taken his paper from the very first start, when it was but an infant, and now it has grown to be a man.

I would just say to you that I sent $1 to start Mr. Bennett out, and I now will send $4 more to help bring him back. The reason I didn't send it all I will tell you, as I told him. I met with a loss of one thousand dollars cash. I told Mr. Bennett that I would send the balance as soon as I could. I now hav sold corn enough to send the balance, so inclosed you will find post-office order for $10—$4 for the trip, $3 for the paper for the year 1882, and $3 for the paper for my friend M. A. King for 1882. I did hate to see my name in the Round-the-World-trip and no star to shine; and now let it shine forth like the sun at noonday, without a cloud to obscure the sight. Let it shine both day and night. I would just say that it was a professor of religion that took my thousand dollars. I don't hav much faith in hell, but I would like to see him in a fiery pit a few hours at least. So farewell. THOMAS H. DODGE.

THAT ecclesiastical mountebank, Clark Braden, has been lying a good deal lately about Col. Ingersoll sending his villainous circulars all over the country. In answer to one of them, W. P. Kirkpatrick, of Arrowsmith, Ill., writes: "Mr. Clark Braden—Sir: In your pamphlet you say that Col. Ingersoll's note is unbankable in Peoria, Ill. Now, let me say, that if you will go to the trouble to find one of those unbankable notes, Mr. A. T. Ives, of this place (formerly of Bloomington), will gladly trade a bill of house rent he holds against you for an interest in one of those unbankable notes of R. G. Ingersoll's."

A Judean province you've conquered, love,
Gay, glorious, bright, as the stars above;
No, the light of their gems was quenched in blood,
And broken hearts rained a crimson flood,
When Israel wandered, a vengefnl band,
And corpses were strewed on either hand.
Women dishonored and ripped and torn,
Infants murdered and maids forlorn,
Dragged by the hair to a fearful fate,
No Grecian damsels such tales relate.
Better the altars where heroes prayed
And Iphigenia's white corpse laid.
Such faith is a blot on the scroll of time,
A leaky bark on the sea of crime.
Vinyards were watered with many a tear,
The holiest thing was a saddening fear
The most blessed angels were fire and flood,
And Jehovah fattened on feasts of blood.
What vile reformers such men must be,
Oh, keep their festering land from me,
Where Samuel dark, for a brutal whim,
Hewed princely Agag limb from limb.
Rispah watched o'er her murdered seven
Till David's fiendish word was given;
His rage was sated. "Take them down,
Their skeletons cannot touch my crown."
Then to steal all the treasures of Heshbon and Ar,
Their sons to enslave, what a barbarous war!
How Joab served David in blood and in gloom,
And corpses rained fast into Potra's dark tomb.

At Rabbah, enfeebled with starving and panic,
David placed Moloch's crown on his temples satanic
With holiest vengeance snd freebooting ire,
His captivs destroyed both with torture and fire;
Then played on his harp when his mind became calm,
And wrote the sweet words of the twenty-first Psalm.
How he brutalized women, the sensual fighter,
By the light of my pearls, my own kingdom is brighter.
And this mixture of savage and wild buccaneer
Gave out to the world that they once hav lived here.
Though they cannot in art or in learning refine,
And know not a word of our language divine,
And lately they brought an old manuscript here,
Such a vile, loathsome mass that it cost scholars dear
To chasten its thoughts and to giv it a glow,
That grand, Grecian sages could read it, you know.
'Twas rude, and quite wanting in classical marrow
Such theories coarse and such sentiments narrow
All the book that they hav is a very late version,
And the tenets redeeming were borrowed from Persian.
Pray, Anthony, leave their detestable soil
For some Arab marauder to plunder and spoil,
And find a fair kingdom far over the sea,
To send spices and gems as a tribute to me.

OPEN LETTER

TO

Anthony Comstock

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN,

SIR: I hav before me a seven-paged open letter, addressed to myself, intended for publication in all the evening and morning papers, copies of which, I am prepared to prove, were sent to every daily and several weekly papers, the publishers of which refused to publish it, consigning the precious product of your labors to the waste paper basket. For this I am truly sorry, as it would hav given me an admirable opportunity to show the public the true inwardness of the man who could pen such a letter, and yet claim to be a Christian and a protector of the public from the vicious members of society. A more vicious letter could not be penned, and the evidence of malice crops out in every sentence. You first claim that the courts honorably acquitted you. If they did, then I know nothing of the words honorable acquittal. You were arrested for publishing a malicious libel, and taken in the charge of an officer before the magistrates. You then waived examination. If you had written truthfully, why were you afraid of examination? I was present in the court to confront you on your vile charge. You were silent.

After the lapse of several weeks I received an order from Judge Smith's court to attend such court respecting my charge against you, and believing that you would submit to an examination and giv some excuse for your act, I went, accompanied by over fifty witnesses, so that a special court had to be set aside for my special case against you. Well, let us examin as to what followed. I stood there without counsel, ready to defend my order of arrest. I was strong in the proof of my charge against you, and did not require an attorney to quibble on points of law. You, on the other hand, had an attorney—a man in whom any person may trust their case as a legal adviser, and outside the law I hav reason to know that Mr. Tenney, your solicitor, is a gentleman and a noble-hearted man. He must hav felt seriously the weakness of your case, as set forth in your libelous letter, and therefore, as an act of charity toward you, advised you not to submit to an examination. He, good fellow, by special pleading, decided to take exception on points of law, and attempted to show that not the spirit and intent of your libelous letter should be gone into, but the actual wording only should be considered, and that therefore the same should be adjudged as a privileged communication, and on this ground pleaded for a dismissal. This I objected to, whereupon your solicitor proposed that a brief be prepared, setting forth the reasons why my complaint against you should be dismissed. I then stated in the presence of that court, that all I required was a full investigation into the facts. It was then arranged that the District Attorney should take charge of the case, as prosecuting counsel, on behalf of the people against Anthony Comstock, I being promised at that time that such investigation should be made on the following Wednesday. But, feeling that there was some crooked business going on, and an attempt being made to frustrate justice, I employed one of our best attorneys, and he wrote a letter to the Judge, to the District Attorney, and your attorney for copy or nature of such br ef. Not only so, but myself and attorney applied at Jefferson Market Police Court next day, and we were told that Justice Solon Smith had gone into the country, and would not be back until Monday following, the court officer to whom we spoke intimating that as the Comstock case was in the hands of Justice Solon Smith, nothing would be done until his return. Picture, therefore, my astonishment upon receiving a notice from the court that the case had been dismissed without an investigation into the facts which led to the writing of your letter, neither myself nor one of my witnesses being called, and yet you hav in your letter the audacity to tell the public that you were honorably acquitted. May heaven save the public when such honorable acquittals shall follow the publication of such vile letters as that penned by you to hundreds of my patients! So much for your "honorable acquittal." Now, as to your having evaded arrest or not, the facts are these: I did not dream of having you arrested until after I had written my letter to you, which appeared in all the newspapers. I called at your office personally three or four times, as did also my half-brother, David Cotter. We were each told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, and would not be back for a week; but on being told by persons on Nassau street that you were seen in the immediate neighborhood not long after my calling, I felt that you were evading me, and deliberately refusing to giv me the names of those whom you pretended had made statements against me. It was your thus evading me which caused me to take criminal proceedings against you, and forthwith instruct counsel to sue out a warrant against you for criminal libel. After such warrant was in the hands of the officer, such officer and several of my witnesses sought you at your office. They were told by persons in your office that you had gone into the country, as I had before been told. On the morning of your arrest my half-brother, David Cotter, called at your office, in response to a telegram received by me. He was then told that you were away in the country. He went straight from your office to that of Howe & Hummel, and there met a private detectiv who offered there and then to disclose the whereabouts of Anthony Comstock, if the $100 reward, which I had offered for his arrest, should be given him. This was promised, and David Cotter then went and apprised the officer who held the warrant, and they went in company to your office, when they were jointly told by persons sitting there that you were away and they did not know when you would return; whereupon the officer, acting upon the information given by the detectiv above named, proceeded to a room in the upper part of the building wherein several voices were heard. The door was opened in response to the knocking of the officer, when a number of gentlemen were seen sitting around a table as if in committee. Anthony Comstock was inquired for, and denied being there. Upon retiring voices were heard in a room close by. Inquiry was made if Anthony Comstock was within. The person who opened the door replied that Anthony Comstock was not there, when the door was closed. My half-brother, who was waiting in the lobby, made a ruse as if running down stairs, the officer, all the time standing outside, beside the door. The same person who had before opened the door opened it again. The officer, by a rapid movement of the foot, kept the door open and then walked in and arrested yourself, Anthony Comstock. If this was not hiding from arrest, I fail to understand what hiding means, and as you hav in your open letter mentioned the fact of my having offered one hundred dollars reward, and that I had refused to pay the person giving the information, I beg leave here to state that the hundred dollars was paid to the detectiv in the presence of several witnesses, one of whom was a merchant and manufacturer in your immediate neighborhood of Nassau street. So much for your arrest. Was it with or without evasion?

Now, as to the next portion of your open letter: You say there is a law prohibiting the transmission of letters and circulars concerning schemes to deceive and defraud the public or obtain money by false pretenses through the mails. You knew very well when you were writing that sentence that it had no application whatever to my case, inasmuch as the following open letter to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you, offering every physician or scientific man a free entry into my factory and consulting rooms, and in the same letter offering five thousand dollars' worth of my goods to the poor of Brooklyn. Why did you not avail yourself of the offer and hav called at my consulting rooms and manufactory for inquiry before writing your libelous letter to the hundreds of my patients? You could hav no excuse as to time and place, for this reason, viz., that my establishment is one of the most prominent in Brooklyn, and in close proximity to your own residence, so that nothing but malice aforethought could hav induced you to hav written such a letter, while the following offer to the physicians of Brooklyn was before you in the circular or pamphlet from which you obtained the names of my patients to whom you wrote. If you wish to excuse yourself re-read the following:

WM. WILSON'S OPEN LETTER

To the Physicians and the Commissioners of Charities of the City of Brooklyn.

GENTLEMEN—Two years ago in Europe I invented and patented a magnetic appliance for the relief and cure of disease. My system is one that was never before attempted, but its simplicity places it among the many great improvements in the history of science which, after its inception, has caused thousands to wonder why so valuable an additiou to the necessities of our race should hav been so long overlooked.

The success of my appliances in the cure of disease in England was such that over THIRTY THOUSAND persons were clothed in them, and not one case of failure when the proper appliances were worn as recommended. In the face of such success in Europe, I determined that the people of America should be made acquainted with the fact. I arrived in Brooklyn only a few months ago and commenced the sale of my goods at No. 465 Fulton street, since which time I hav, in Brooklyn and neighborhood, over a THOUSAND persons wearing my appliances for the diseases above mentioned—all of whom came to me only as a last resort, having failed to get relief from any of their physicians. And these persons were as readily relieved as were those of Europe—NINETY-NINE PER CENT of whom will tell you to-day on application to them that my appliances gave time all the relief promised. A printed list of my clients is at your disposal so that you may satisfy yourself of the truth of the above statement. My proposition therefore is that I hand over to the medical men of Brooklyn FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS worth of my appliances, to be used only on the persons of the sick poor now and likely to be in your charitable institutions and hospitals. The only condition I make is that I myself clothe the patients according to my own judgment and be allowed to retain watchers at my own expense that the patients do not receive any medicin during the wearing of my appliances, and that a proper report be supplied from time to time, so that I, at my own expense, can publish the record of the cures by my appliances. I further wish that every medical man in Brooklyn should call at my manufactory and examinfor himself the processes of manufacture and make himself thoroughly acquainted with my system. My factory is open for inspection at all hours to any physician, chemist, or scientist, and in close proximity to my own business premises the same physicians may see for themselvs the patients who hav been relieved by my appliances. All physicians and chemists who hav examined my goods hav availed themselvs of my invention, are to-day wearing my appliances, and recommending the same to their patients with marked success.

The aforesaid gift of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS' worth of goods will be delivered from time to time, as agreed upon by a committee of yourselvs, on application to me a few days in advance, stating the disease for which they are required, so that I can supply the best possible form of my invention. Hoping you will avail yourselvs of my offer, I remain, gentlemen, Yours obediently,

WILLIAM WILSON.
No. 465 Fulton st., Brooklyn.

In face of the above letter, what pretense can you find for your conduct? Why did you not giv me the names of the parties whom you pretended had written to you? The fact is, no one did write to you except a lot of conspiring doctors, and to please them you became their tool.

In the next part of your open letter you refer to a letter you sent me, and say as follows: "Why did you, like Ananias and Sapphira of old, keep back a part; why did you not tell the public that I wrote you personally on the 15th of September?" Your memory must be very bad in this particular, or you did not read the newspapers, insomuch that this paragraph appeared in the Truth newspaper on September 20th, under the caption of "The Romance of Anthony Comstock's Arrest, and what Led to It," and directly following the $100 reward, I refer to the very letter which you say I never noticed:

"And the next morning I received a cringing letter, written after the reward was offered, as shown by the postal date on the envelope, Brooklyn postmark, 2 A. M., September 16. Now I was told in his office on the 15th of September, at two in the afternoon, that he had gone away for a week. Who told the lie? Did he order his subordinates so to do, or did they do so of their own accord? The next day, September 16th, my half brother, David Cotter, with the detectives and the court officer, went to Comstock's office. They were told that he was in the country, and did not know when he would return. They were then told that a letter was written by Comstock to William Wilson the night previous. At this the clerks seemed surprised, and said, 'Well, we do not know where he is, nor when he will return.'

"A private detective then told my half brother where to find him, and said he was hid away in an upper room in the same building. There the officers went, knocking at one door where voices were heard within, but the door was locked. Then in another room adjacent an attempt was made to discover him among a company of gentlemen sitting apparently in committee, but Comstock could not be seen. A ruse of running down stairs was made, only to retrace their steps just in time to find the door gently open that had before been tried and found locked. The officer slipped his foot between the door jamb and, walking into the room, arrested the great Anthony Comstock. He was taken before Justice Smith and committed in the following words of committal:

"'It appearing to me by the within depositions and statements that the crime therein mentioned has been committed, and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Anthony Comstock guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer and be admitted to bail in the sum of five hundred dollars, and be committed to the warden or keeper of the city prison of the city of New York until he givs such bail. SOLON B. SMITH,

"'Police Justice.

You will therefore see, on referring to your open letter, that you admit that my first public communication against your act was printed on the 14th day of Sept., and yet you charge me with being like Ananias and Sapphira of old, by keeping back a part. How could I mention, in my communication of the 14th, that which was not written by you until the 15th? But you know very well that the letter you refer to as having been kept back was referred to as above on the 20th day of September, that being the first letter from myself after receiving the letter written by you on the 15th. You therefore utterly fail to show in your open letter that I had kept anything back. In the same open letter you refer to a lawsuit in Ireland between Wetton & Co., and William Wilson, of No. 64½ Patrick street, Cork, and the most malicious act that any man could conceive is the taking the trouble of writing to Ireland for information respecting a man, and when such information is received, telling one-half the story in a open letter to the public and keeping back the other half. This you know you hav done, and I challenge you to publish at your own cost your open letter, as I at my own cost shall publish this. Your malicious act in thus concealing the real nature of the lawsuit between Wetton and myself as rival manufacturers and large employers of labor is an act unworthy of the commonest informer. I hav a deed from the British government wherein, on these element of that suit as above referred to, such deed binds my opponents to pay me a large sum of money in settlement thereof. Your attorney, Mr. Tenney, or Mr. Colgate, your President, can see that deed whenever they choose to call at my offices. Yet you, in your open letter, attempted to show that I had been guilty of a crime. If this was not vindictiv malice, what was it? Again, in the same open letter, yo i would insinuate that my patent and Edgar Wetton's were the same. Yet you know very well that the circular from which you obtained the names of my patients contains also the following description of my patent:

"During the past few years seven or eight different patents hav been taken out for Electric and Magnetic Belts, but the vital defect in each and all of them has been a want of means whereby the magnetism once imparted to them could be retained. This defect has been fully overcome in the 'Wilsonia' invention. William Wilson struck the happy idea of attaching a series of Voltaic Piles to the Magnets, which by absorbing the natural exudations of the skin giv out a constant galvanic current, and thus keep up a continuous supply of Magnetism. Another very important feature of the 'Wilsonia' invention is this. Wearers of these garments never experience unpleasant shocks and are never afflicted with sores, which inevitably result from wearing galvanic chain bands—they having to be steeped in vinegar to render them capable of imparting any curativ property, and in this process they become the mother of an incurable form of erysipelas! And then, the 'Wilsonia' is as comfortable to wear as any undergarment. These appliances keep the body warm in the cold season, and, by their power of absorption, impart, in the summer, a refreshing coolness."

Also the Method of Manufacture.

"Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing!

These goods are made as explained below, and every person following out the instructions here given can make for themselvs and their own wearing any garments to suit their malady.

Although I hav patented the invention, I giv any one the liberty to make for themselvs, but shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for others to wear, or to sell.

Process of Manufacture.

Take a sheet of cloth, or any woven fabric, lay it upon another sheet of gutta percha tissue, then lay a sheet of muslin corresponding in size; fasten these together. Then take hard steel plates (brittle as glass they need be for our purpose), cut them into narrow strips about one and a half inches long; perforate each plate, making a hole large enough to take in an ordinary shoe eyelet. These plates to the number of 250, with 500 eyelets, fastened to the cloth, are sufficient to make an ordinary NERVE INVIGORATOR. Over these plates, when fastened to the fabric, we place another sheet of india rubber tissue. Over this again we place another sheet of muslin and fasten the whole mass together with hot irons. We then puncture the eyelets the whole thickness of the fabric so fastened together, having about five hundred openings through the garments. Then we cover the whole with a lining of any material to suit the fancy of the wearer, but preferably canton flanuel should be used. When the garment is so far finished it is magnetized by a powerful electro magnet until every plate of the whole series is thoroughly saturated with magnetism.

Having described the process as above, I again say that if you make the garments as I direct they will do you just as much good as though I made them myself. But the above being my patent, I shall prosecute any one who dares to make them for profit, and shall use the utmost rigor of the law in so prosecuting.

Now, then, where comes in quackery with with the WILSONIA?" Why do not the advertisers of quack nostrums tell purchasers how to make their compounds?

Now, as to Prof. White's great discovery: He told us a few weeks ago, through the columns of the New York Herald, that he had made a marvelous discovery, viz., that the whole secret of the electric charge in the Gymnotus, or electric eel, lay wholly in the fact that the said electric ell was enveloped in a film, whereby its electric charge was augmented. This marvelous discovery, he said, was only made after six and three-quarter years of fruitless research, and by an accident, he goes on to say the whole thing was made complete.

Now it will be seen from reading the above formula, that WILLIAM WILSON'S patent was taken out two and a half years before Professor White made his statement through the columns of the Herald.

It is upon the Gutta Percha Film patented by MR. WILSON, that the secret of the "WILSONIA'S" force wholly lies.

Physicians, electricians, and scientists are, therefore, invited to examin critically into the nature of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING, and, with the formula before them, go into their laboratories and experiment for themselvs. They will then know that the

WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING

Is the Greatest Wonder of the Age, and yet withal one of the most Simple of Inventions.

In the same open letter which you sent to the newspapers you maliciously attempt to belittle me by assuming that, because I had been a cabinetmaker, I could not therefore attain to a knowledge of curativ agencies distinct from the methods laid down by the schools. In answer to this assumption of yours, I can only say that I pity you for your stupidity. Do you not know that the celebrated Dr. John Hunter of London worked at the bench as a cabinetmaker at forty-two years of age, and afterward became the most eminent surgeon in Europe? and to-day the Hunterian Museum in London is a living monument of that cabinetmaker's skill? Do you not also know that all great inventions ever made emanate from among those whom we least suspect as the originators of new thought?

Another important reference in your open letter I refer to: On a board sign you say as follows: "Read the Anthony Comstock letters in favor of 'Wilsonia.'" In answer to which I simply say that I hav the copies of fifty-five letters sent to you in favor of my garments, the parties sending such letters being those to whom you had conveyed your libelous communication. Therefore I call these letters of my patients the Anthony Comstock letters, and shall continue to publish them in a pamphlet dedicated to the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn and New York; nor you nor your society shall intimidate me against such publication. Nothing shall be withheld nor held back. In conclusion, I again make the following challenge to you: To sign bonds for $5,000 if you can prove that I do not cure ninety per cent of the incurables given over by the doctors, or to produce one case where all the benefit was was not derived as promised on the purchase of the goods, such goods being worn as directed as to quantity and to time. I believe your society requires money to carry on its operations; here, therefore, is a chance to add to its funds. I will also sign bonds for a like sum if you can show one testimonial published by me that was not genuin, and will pay all expenses of the six physicians on whom you relied, and will meet them singly or as a body on any platform in the United States, and prove to an audience of scientists that these physicians know nothing of the nature of nerve fluid, the constitution of the blood, nor the difference between electricity and magnetism as a curativ agent. WILLIAM WILSON.

Having thus openly answered your letter, and wishing the whole thing to be closed up, I herewith make you this offer, viz: That you shall, upon the examination of the deeds referred to in my letter as above, between your attorney and Mr. Colgate, upon the conclusion of such investigation, giv me a letter of apology for having been instrumental in casting discredit upon my invention. I am quite willing to accept your plea of ignorance of the facts, and that you were deceived by others.

Upon receipt of such letter of apology, I will withdraw all further proceedings. WILLIAM WILSON.

Important to the Suffering and Afflicted Who Hav Been Deceived by Advertising Nostrum Venders.

The great success attending the introduction of my world-famed WILSONIA GARMENTS has incited a host of speculators to place upon the market several bogus arrangements under the specious titles of "Magnetic Clothing" or "Magnetic Garments." One unprincipled person has actually copied my engraving representing my clothing, so that a person not seeing the garments would take it for granted that the goods so advertised were facsimiles of the WILSONIA, the engravings representing the clothing being identical with those issued by myself thus tending to defraud the public by their purchasing a worthless article for the cure of some malady or other. This same person has copied, almost verbatim, the language of my own circulars. One of these garments was brought me direct from the vender. I find it to be a clumsy imitation of the first magnetic garments made in Europe some fifteen years ago. I would therefore ask the public to see the Wilsonia garments before purchasing anything represented as a magnetic clothing. They will then find that an attempt at imitation has been made by an engraved circular containing copies of my own circular as above stated, and so cunningly has the device been carried out that parties purchasing the goods from such circular will suppose that the garments so purchased were identical with my own, but when seen together they are as different as anything can possibly be conceived. If, however, persons will call at any of our STORES in New York or Brooklyn, or elsewhere in the United States where Wilsonia depots are opened, they may hav everything made clear to them. The claim of CHEAPNESS is a poor point to put forward when the matter of disease and life and death is in the balance. My reputation now is so unparalleled that never before in the history of the world hav such remarkable cures been effected as those following the timely use of the now world-renowned Wilsonia garments. The blind hav been made to see, the deaf to hear, the helpless paralytic to walk erect, the demented to become sane, the martyr to catarrh and asthma to speak and breathe freely, the terrified with heart disease to walk forward among the public without the terror of impending death. All and every form of disease disappearwhen the Wilsonia Magnetic Garments are used as directed. I will undertake to cure 90 per cent of the so-called incurables now in the hospitals in the United States, and will place my garments upon such patients free of charge, the only condition I make being that the authorities governing such hospitals shall not allow any medicin to be given the patients during the wearing of my garments, and that the cures shall be publicly advertised as soon as made. CITIZENS OF AMERICA! when and where in the history of the world has such an offer as this been made? Here, in New York and Brooklyn alone, there are thousands of poor invalids in our hospitals passing through the ordeal of a protracted and living death who might, if my offer be accepted, be restored to the world as useful members of society, and this free of charge. If my offer be not accepted by the physicians of the hospitals, then the physicians must stand convicted of indifference and carelessness toward the poor invalids intrusted to their care. I hav sold my patent to a company with a view of manufacturing on a very large scale, so that with increased facilities in the form of valuable machinery specially prepared for our purposes, we shall be able to place upon the market an unlimited supply of these wonderfully curativ appliances.

After years of study in the particular direction of electrical therapeutics, I hav from time to time made many improvements on my first conception of what was needed for the relief and cure of disease until the "Wilsonia" in its present form contains all the elements of what has gone before in the same direction. The continuity of current is made complete, the dangers of non-ventilation are entirely overcome. This is an important point in the "Wilsonia." Thousands of persons are to-day suffering from the effects of retarded perspiration, having had thrown back into the organism the poisonous emanations of the body. The expensiv nature of the "Wilsonia" combination in all its entirety makes the price somewhat high, but yet it is far the cheapest in the end, inasmuch as the curativ force will continue for years, although a commoner kind will frequently result in marvelous cures. These commoner goods we sell at the following prices:

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

REMEMBER it is circumstances that make us what we are. I do not blame men as some do, or call them ill names because they are somewhat tyranical over women. It is the outgrowth of the ages that has done this, and this outgrowth is still going on, but it will bring about a higher civilization that will make man more womanly and woman more manly. It will tone each class down into a more perfect completeness. Man will become gentle, kind, and forgiving, and woman will become self-reliant, self-supporting, and truly cultured. The domineering tyranny that now exhibits itself in nine-tenths of the men in their conduct toward mother, sister, and wife, will be changed into respect, true affection, and kindly consideration. The doll-baby pettiness and languid idleness of some women and the domestic slavery of others will be exchanged for real industry, intellectual development, and self-dependence; the man and woman will be equals in all things, and friends, companions, and co-workers.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THE mother of superstition was ignorance. Its foster-nurse has been the clergy. These hav tended and matured the misshapen babe, and under their care it has grown a very powerful and dominant monster. So careful has been their tending of it, so closely hav they allied themselvs with it, that now with its fate their own is bound up, and with it they must stand or fall, and every blow aimed at this hour at ignorance and superstition falls also upon them. With the slaying of superstition, or the slaying of the acceptance of that which is not proven, the downfall of the clergy must necessarily come.—Dr. Aveling on Superstition.

LIGHT—light breaks on the century's farthest round;
Light in the sky, light in the humblest home.
The unebbing tides of God, where errors drowned
Sink down to fathomless destruction, come
Swelling amain. Truth builds her eternal dome
Vast as the sky. Nations are linked in one Light, love, henceforth shall reign forever and alone. —The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

THE religion that says one man is savior is a false religion. All men are saviors, all truth lights the world, all virtue saves mankind. I believe in self-religion, self-atonement, and self-salvation. This religion wants no man-god, no book-god, no creed-god. Christianity says to other forms of idolatry, "My Christ is better than your Christ, my Bible is better than your Bible, etc. I am the only agent, authorized agent," etc. . . But no man is great enough, nor can be great enough, to stand to this age for God.—L. K. Washburn.

THE Rev. Mr. Lascelles, knowing the world, knew that a man like Mr. Richard Fullerton, openly professing Rationalism—which Christians take to be high-polite for Atheism—is a man having no solid foothold in English esteem. He may be as virtuous as Marcus Aurelius, as truth-loving as Socrates, as great as Plato, but—he disbelieves the seven days, the handful of clay, the rib and the tower of Babel; he denies that the sun and moon were ever stayed; he proves by anatomy that Jonah could not hav been swallowed by a whale; he doubts the cruse of oil and the ravens that fed the prophet; and he asks how all the kingdoms of a sphere could hav been seen from the top of any mountain in Judea or elsewhere; and it is therefore supposed that he is capable of every crime that can disgrace humanity, and that if he hav not committed himself hitherto it has been for want of temptation, not for want of will to yield, should that temptation arise.—Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord?

I CANNOT but think that the foundations of all natural knowledge were laid when the reason of man came face to face with the facts of nature; when the savage first learned that the fingers of one hand are fewer than those of both; that it is shorter to cross a stream than to head it; that a stone stops where it is unless it be moved, and that it drops from the hand which lets it go; that light and heat come and go with the sun; that sticks burn away in a fire; that plants and animals grow and die; that if he struck his fellow-savage a blow he would make him angry, and perhaps get a blow in return, while if he offered him a fruit he would please him, and perhaps receive a fish in exchange. When men had acquired this much knowledge, the outlines, rude as they were, of mathematics, of physics, of chemistry, of biology, of moral, economical, and political science were sketched. Nor did the germ of religion fail when science began to bud.—Huxley.

"BUT Mr. Fullerton—what is he like?" said the sister. "Pleasant and well-bred enough, but an outrageous Infidel; one of those presumptuous fools puffed up with a little pseudo knowledge who think themselvs capable of settling every subject, and who boast that they believe in nothing which they cannot see and touch—a rank Materialist, living without God in the world. As a man he is well enough, but as a soul he is as much in the clutches of the devil as was ever Judas. I feel that in fighting against him and his diabolical influence here I am fighting against Satan in bodily form." "And so you are," said his sister. "I hold all Infidels to be possessed. They are the emissaries of the evil one, and his so-called modern science is the means by which he works."—Under Which Lord? by Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

IT seems to me that the most orthodox Christian must admit that many of the miracles recorded in the New Testament are extremely childish. They must see that the miraculous draught of fishes, changing water into wine, fasting for forty days, inducing devils to leave an insane man by allowing them to take possession of swine, walking on the water, etc., are all unworthy of an infinit being and are calculated to provoke laughter, to feed suspicion, and engender doubt.—Ingersoll.

IT is the nature of foolish reasoning to seem good to the foolish reasoner.—George Eliot's Theophrastus Such.

A WESTERN judge has decided that "a married man must support his mother-in-law." This is a strange decision, but not as wonderful as if the judge had decided that an unmarried man must support his mother-in-law. This ruling will be apt to make a young man select a wife who never had a mother.

WE learn from an advertisment that prices for masked ball costumes are various. You can be a kind old gentleman with a long white beard for ten dollars; but if you want to be a monk you must pay forty dollars, and to represent a first-class devil with hoofs and a plenitude of tail costs seventy dollars. Some men, however, can personate the latter individual without expending a cent. They can't help it.

THEY were seated around the red-hot stove of a tavern in a little village in Kentucky, oblivious of the snow storm that was raging fiercely without. The subjects of discussion were toddy and the Guiteau trial.

"Yes, gentlemen," said the blacksmith, who was noted near and far for the power of his argument, "the trial at Washington is a mere farce, and the sooner that scoundrel Guiteau is strung up the better. He is no more crazy than you or I."

"I dun' know, I dun' know," dubiously remarked the man who kept the store at the cross-roads.

"You don't know!" echoed the blacksmith, gazing warmly at him. "Why, when I read in the country papers some months ago that the poor President died from blood-poisoning, I says to myself, says I, 'The cowardly varmint is only playing the insanity dodge!' For, if he had the cunning forethought to poison each of the bullets before he loaded his pistol, thinking thereby to make a sure job of it, why, it only goes to prove that he is too devilish sane for the common good. Them's my sentiments!"

He paused, inverted his glass, and looked around with an air of conviction. All were silent for some time. Then the cross-roads man, in a scarcely audible voice, ordered toddy for the crowd.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.
A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.
Spermatorrhea and Impotency,
as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an
which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Failing Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.
SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
Middle-Aged and Old Men.
There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.
PRIVATE COUNSELOR.
Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]
Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."
[From the (Mo.) Liberal.]
The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.
This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.
In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

Notes and Clippings.

THE project of a world's fair in Boston has been abandoned. Talk was plenty and money scarce.

THE question whether a Methodist layman may race horses without sin is before a Troy church.

SPURGEON has just cracked his best joke. He says that Christians meet with nothing but persecution in this world.

THE father of the British army is Gen. Geo. Macdonald, who entered it in 1805, and is aged ninety-seven years and two months.

THE color line has extended into Canada. Two citizens of Toronto were refused admittance to the skating-rink because of their color.

A COLORED preacher and three of his congregation are under arrest in Montgomery county, Md., charged with tearing down and hauling away their meeting-house.

THE Rev. George Sanger, vicar of Carlton-in-Cleveland, in England, has been arrested on a charge of wilfully and maliciously setting fire to his own church on the 19th of October last.

THERE was so much drunkenness in Salt Lake City, Utah, on the Christmas holiday, that the city council passed a special ordinance forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors on New Year's day.

A COLLECTION of letters written by Voltaire to the private secretary of the Empress Catharine will shortly be published. They were recently discovered, hid away in the library of a Russian country home.

THE officials of London, Canada, hav distinguished themselvs by declining to protect the first Chinaman who settled in that city, and as the roughs gave him no peace he was compelled to quit the place.

JOSEPH COOK and wife are said to hav lunched, Thanksgiving Day, on the Acropolis, at Athens. Most people would hav preferred turkey, but no doubt the Acropolis is easier of digestion than one of Mr. Cook's lectures.—Boston Herald.

AT the funeral of Chief-Justice Pierpont, of Vermont, at Vergennes, the preacher caused some resentment among the mourners by expressing sorrow that the deceased had "never given expression to those views which are considered necessary to the Christians."

WHILE preaching from the text, "He giveth his beloved sleep," a Toledo minister stopped in the middle of his sermon, gazed upon his sleeping auditors, and said, "Brethren, it is hard to realize the wondrous unbounded love the Lord appears to hav for a good portion of this congregation!"

SWITZERLAND, which has, like several other small states, hitherto refused protection or encouragement to inventors, is not unlikely to hav a patent law before long. On the recommendation of the Federal Council, the National Assembly is engaged in considering a bill having this object in view.

THE religious census which has been taken in Dundee shows that in respect of church attendance things are no better in Scotland than in England. Out of a population of 142,000, only some 30,000 people were present in any place of worship on a recent Sunday. Of these only a little over 8,000 were in the established churches.

M. RENAN is writing his confessions, and the history begins at the seminary of St. Sulpice. The theological college is curiously described. Here is an example of the reverent way in which a theologian speaks of his first spiritual director: "M. Cottofrey had the ravishing, rosy face of an English miss. It was the most extraordinary example of suicide by mystic orthodoxy. I never knew a man who could hav been better loved by women. He had in him an infinit wealth of love."

A LONDON bookseller has done what the church would hardly dare to do—put the devil down in his proper place as a dignitary of the church. In his catalog he advertises a book containing "sixty-nine engravings either from wood or metal, twelve of which bear inscriptions representing scenes of Christian mythology, figures of patriarchs, saints, devils, and other dignitaries of the church."

A RICH financier died the other day in Paris. He fell down on the boulevard in a fit and was carried into a private house. The inmates, seeing him at the point of death, and not knowing what his religion was, brought a crucifix and put it to his lips. The old Hebrew stared at the emblem with a glazed eye, and with his parting breath murmured, "I can't lend more than two francs on it."

FATHER COLLINS, secretary and chancellor to the Roman Catholic Bishop McNierney, of Albany, was arrested in Utica a few days ago for being intoxicated in public. He gave his name at first as Brown, but subsequently revealed his identity, giving the thin excuse that he had taken some quinine pills before going to a card party, and that the wine that he drank there, though in itself insufficient to unbalance him, did so in connection with the quinine.

THE Christian Intelligencer has this wail: "It cannot be said to hav been a year of religious prosperity. There has been an almost unprecedented lack of conversions, a painful growth of the spirit of worldliness, and covetousness, and formality over the church, accompanied by a decrease of candidates for the ministry. The undermining of faith in fundamental truth, in the Bible, in God himself, has gone on, inside and out of the church, among the learned and the vulgar."

INFIDELITY is said to be making rapid progress in Japan. Says a missionary: "Infidelity is vigorous and aggressiv, clothed in the garb of the highest culture. Prof. Morse, for some time a leading mind in the Imperial university at Tokio, was a pronounced skeptic, exhibiting almost the zeal of a ranter against the Christian religion, and the prevailing sentiments at this seat of learning is anything but favorable to evangelical faith. Infidel literature, including Paine's 'Age of Reason,' is being translated and industriously placed before the public."

THE Banner of Light says: "Rev. E. B. Hopkins, of St. Johnsbury, Vt., recently found guilty of larceny and forgery in connection with his insurance business, the daily prints inform the public, has been committed to the Brattleboro asylum in an exhausted state of insanity. Had Mr. Hopkins been a Spiritualist what a howl of condemnation would hav gone up from the church organs! But, in this and similar cases, when one of their own teachers is a victim of insanity—no matter what the cause—these journals are as silent as death upon the subject. It makes all the difference in the world with them whose ox is gored."

TALMAGE is preaching against Ingersoll every Sunday, but it is the shallowest rubbish we ever read. A Sunday-school boy could do better. If he thinks his congregation will take his stuff for law and gospel he must hav a mighty poor opinion of their intelligence. He said the universe was not made from nothing, but from God's omnipotence. Is omnipotence any more tangible as a raw material than nothing, Mr. Talmage? If God could make a limitless universe out of his omnipotence, can't you make just a little one out of your little omnipotence? It would be such a very little one, we know, but we would like to see you try the experiment.

THE pope received at the Vatican, on Saturday, Dec. 24th, the cardinals residing in Rome, who went to present to him their congratulations for Christmas and the New Year. In reply, his holiness said his position was becoming more and more intolerable. Only recently he had been insulted in the persons of the saints whom he had canonized. If he claimed the temporal power, in order to secure the indepeudence of his spiritual power, he was accused of being a rebel and an enemy of Italy. It was only natural that the faithful throughout the world should display anxiety for the present and the future. In conclusion, the pope said he expected more persecution in the time to come.

THE London Freethinker, waxing sarcastic, asks: "Hav we not all read how, several centuries ago, Freethinkers burnt Christians to death, and tortured them with the rack and the thumbscrew? And do we not remember how the solitary Christian who got elected as a member of Parliament not long since went up to the House of Commons and was chucked out by fourteen big policemen? And don't we know that the arbitrary majority were all Freethinkers, and that the speaker, Charles Bradlaugh, occupied outside the House of Commons the office of president of a tyrannous society for the crushing of stray Christians like fleas? Poor Christians! How they do suffer! But the Lord will reward them a hundredfold."

AN American traveler has revisited the village of Oberammergau, where he had seen the last performance of the Passion play, and he writes to the Springfield Republican that he regrets having done so. The woman who acted the Virgin Mary he found digging potatoes in a field, barefooted, disheveled, and filthy; Mary Magdalen was on her hands and knees, scrubbing a floor, and presenting an unsightly appearance; and the personator of Christ was carving ornaments which had been ordered by tourists who had seen and admired him in the play. "A mug half full of beer was on a rough bench within his reach, and as his chisel was nimbly tracing and forming the intricate and delicate designs on the piece of wood before him, he was at the same time vigorously puffing a huge German pipe that hung down over the red shirt that covered his bosom." But something still more disenchanting was seen in the village inn, kept by Herod. "Nicodemus, Pontius Pilate, Judas Iscariot, St. John, St. Peter, St. Matthew, Barnabas, and two or three of the centurios were making merry over their beer mugs. They were in a discussion of the Passion play, there evidently being a division of opinion as to how certain parts could be acted with the greatest effect. John and Judas were in a half-maudlin state, and were singing snatches from some of the choruses in the play."

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER said in his Friday night talk, at Plymouth church, that "ten months in the year are quite enough for any minister to work. During the other two months properly trained Christians are perfectly well able to take care of themselvs." The question that naturally presents itself to the inquiring mind is, What is a "properly trained Christian?" Is he a being who waters stock during the week and passes the plate in church on Sunday? Or is he the man who expects from his employees a man's work for boy's wages, and contributes a large sum for his pastor to go to Europe? Or is he the man who looks upon the theater with horror, and goes to questionable balls on the sly? Or is he, perhaps, the godly man who compels his children to go to church three times on Sunday, and makes the day, to them, one of terror instead of rest? It would be really quite interesting to know what a "properly trained Christian" is. There hav been such bad examples lately of what may possibly become of truly good people that there is not a little anxiety to see some of these people whom it is safe to leave without spiritual consolation for the space of two months. It was generally believed that when churches were instituted it was for the improvement of the ungodly and the conversion of the unregenerate. But Brother Beecher opens up a new idea. They are intended for "properly trained Christians." Who is to decide when the training is proper? —Truth.

AT the Wentworth, Ont., assizes, a girl who had been called as a witness was committed for forty-eight hours for contempt of court, because she refused to take the oath, on the ground that the Bible commanded her to "swear not at all."

THE pope declined to comply with the law requiring him to fill up a census paper, but a monsignor gave the return, showing that there are five hundred persons living in the Vatican, nearly one-half of whom are women, though in what capacity is not stated.

SIX murderers were hanged in different parts of the country on Friday, the 15th. There seemed to be a unanimity of belief among them that their admission into heaven was assured, and one, a negro, rewarded a favor by promising the donor a "lift" when he (the murderer) got to the other side.

A FRIGHTFUL accident occurred on the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, at Spuyten Duyvil, on the evening of the 15th. The Atlantic express train halted to repair a brake just after rounding a curve, and a local Tarrytown train, running at full speed, crashed into the rear car of the standing train. Two cars were telescoped. Ten or twelve persons perished, including State-Senator Wagner, and a Catholic priest, the rear car having caught fire from a stove. The blame is attached to a brakeman, whose duty it was to go back and signal the approaching train to stop, which it is claimed he failed to do.

THE Guiteau trial is dragging its slow length along. The closing speeches are being made by defense and prosecution. Judge Cox decided not to allow Guiteau to address the jury, and the latter has given his intended speech to the Associated Press. He calls it a "historical" document, and depends upon it for vindication before the American people. The speech is of great length. It contains a letter entitled "A Genuin Christian on the Guiteau case," which originally appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but which the assassin, by some strange conceit, attributes to providence. He harps on the inspiration theory, warns the Americans not to fly in the face of the Almighty, and concludes that is best to hav the shooting officially recognized as the act of a madman.

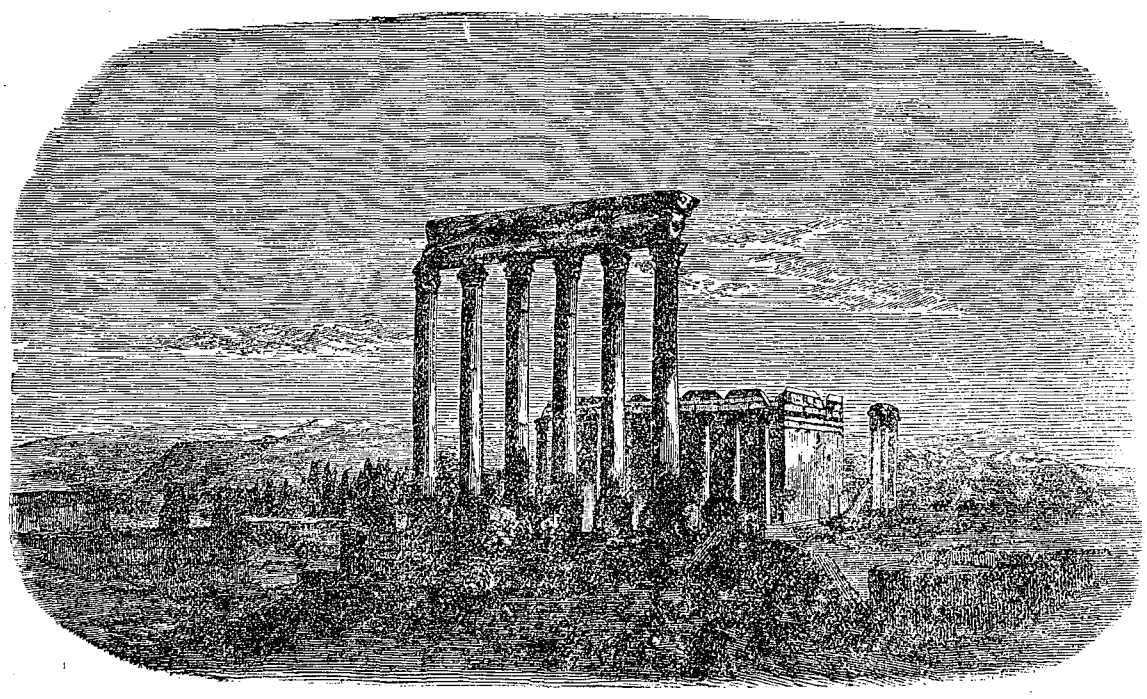
FINE VIEWS.

In the afternoon our ride up Mount Lebanon was most interesting. On our left was still hoary-headed and snow-capped Sannin; fifteen miles behind us could we see the city of Beyrout nestling quietly down by the sea, and for fifty miles could we view the beautiful Mediterranean spread out in vast expanse like a beautiful and unruffled mirror. Owing to the transparency of the atmosphere here one can see with considerable clearness at much greater distances than in our country, or in most others. The weather is perfect, though in the middle part of the day the sun is too warm and burning to be just agreeable. In the warm part of the day the thermometer indicates from 72° to 80°; at night the mercury sinks to from 40° to 50°. It is not the heat of the midday that is so oppressive, but the constant burning glare of the sun without a moment's cessation. For days together we have a cloudless sky, without a fleck or spot to change the monotony of the blue expanse. As we ascend the mount the fertility of the soil decreases, but the plentifulness of the stones increases, and in some places there are so many of the stones there is no soil at all, and the husbandmen are forced to abandon it entirely to the sun and the winds. The manner in which the strata of rock lie here is very noticeable. In places they are perfectly perpendicular, and seem to have been thrown up at a former era of the earth, the mountain being left while all around shrunk with the rest of the earth's surface—and whichever way it was the writer of the book of Genesis seems to have known nothing of it, or was unable to make any explanation of it—while in other places the strata lie horizontaly, fitting together with great regularity, like blocks in a pavement. It is indeed curious to look around on the noble old mountain and see how little its scenery looks like the mountains and hills in our own country. Here, where mighty cedars are said to once have grown, there is now not a tree or bush to be seen save the fig, mulberry, and trees of that sort planted by the hand of man. All is rock, rock, and rock and earth blended together. The soil seems to be of a very mellow character, and only has to be stirred up with the crude plows of the country to turn up as mellow as an ash-heap. There are no clods or lumps of clay here; and it is quite well it is so, for there are stones enough to answer all reasonable demands. We see great numbers of men plowing, the teams being invariably small oxen, and the plows of the rudest construction, and of the same fashion as were in use here three thousand years ago—an upright piece of wood which looks like the limb of a tree, the lower end sharpened to a dull point; this stands with the upper end leaning backward, and a foot from the lower point a mortise is made through which what serves as the beam of the plow passes, and to the front end of which the cattle are hitched—or perhaps the mortise is made in the horizontal piece; but the whole affair does not weigh more than one-tenth part what one of our plows does. On the lower point of the upright piece an iron or steel shoe or point is placed, somewhat like a small corn-plow or point, which simply stirs up the earth three or four inches deep, and turns the furrow just as much one way as the other. These imperfect plows are all they know of here, and they seem to be all that is necessary, for by scratching the earth's surface with them the soil produces abundantly, though crops have been taken from it for these three thousand years, and without any fertilizer being put back in return.



It is indeed a most prolific and a most remarkable soil. This is the season of the year for putting in the fall grains—wheat and barley—and the plan is to sow the grain before the plowing is done, and when the surface has been scratched over in the manner described the cultivation for the year on that portion of land is ended. Oats are not known here, and rye is very little grown. I also see nothing like meadows, no hay-stacks, and no barns but a few low stone stables, which look much like the dwellings for the people. There is also very little pasturage here, there being but slight grass of any kind natural to the country. The harvesting of the grain is done altogether by the sickle, and the threshing is done on the old-fashioned threshing-floors—smooth places on the soil, where the grain is strewn around and trod out by cattle, and the clearing up or winnowing done by the breezes of heaven. The straw and chaff are carefully saved as food for the cattle and donkeys.

As night came on I found that Al Borak had lost considerable of the spirit or "vim" with which he set out in the morning, and that I had to urge him considerably to induce him to keep up with the rest of the company. The traveling is done principally in a fast walk, but Al Borak is not a fast walker, and I find a switch serves to remind him of his duty and aids him in keeping along with our companions. If not a good walker, he is at least a good stumbler, especially in the after part of the day, when he begins to grow weary, and if he does not succeed in throwing about one hundred and eighty pounds of Infidel flesh over his head one of these fine days it will not be his fault. He, with the other horses of the company, has been lying still some nine days waiting for this expedition, and I think they all feel a little weary to-night, as well as do the riders.

OUR CAMP.

Much compensation, however, was realized by all of us for the day's labor by coming to our camp for the night on a level spot by the side of the road. The dragomans and muleteers had preceded us, and had the tents already pitched and prepared for us by the time we arrived; and a neater, more cheerful, and more inviting place to a party of weary travelers can hardly be imagined. It is almost wonderful how skilful these dusky sons of the sun-land are in the equipments of camp life. There are seven tents in all—one being for the saloon or dining-tent, in which we take our meals at a nicely set and furnished table; five are devoted to the members of the party; and the remaining one to the conductor, Mr. Clark, the dragomans, muleteers, etc. Mr. Bridges, the Rev. Mr. James, and myself are assigned to one tent; the Rev. Mr. Getz, M. Levebre, and Master Wetmore to another; Judge Lawson and son to another; Mrs. Moots, Miss Brayman, and Miss Rose to another; and Mrs. Lawson and daughter to the remaining one. Each tent is nicely carpeted; every person has a separate bed—a portable iron bedstead on the cot plan—and to each is assigned a wash-basin and a pitcher of water. In every tent is a table, for lights and to write and read upon. The tents are twelve feet or more in diameter, and on the plan of a huge umbrella with a staff in the center, only the apex is more pointed than that of an umbrella, and the lower edge is some six or seven feet from the ground. An extra piece of tenting fills the space, leaving a doorway for entrance, which is covered, when desired, by an extra piece of the same goods, so that each tent makes a little circus by itself, and is as snug and exclusive when inclosed as a room in a hotel, and nearly as convenient. The conical and upright portions of the tents are supplied with ribs of wood, much on the plan of an umbrella, and which keep the affair in proper form; and the whole is well secured by cords attached to stakes, carried for the purpose, which are driven into the ground. The tents are double, the outer thickness being of common canvas, while the inner one is of black goods with ornamental pieces of many colors, bearing some resemblance to vines, leaves, flowers, and other vegetation, which are sewed on with decided ingenuity, and which give the inside of the tent a fantastic and gaudy appearance. It is very doubtful if the great Sardanapalus had anything like them in his day, or if Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these; while there is not the least probability that even Abraham, the father of the faithful—who, so Freeman-like, willingly proceeded to sacrifice his little boy, and got up the original "Pocasset tragedy"—had anything in the way of tents to compare with these modern ones of Thomas Cook & Son, which were made by the ingenious women of Alexandria, Egypt, at a cost of about sixty dollars each for the needle-work. The tents are placed sufficiently contiguous, so that none are widely separated, and the dining-room tent is central among them. I must not omit to mention, so perfect are the arrangements that there are also two small square tents marked with a G on one for gentlemen, and L on the other, for ladies. Inside are all the modern improvements.

By the time we got washed, our hair combed, and got some books, etc., from our satchels, the gong, or rather Syrian horn, sounded the notice that dinner was ready; and nothing loth, after the day's ride, we marched willingly into the saloon-tent, where a fine feast awaited us. The first course was soup, and better we have not tasted in many a day. The next course was chicken, well cooked. I will remark here, by way of parenthesis, that chicken is a very usual viand in this Eastern world. Scarcely a day and hardly a meal passes but what we have chicken, hot or cold. This suits me. I could not be better suited than to be kept largely on a chicken diet. I have often thought I have one, at least, of the characteristics of a Methodist preacher—a fondness for young, yellow-legged chickens. I presume you have nearly all heard how the chickens in the western part of our country formerly became so well acquainted with this ministerial weakness that whenever they saw a Methodist parson approaching on horseback, or otherwise, they instantly secreted themselves; but lately, learning by dear experience that resistance is useless, and that the inevitable can not be evaded, they walk quietly up to the beheading-block, lay their necks upon it, and cross their legs in the most exemplary Christian resignation. Of such is the kingdom of heaven. This is the end of the parenthesis. The next course is beef and potatoes, the next a desert of pastry, winding up with delicious grapes, dates, and Syria walnut meats, which, by the bye, are very fine.

BAALBEC.

Our cook is said to be the best in all Syria, but let that be as it may, he is good enough for Queen Victoria, or King Kalakua himself. His name—that is to say, the cook's—is George, and he is an Abyssinian, and consequently a Christian. He is as black as an ordinary Guinea negro, but has not the thick lips and obtuse nose of that species of Africans. His cook-stove is a sheet-iron box three or four inches deep, three feet long, and ten inches wide, with feet to it. The fuel is charcoal, which is carried along in sacks; and that is the range on which he roasts, fries, boils, and bakes, as well as makes capital tea and coffee. In every way we live as well as at a first-class hotel; and if the Lord, or rather Cook & Son, have not provided munificently for us, I would like to know the reason why.

We have come, the way the road serpentines up the mountain, some eighteen miles from Beyrout, but still it is plainly in sight from our camp, and we being nearly four thousand feet above, are, of course, able to look benignantly upon it, and it seems not more than eight or ten miles away. And Oh! what a beautiful view it is! It is so charming I can hardly speak of it often enough to make you realize it as we do here. I would be willing to forego my hopes of paradise for the space of fifteen minutes if you could all take in the lovely view of the Mediterranean, the town of Beyrout, and all the intervening country, as we can here on this Lebanon eminence. The air is considerably cooler here than in the town last night. It is not strange; the thousands of feet we have risen, and the proximity of snowy Sannin accounts for it. But we are content; we are on glorious Mount Lebanon, and everybody is, or ought to be, happy. Several of the males, including the Rev. Mr. James, are in the saloon-tent taking a few rubbers of whist, but having more of a pious turn myself, I have remained in our own tent putting in some two hours at writing, but I am weary and sleepy now, so good-night, and pleasant dreams.

Friday, Nov. 11. We were called to arise from our cots this morning by such a novel tom-tom-talaber-tin as is not often heard. The performers consisted of six persons, led by Mr. Clark with the Syrian horn, and five of the natives beating tin pans together and drumming on kettles. It equaled a first-class charivari, and one might suppose the wedding of some hoary patriarch to a damsel of fifteen was being celebrated. Nobody could sleep amid such a din as that, so little remained for us to do but to rise, dress, say our prayers, (the Rev. Mr. James prays quite enough for the three in the tent bearing the stars and stripes), and get ready for breakfast. In half an hour we were called in, and partook heartily of poached eggs, a little chicken by way of variety, bread and butter (the latter a canned article, all the way from Copenhagen, and very nice withal), strawberry jam, apricot marmalade, and black currant jam, with tea and coffee. If a man could have the cheek to find fault with such a breakfast as that he would surely grumble were he to be hung.

In a very short time after we had risen from the table the tents were taken down, rolled skilfully together and packed; the bedsteads were doubled up in a very compact form, the luggage placed in sacks carried for the purpose, and everything disposed of in a similar manner, and placed on the mules' backs. No set of circus men could be more expeditious. Our horses having been curried, fed, and saddled, we soon mounted for our second day's march, with the fine oriental sun sending down his bright beams upon us. I need hardly repeat that our entire company makes a very respectable caravan, and I think it would be difficult in a party of the same number, as you would pick them up, to find a greater amount of piety. This ought not to be wondered at when it is borne in mind that I count one in this distinguished company.

Hoary Sannin looks very good with early morning rays striking fairly upon it, though not with sufficient force to melt the coating of snow which covers it. The air is as clear as can be imagined; as we ride along we can count from one point fifteen separate villages in the little valleys and on the hill-tops of Mount Lebanon. These villages, of course, are neither large or imposing, but nevertheless they are villages, composed of quite a group of the low, flat-roofed houses I have described. There is nothing inviting about them; very slight show of gardens or flowers, and not a fence within ten miles of them; neither are there fences by the roadside. With the exception of the fig-trees and the mulberry-trees, with a meager show from the vineyards, everything is barren, but still grand. Nothing in the way of shrub, bush, or tree grows spontaneously. Some one borrowed the switch I had yesterday, and feeling that Al Borak would be encouraged by the gentle persuasion of something of the kind, I looked about to see what I could find; but not on this mountain, once celebrated for its cedars, could I find anything to answer the purpose, save the sprout of a grape-vine, and in the necessity of the case—and necessity knows no law—I was constrained to cut one. Some of the party tried to make it appear that I had committed petit larceny, but I deemed it so petty that a case could hardly be made out. I said the shoot I had cut might possibly have produced next year two clusters of grapes; these, in this land of grapes, would be worth three cents, which misfortune would be trifling in comparison with that of having a slow horse. I do not wish to be left far in the rear, and at any time would sacrifice a Syrian's grape-sprout rather than have it occur.

We still ascend the mountain, and still from favorable points obtain lingering views of Beyrout and the sea. We reach a huge cliff of perpendicular rocks by the roadside, with a Syrian name hard to remember, but which means a very cold place, where the snow falls deep in winter, and where many weary, storm-bound travelers have succumbed and frozen to death. We sigh inaudibly and pass on. We near the summit of the pass, and as we reach this elevation we get almost beyond the line of cultivation. The lands above the barren, rocky cliffs are never plowed.

Lebanon means "white;" "the white mountain," a name partly given it from the snow which covers the highest portion of it through the greater portion of the year, and partly from the whitish or chalky appearance of the naked rocks. In Jeremiah xxvii, 14, mention is made of the "snow of Lebanon," and in the Chaldean paraphrase the name of Lebanon is "snow mountain," which is synonymous with a modern Arabic appellation sometimes used, Jebel-eth-Thelj. The highest mountains in all parts of the world have a similar signification.

MOUNT HERMON.

About 10:30 A.M. we reached the pass, 5,800 feet above the sea-level. Here we had lost sight of Beyrout and the Mediterranean, but in its place, or rather on the opposite side, loomed proudly up another range of bold mountains called Anti-Lebanon, the southern part of which terminates in Mount Hermon, often mentioned in the Bible. Its hight is twelve thousand feet above the sea, and its top is always capped with snow. It is a majestic looking hight, and while viewing it, apparently not more than ten miles away, but really fully twice that distance, I could realize the grandeur of the simile used in Psalms cxxxiii, where the goodness and pleasantness of brethren dwelling together in unity is likened to the dew of Hermon. I like that far better than that other simile in the same psalm, about the same unity between brethren being like precious ointment put upon the head and running down the beard, and even down to the skirts of the garments. Pshaw! there is nothing nice about that simile; it seems too suggestive of lard oil or soap grease; it is not good, but the "dew of Hermon" is grand.

The meaning of the euphonious name of Hermon is "lofty" or "prominent peak," and the mountain bearing the title occupies a most commanding position and is said to be visible from Sarepta, Tyre, and even from the depths of the Jordan Valley, near the Dead Sea, and of course from nearly all parts of Palestine. The ancient Bible names given it all bear a similar meaning—"Sion" (the upraised), because it towers above all the neighboring mountains; "Sirion" (the glittering), as it was called by the Sidonions; "Shenir" (the clattering), by the Amorites. Both of the words also mean "breast-plate." The mountain is now called Jebel-esh-Shiekh (the chief mountain) also suggestive of its imposing appearance. Twice in scripture the name Baal-Hermon is given to the mountain, no doubt because the worship of Baal, or the sun, was conducted upon it. It is said the ruins of temples of Baal or the sun are still found on its summits as well as on the other hights in the same range. The lofty hights of mountains have from time immemorial been selected by the devout of all nations as fitting places to worship the most high according to their conception, and it is not at all strange that the Jews should have partaken of the same idea, and that, though Hermon was not within their territory, they felt a very high degree of reverence for it.

Mount Hermon has been called the Mont Blanc of Palestine. It was the great land-mark for the northern border of the "promised land." Three separate hights form the summit, and these are nearly three thousand feet higher than the general range of Anti-Lebanon, which latter term means "the white mountain over against Lebanon." The loftiest peak is on the north; the second is three hundred yards to the south of the highest one; beneath it, about five thousand feet from the summit, are the highest sources of the river Pharpar; the third hight is a quarter of a mile to the westward, and separated from the others by a small valley. The views from these summits are said to be grand. The course of the Jordan can be followed, the mountains of Moab are seen, as are also the lake of Tiberias and Lake Huleh, Samaria, Galilee, Carmel, Tyre, and the Mediterranean.

VALLEY OF LEBANON.

Between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon is the beautiful Valley of Lebanon or Cœle Syria, a magnificent plain of intervale, about fifty miles in length by from five to eight in width. We had a splendid view of it as we reached the summit and began to descend. It spreads out before the beholder with still green trees, and, in places, green fields, showing that the entire tract is under a pretty high state of cultivation. In the spring of the year, when nature is at her best, this valley, when viewed from the mountain on either side, must present a splendid view, for even at this season of the year, when we look for little that can be admired in the vegetable world, it presents a very agreeable landscape.

Our descent was far more rapid than the ascent, for the very good reason that the distance is far less. The valley itself is some 3,800 feet above the level of the sea; so by an uncommonly serpentine and zig-zag road we reached the valley by 11:30. A mile or so along in the plain we stopped for lunch in a rich mulberry orchard, where vegetables and trees were luxuriant all around us. The northeast side of Lebanon is steeper and far less fertile than the southwest side, which we ascended, and but a small portion of it is worth cultivating; but the valley makes amends for all. It is wonderful to contemplate what it has continuously produced for these thousands of years without compensation, and how fertile it still remains, though it has never had a thorough plowing in all that time. I could hardly help asking myself, Will the soil of America bear such treatment as that, and hold out so well? I fear it is quite too much to expect.

A CALL AT ZAHLEH.

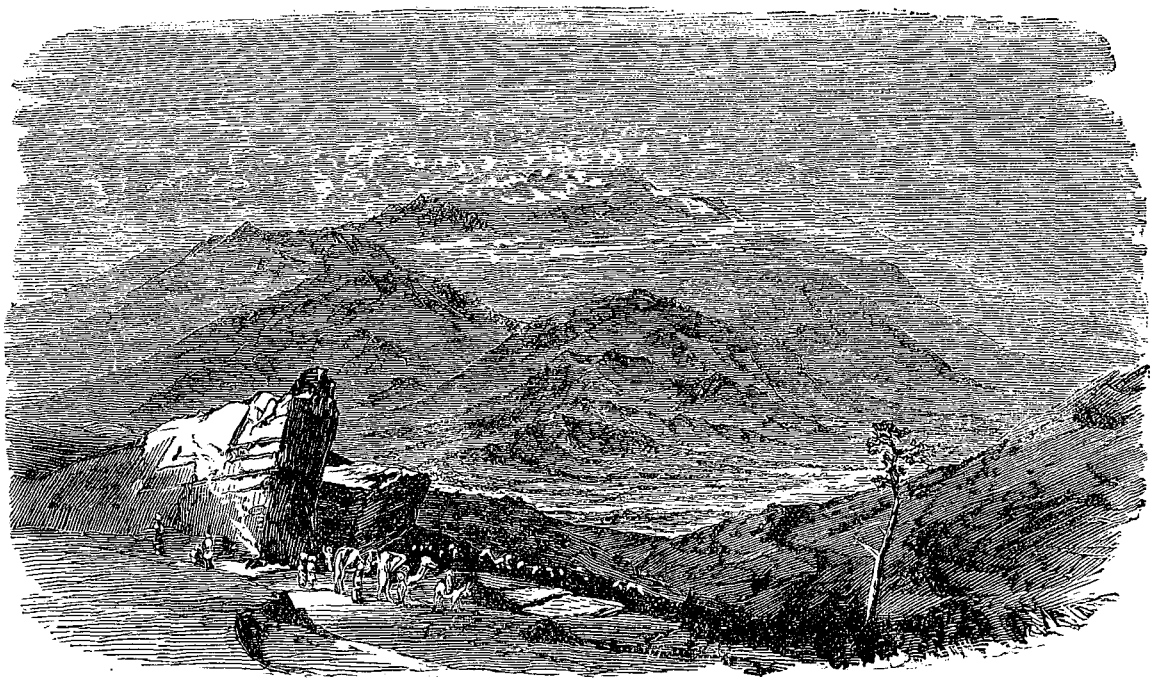
In due time we were on our way again, leaving the village of Shtora behind us, and turning up a rugged, stony hill to reach the town of Zahleh, the largest in Lebanon. Including the suburb Meiallake it contains about sixteen thousand inhabitants, about nine-tenths of whom are Christians, the other tenth being Moslems. But just such a town I never wish to see again. I never did see a place containing the same population which possessed so few points of attraction. It is composed of the low, dingy, cheerless, one-story houses I have described, and being built on a side-hill the streets are steep, besides being narrow, very roughly paved, dirty, muddy from water running down them, and most irregular and cheerless. We rode through the town to nearly its highest part to visit the school presided over by the Rev. Mr. Dale of America, who has made his home here for over nine years. He had not returned from Beyrout, whither he had gone, but we had an interesting talk with Mrs. Dale, a lady of intelligence and pleasing manner. We made many inquiries relative to the school and the country, which she replied to kindly. We learned that the school is for boys exclusively; that about thirty attend regularly, though some forty-eight are on the roll. The school is free, no pay being required, and much tact has to be employed to induce a regular attendance. In the winter time, when the weather is cold, the boys, having no fires at home, gladly go to school to have a warm place. The same is true of the church where Mr. Dale preaches, in Arabia. His sermons are much the best attended in cold weather, when a good fire is kept up. Fuel is dear, it being a poor quality of small soggy stuff, brought a long way on the backs of camels.

The boys learn readily the lessons taught both in Arabic and English. Considerable pains is taken to give a religious education, which, of course, means a Christian education. It seems hardly necessary for Americans to throw their lives away to come here to teach Christianity, for the people have had it all the time. Here Syriac Christianity has existed for eighteen hundred years; here the Greek church has had a strong hold for centuries. Here is a strong division of the Greek church, called the Catholic, but not the Roman Catholic. Here are also strongly represented the Maronites, a Christian sect, much like the Romish church, with the exception that the service is not in the Latin language, but in the language of the country. In addition, the Jesuits of the Romish church are strong here, and are using much exertion to induce the youth of the country to attend their schools and take their sample of Christianity. And besides all this, the Presbyterians of America and the Episcopals of England are "moving heaven and earth," so to speak, to get their share of the spoils. The boys' school is sustained by the Presbyterians of America, while the girls' school, founded by a Mrs. Mott, is kept up by the English church, or members of it. So it is a lively contest to see whether the worshipers of the virgin or of her son shall enroll the greatest number, though they are all Christians and going to heaven with positive certainty, but by different roads.

I made up my mind to two things; first, that "the game is not worth the candle," or, in other words, that the saving of souls from the virgin and giving them to the son, or taking them from Mohammed and giving them to Jesus, costs more than it comes to. Second, that this people and this country are suffering more for other things than for Christianity; they need a good government to know how to make good roads, build good plows, make carts, till the land better, erect good houses, and to learn to lead pleasant, useful lives.

Dr. Dale has been fortunate enough to make friends with the pasha of the Zahleh district, who is an Italian, and who shows much favor to the Protestants. Dr. Dale lives in the best house in town; the room we were received in is high, has a marble floor, and a rude painting of Constantinople at one end on the wall. It is large and cold in winter, and the doctor and wife wished a stove in it to keep it warm. The owner is a very wealthy man, who, however, rose from a position of camel-driver to what he is. Dr. Dale put up the stove, but the owner was so displeased that he came up, and, being a large, powerful man, set the stove out of doors. The doctor did not like this, and wrote a letter of complaint to the pasha, who was at Beyrout, and the pasha immediately sent word for the house-owner to be arrested and brought before him to Beyrout. His orders were executed, and the house-owner, though very wealthy, was compelled to remain in prison several weeks, when, upon his making an apology to the reverend doctor, he was let out of prison without a trial, since which time he has treated his Presbyterian tenant with becoming respect. In another instance, after Dr. Dale had caused the church to be erected in which he preaches, a prominent member of the Greek church entered it and cursed the Protestant religion. This, of course, was too great an outrage to be submitted to. Another letter was written to the pasha and the Greek Christian was suddenly incarcerated in prison until he got so humble that he was very willing to ask pardon and promise to behave himself properly in the future. This superior righteousness, when the pasha is on the same side, most gloriously triumphs.

Mrs. Dale kindly served each of us with a tiny cup of coffee, when we bade her adieu, and got down the break-neck hill the best way we could, the greater portion of us on foot. We waited awhile for the doctor to return from Beyrout, but as the evening shades were approaching we were compelled to leave without seeing him. I must record, also, that as we were entering the village one of our party, Miss Brayman, fell from her horse. Two of the horses got to fighting, or something of the kind, when biting and kicking were indulged in, and in the mêlée Miss Brayman came to the ground, but fortunately was not hurt.



We had proceeded somewhere about a mile when we came to the tents duly set up, and supper, or "dinner," as it is called, was nearly ready for us. After it was well out of the way, the Rev. Dr. Dale, having returned from Beyrout, and hearing of our call, very politely came over and spent the evening with us, and we found him an intelligent, interesting gentleman. He gave us considerable news about the state of things in Christ's moral vineyard; but fear ing that you are not intensely interested in that direction, I will forego the pleasure of telling you all about it, but suffice it to say Christ and his vineyards are all right; business is looking up here in his line, and upon the whole the sun seems to be gaining gradually upon his virgin mother, though the race is "neck and neck." Dr. Dale, however, imparted considerable intelligence which was even more interesting to me than the moral-vineyard news. I was anxious to know what kind of a government the people have, who own the land, and what the prospects are for a temporal improvement here in this life. We learn that the government is bad; the pashas are tyrannous and corrupt; the people are heavily and unreasonably taxed; the land is held under different tenures, part by the villages, part by wealthy land-owners, and some by the people who till it. The mode of levying taxes is very unjust. The pasha or his officials fix it among themselves what the taxes of a tiller or peasant are to be. It matters not how heavy they are, they have to be paid, or a gang of soldiers are sent to be quartered upon the poor man until the taxes are forthcoming. Of course every exertion is made to raise the money as soon as possible, for the soldiers and horses will soon eat up all he has. Suppose the sum is eight hundred piasters; when he pays it to the soldiers they put their heads together and decide to pay over five hundred and keep three hundred for their own benefit. Well, in about three months another demand is sent from the officials for three hundred more piasters. In vain does the injured man claim that he has paid the full amount to the soldiers; he is told that the three hundred never reached the officials who must have the money, so more soldiers are sent to him. He has only one thing to do, and that is, to raise the money. Of this three hundred the soldiers keep one, and in another three months the third demand is made for the remaining hundred piasters; and thus the very life-blood of the poor toiler is wrung from him by the most relentless injustice and wrong; and in this way the hard-working people of the country are kept ground down to the very face of the earth.

Tax collecting is often farmed out by the pacha; it is too much trouble to him to look after such details. He figures up what he thinks the taxes in a given district should be, and calls some of the men of capital together and sells to them the tax claims at a decided reduction for cash in hand; he often sells the claims at auction, or receives bids, and closes out to the highest bidder. The man who makes the purchase, not caring to make collections, farms them out again to smaller operators. These "put the screws" in the severest manner, compelling the peasant to bring their little stores of grain to the village at his own cost, when it is weighed and the tax taken out, and the balance graciously returned when the collector gets ready to do so. It sometimes requires many days for this to be accomplished, or rather the matter is delayed purposely, to wear out the patience of the poor peasant, who, not seeing the game played with him, and seeing that his expenses will soon eat up all he has, cries out in despair, "Take a quarter, take a third, take half, take two-thirds, if you will, but let me have a part and go home."

This unjust and oppressive mode of taxation, and the very unfavorable land tenure which curses this country, are sufficient to account for much of the poverty and wretchedness which are only too apparent. The land tenure is the crying evil of the times, and exists in many countries besides this. There never can be a full measure of prosperity, things never will be as they should be, so long as the soil is owned by a few, and so long as those who till it have no ownership in it. We well know what the troubles are, have been, and will be in Ireland; it is really no better in England, Scotland and Wales; it is the smaller number of the tillers of the soil that have any legal ownership in it, and the laws are most oppressive upon them. In France but about one-third of the land is owned by the farmer class, and two-thirds are owned by the excessively rich. In one department alone there are 27,000 land-owners who never till themselves. It is still worse in Germany; a large percentage, amounting in some districts to fifty per cent of the peasantry, are on the verge of bankruptcy. In Bavaria alone seven hundred tenant farmers were evicted in the first three months of the present year. In Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland it is better, because the tillers are oftener the owners of the land, and the laws are less oppressive. But in Italy the greatest distress exists, although the soil and the climate are the best the world affords. There the average of human life is eight years less than in France, and sixteen less than in Norway, with all its sterility of soil and severity of climate. In 1878, in Lombardy alone, no less than 14,000 peasants were afflicted with the pellagra, a horrible disease, supposed to arise from the enforced consumption of damaged corn. The corn trade, once so prosperous, has been killed by excessive taxation. In the province of Rome, alone, two thousand little properties have been sold to pay last year's taxes. In Spain, it is said, with much truth, that the condition of the peasant class is worse than that of convicted criminals. In Russia one-third of the land is in the hands of small communal proprietors, about one-sixth in the ownership of large land-holders, while three-sixths are held by the state. In Middle Russia the peasant is unable to live by tillage alone, and is forced to wander about and pick up such work as he can find. Count Walujew reports that the condition of the farming class in Russia is yearly growing worse. Thus, even in Russia, as well as in other countries, the concentration of wealth is going on, the condition of things is producing an increased state of pauperism. The question of the tenure of land is a deep and important one, and must needs engage the attention of good men of all countries. The data used in the foregoing remarks are from an article in the Fortnightly Review.

The feeling between the sects of Christians is strong and bitter, and they work against each other in many ways. Each sect has a chief of its own selection, and these amount to petty rulers and lawmakers for those under them. Evils grow out of the system. Mr. Dale explained the difference between the various sects. I was anxious to know what the Druses are. They are a kind of cross between Christians and Mohammedans, and have a secret religion, and secret rites of admission and observance. In some respects they seem of pagan origin, though but about a thousand years old. They seem in one respect to be good followers of Paul, who, you remember, was a Greek with the Greeks, a Jew with the Jews, etc. So the Druses, when with the Mohammedans, are good Moslems, and when with the Christians are good Christians, but when away from them they are bitter toward both. In 1860 they got into Zahleh, and burnt the town down, and, I think, caused some lives to be taken. They also did much the same in other neighborhoods; but Christians and Moslems turned upon them, and many of them have been compelled to retire from the country to the east of the river Jordan, where they abound in considerable numbers.

MOUNT LEBANON.

POPULATION AND RELIGIONS OF SYRIA.

I notice that Baedecker, in treating the population and religions of Syria, gives the population, consisting of Syrians, Greeks, Arabs, Turks, Jews, and Franks, including the districts of Antioch, Damascus, and all that is embraced in Syria, at two millions of people. The grand divisions of the religions are Mohammedans, Christians, and Jews, which are subdivided into many sects, with sects which belong to neither. The three Semitic races which people Syria—Jews, Syrians, and Arabs—are similar in intellectual character. The Semites possess a rich fund of imagination, but little capacity for abstract thought. This fact affords the reason why they have never produced any philosophical system, properly so called; nor have they ever developed the higher forms of epic or dramatic poetry, or shown any taste for the fine arts. To some extent, this is to be accounted for by the fact that they have had little opportunity for enriching their imaginations by contact with other nations, or by acquaintance with those abstractions from nature which gave rise to the wealth of form and color which characterized ancient mythology. The three great religions—the Jewish, the Christian, and, indirectly, also the Mohammedan—have had their origin in Syria, and the Semites are thus entitled to an important rank in the world's history. The last phase which religious thought assumed among the primitive and unmixed Semites was Mohammedanism—the last practical attempt to introduce theocracy on the part of the people who deemed such a system necessary.

The Moslems form about four-fifths of the whole population of Syria. They still regard themselves as possessors of the special favor of God, and, as rulers of the world, preferred by him to all other nations. In Egypt European influence, having been encouraged at court since the beginning of the present century, has greatly mitigated Moslem arrogance toward strangers; but in Syria the contrasts between the different sects are still very marked. Mohammedanism, being conscious here of having retained its hold on the bulk of the population, displays unmasked its true fanatical spirit, and thus renders itself more interesting to the student of human nature.

The Christians of the East belong to the Greek church, and as, with few exceptions, they speak Arabic, their services are usually conducted in that language. Most of the superior clergy, however, are Greeks by birth, who read mass in Greek, and understand no other language. The members of this church are called orthodox Greek, and those of Syria are divided into two patriarchates, that of Jerusalem and that of Antioch. The patriarch of Jerusalem has jurisdiction over the greater part of Palestine. The patriarchate of Antioch was removed to Damascus in 1531, and has recently been transferred to Beyrout. The Greeks are generally very fanatical, but the Roman Catholics are far more bitterly hated by them than the Protestants.

The Armenians and Copts are principally found at Jerusalem, but there is a sect akin to the latter, called the Syrian Jacobite church. The Jacobites are monophysites—that is, they adhere to the doctrine condemned by the Council of Chalcedon, that Christ possesses one nature only; or, in other words, they admit the existence of his two natures, but maintain that in him they become one. They derive their name from a certain Jacob Baradâi, bishop of Edusa, who, during the persecution of his sect under Justinian I., wandered through the East in poverty, and succeeded in making numerous proselytes. Like the Greeks, they use leavened bread for the communion, and cross themselves with one finger only. The Greeks and Syrians use the Greek calendar, and the monks still sometimes reckon from the Selucidæ. Their ecclesiastical language is ancient Syrian. The patriarch of the Jacobites formerly resided at Antioch, but his headquarters are now at Diârbeker and Merdin. Most of the Jacobites reside there, and some of them still speak Syrian. These Syrians are for the most part, poor, and of very humble mental capacity, and their monks are deplorably ignorant. The Jacobite monks, like the Greek, never eat meat; with almost the whole sect, indeed, religion is a matter of mere external observance.

The Roman Catholic or Latin church in Syria likewise embraces several sects. Generally speaking, the Roman Catholic clergy are far superior to the Greek and the Syrian. For several centuries past Rome has made great efforts to obtain a firm footing in the East, and she has succeeded in founding two affiliated churches, the Greek Catholic and the Syrian Catholic, among the Greeks and Syrians respectively. To this day Lazarists, Franciscans, and Jesuits are actively engaged in extending these churches. These oriental Catholic churches, however, have hitherto asserted their independence of Rome in some particulars. They celebrate mass in Arabic (at least the Greek section), they administer the sacrament in both kinds, and their priests may be married men, though they may not marry after ordination. The Greek Catholic church (Melchites) is a very important body. It is governed by a patriarch at Damascus, and to this sect belong the wealthiest and most aristocratic of the Christians. The Syrian Catholics have a patriarch at Aleppo, who sometimes also resides at Merdin.

Since 1182 the Maronites have also belonged to the Romanists. They were originally monothelites; that is, they held that Christ was animated by one will only. Their name is derived from one Maron, who is said to have lived about the year 400. The complete subjection of the Maronites to the Romish church was effected about the year 1600. They still hold the right to read mass in Syrian, and for the inferior clergy to marry. They are a vigorous, warlike people, though intellectually undeveloped. They are most bitter enemies of their neighbors, the Druses. The entire Maronite population amounts to about 200,000.

Among the Latins must be included the foreign Frank monks, who have long possessed monasteries of their own in the Holy Land. The Franciscans have also been active, and have won credit by their kindness and accommodation to travelers. They are generally Italians and Spaniards, with a few Frenchmen.

The Protestants in Syria excite less prejudice than other Christians; they are chiefly converts from the Beyrout school, and number about 300. The chief reproach directed against them is that they observe no fasts.

There are several different sects of the oriental Jews, some from Spain, some from Russia, Hungary, Bohemia, Moravia, Germany and Holland. These are again subdivided into numerous sects. I am decidly of the opinion that this poor country has quite too much and too many kinds of religion.

Mr. Dale confirmed the report I had before heard, that the Syrians are inveterate liars, and that it is as natural for them to lie as to breathe; the same as it is the very nature of a Bedouin to steal. A Bedouin is the very soul of honor in faithfully fulfilling a contract; for instance, if he agrees to transport a party a certain distance for a certain sum of money, the same can be paid to him at once with safety, and he will keep his contract implicitly; but if he can see a chance to steal something, he is not the person to let the opportunity slip by unimproved. Stealing is his trade, and if he can steal a camel, or a lot of them, he is sure to do it, and then exultingly boast of it afterward, as having done a good stroke of business. I think we have an honest set of Syrians as dragomans; they may lie, but I do not believe they steal. One of our company dropped some money from his pocket in the tent, and when they took the tent down they found the money and returned it to the owner. They are also quiet and obliging.

NOAH'S TOMB.

Saturday, Nov. 12th.—Before starting out this morning we walked something like a quarter of a mile to visit the tomb of Noah—Captain Noah, I should have said. It is not generally known that old Father Noah was buried exactly at this point, but now that I have seen his grave, I don't see how you can entertain any further doubt upon the subject. What passes for his grave is in a building with a dome, which looks as though it might have been erected two or three hundred years ago, or more, for a mosque. What is called the grave looks as though it might be a section of an aqueduct, and is a hundred feet in length. I suggested that Noah lived so long ago, the grave was not, perhaps, as long as it would have otherwise been, and that possibly they doubled him up as a matter of economy in digging the grave and making the coffin. The grave, or what passes for it, is not over four feet wide, and the same in hight; so, making due allowance for the thickness of the wall, it will be seen that the old navigator, considering his hight, must have been very thin—extremely thin. The whole story is remarkably thin. Mark Twain suggests that the old captain must have cast a shadow like a lightning-rod. I could scarcely help thinking, if Noah was as tall as his grave represents him, what a cramped time he must have had for the thirteen months he was in the ark, which was but forty-five feet high. The poor fellow could not have stood up straight during all that time, unless he stuck his head away through the window, and he could not do that, for God had closed the window and shut him in. You may entertain some doubts about this Noah business, but please remember there is the grave, and here the pious Moslems have tied bits of rag to the window-gratings, to insure a safe passport to heaven. We looked inside to see if we could discern the features of the old daddy well enough to recognize him, but unfortunately there is no opening in the aqueduct, and we could not see Noah at all. When it is remembered that the story of Noah and his flood was a borrowed one, learned by the Israelites when they were in bondage in Babylon, and after that for the first time referred to among them; that the whole story is beset with hundreds of utter impossibilities and absurdities, it may easily be decided how much the story of Noah's grave is worth. The building is in good preservation, and has no antique appearance; still it is Noah's grave all the same. On the other side they have a grave sixty feet long, which contains the body of Seth—the "prophet" Seth, though nobody knows what he ever prophesied about. They claim that the grave would have been as long as Noah's had they not doubled up his legs, as one would close a jackknife. So you see I have got near the cemetery of the antediluvians, and if on one of these bright days I stumble upon the grave of our common parent, even the venerable and much-lamented Adam, you must not think strange. If I find it I will try to drop a tear on it in your behalf, and feel sure I can accomplish it with the aid of an onion. I did not try to shed tears over the grave of Noah, partly because I had not quite enough tears; partly—well, because, being a sea-faring man, he was a "tough old salt," and I don't feel very tender toward him; besides, I don't like him very well for keeping alive tigers, wolves, hyenas, panthers, the poisonous snakes, the scorpions, the tarantulas, and all the venomous bugs, insects, and fleas which are only a torment to the world; besides, he got very drunk, and cursed one of his own dear boys, and made all his posterity black slaves, and that simply because the boy made a little sport at the old man going on a spree. With Adam it was different; the only bad thing he ever did was to taste just one apple too many; and, being fond of apples myself, I cannot find it in my heart to blame him! I shall not fail to weep over his untimely end, if I can only find his grave. Poor old Adam! Had it not been for that one bite of apple he might have lived to a good old age, and been an honorable and useful member of society! How wrong to place such tempting, dangerous, and deadly fruit before an unsophisticated young man just made! Let us weep!

ON TO BAALBEC.

About twenty miles still lay before us to the northeast, before reaching the ancient old City of the Sun, where are the ruins of old temples—so old that no man knows when they were erected. The road is pretty long and tedious; for several miles it skirts along at the edge of the plain, and at the foot of Mount Lebanon. I fear I have a little to take back about the fertility and superiority of the soil of the plain, and the country generally. Since seeing more of it I am inclined to think it is not extraordinarily productive, and some of it is about as stony as any land I ever saw that was cultivated. The boulders, or "cobble-stones," from the size of a man's fist to half the size of his head, lie so thick together in some places as to render the soil almost invisible. They undoubtedly contribute to the warmth of the soil, but must interfere greatly with cultivation. In places the plain presents the appearance of being poor.

This was one of the most burning days we have had, and as we had decided to make the whole distance before stopping for lunch, we had some five and a half hours' continuous riding. My face became sunburnt, and for some reason I felt fatigued and overdone long before reaching Baalbec. The tall poplar-trees surrounding the town hove clearly in sight when we were still several miles away. When we were, as I supposed, within three or four miles of the town, I, feeling that I was hurting the saddle, or the saddle hurting me, concluded to dismount and walk in. But the distance was greater than I calculated, and I found the walk in the sun with tight shoes particularly wearisome. I was by no means sorry to reach the edge of the town, where the lunch table, or carpet, was spread. I could not regret that traveling for the week was over.

Baalbec must have been a wonderful city in its prime, though it is now but an obscure place of about five thousand, consisting of narrow, irregular streets, and the houses mostly of the one-story, flat-roofed, stone variety I have described; a portion, however, are of two stories, but built in the same way, and some of them are plastered over, giving the exterior a smoothish appearance, though crude. It was not the modern town which induced us to make this wearisome journey, but the ruins of the past greatness; and I must say that these ruins, in point of extent, magnificence, and immense size of the stones employed, leave all the other ruins we have seen, and all in the world, for that matter, far in the shade.

But little seems to be known when these old temples were erected, or by whom, as there is very little history bearing upon the subject. But there is hardly any doubt that four thousand years ago it was a sacred place, and that sun-worshipers occupied the country. The name Baalbec means the city of the sun, even as Baal was held to be a representative of the sun. The ancient Phœnicians were worshipers of Baal. They were a remarkably enterprising, ingenious, and energetic people that once occupied this country, and it is altogether probable that it was they who built Baalbec and erected the magnificent temples which adorned it. It has been claimed that they were built by the Greeks or by the Romans; and Dr. Dale advanced the claim that they were erected by Solomon. This last theory strikes me as being extremely improbable. Had Solomon erected such magnificant edifices anywhere, the Hebrew writers would never have been done boasting about it, and full accounts of the prodigies would have been found in their sacred writings; whereas there is not a word on the subject. Neither Solomon nor the Jewish nation had the architectural skill to build such temples. Even to build his own diminutive and insignificant temple, which, if it was all that is claimed for it, was little more than a shanty compared with the magnificent structures at Baalbec, Solomon was under the necessity of sending out of the country both for the material and the mechanics to put it together, the Jews never possessed much architectural skill; and in my opinion these temples built at Baalbec required more ability than Solomon's temple and every other house and shanty that ever stood in Palestine. It is absurd to talk about Solomon having built the temples at Baalbec. It is not impossible that the Greeks may have had something to do with building the temples, as the architecture is somewhat in their style, while the absence of cement and brick argues against the Romans having done it. The stones employed in the structures are much heavier than either the Greeks or Romans used. It is more reasonable that the construction of such massive and expensive edifices, requiring many years to complete, must have been done by people occupying and owning the country, than by people living more than a thousand miles away, who would in preference have adorned their own countries. The Phœnicians had the wealth and ability to perform the work; they owned the country, and it is highly probable it was they who did it. The first temples built were probably not the ones whose ruins are now on the ground; the first were smaller, and seemed to give place to more magnificent structures.

The site of the temples is the acropolis of the ancient city, on which the two principal temples were built, the one a temple of the sun, the other dedicated to all the gods, but afterward ascribed to Jupiter. The massive walls, nearly a hundred feet high, inclose and include several acres; and the hewn stones of which they are composed are the largest ever placed in a wall, varying from the size of a carpenter's tool-chest to an omnibus and a street-car. In the wall of the larger temple are three enormous stones, two sixty-four feet long and thirteen feet square, and the third sixty-nine feet long; and these massive stones were brought from the quarry nearly half a mile away and raised upon the wall twenty feet from the ground; and as they are estimated to weigh twelve hundred tons each, I will not attempt to explain by what means they were transported and lifted; but the achievement is one of the greatest marvels of the world. In the quarry, gotten out, squared, and trimmed, is a mate to the three stones; it is fourteen feet square and nearly seventy feet in length. It was moved a considerable distance, and why it was not placed upon the wall is not known. The men have disappeared, but the stone still remains, a marvel to all who behold it. The entrance to the temple is under an archway built of the massive hewn stones described, having to a length of six hundred feet or more, besides several lateral branches. Upon arriving in the interior court the beholder is struck with wonder at what is presented before him. Six of the stately columns of the large temple are still standing in good order, with the bases, capitals, and architrave in pretty good condition. They are of the Corinthian order, and probably the largest columns in the world, being eight feet in diameter at the base, and with the architrave ninety feet in hight. Still they look graceful as they stand, though massive and huge when lying prostrate on the ground, the diameter reaching considerably above a man's head. Many of the prostrate columns are lying around, and much of the débris of the two temples. The larger temple was three hundred feet long and one hundred and sixty feet wide, with a colonnade of fifty-four columns around it like the six left standing. The carving of the capitals and the entablature is elaborate and artistic, and one is constantly filled with wonder how and by whom such mighty work was accomplished. Including the base and capital, which are almost as large as a small house, the columns are composed of five pieces each, and the joints are so straight and true, and polished so smooth, that they fit together like two accurately planed blocks. The joints are perfect, and this is the case with the joints of the vast ruins all around; the closeness with which they fit without cement of any kind is a marvel. Well may they be called "hair-joints."

The other temple is smaller, but is far better preserved. One row of nine columns is left at one end, with others on the sides and at the other end, and these still sustain much of the porch or roof reaching from the columns to the cella walls. These blocks are massive and elaborately carved on the under sides, so as to somewhat resemble fresco-work when looking up from the ground. The blocks of the same that have fallen look huge indeed, and one stands and studies the intricate carving and bas-relief sculpture upon them with wondering interest. "What a marvel of architectural beauty and grandeur this edifice must have been when it was new! And what a noble picture it and its statelier companion, with the chaos of mighty fragments scattered about, yet make!"

COL. A. H. H. DAWSON will deliver a lecture on cremation in Chickering Hall on Monday evening, Jan. 23d, under the auspices of the New York Cremation Society. The colonel is something of an orator, and he will doubtless present this serious and practical question in a way that will make it interesting as well as instructiv.

THE EMOTIONS UNDER SCIENCE.

If what has been said about the position of the intellect and reason under the subjective view seems new and strange, what shall be said of the emotions?

It must be certainly that they are peculiarly within the subjective domain, for our feelings relate to what we need, and wish, and do, rather than to that which we think. Therefore in all ages the emotions summed up in the word "heart" have been considered the source and also the substance of religion. But this is a superficial view. The source has always really been deeper. It has been such science and practical life as the progress of the age afforded. Under religion there was always lying some theory of the world, and some practical life as its foundation, even in the lowest Fetichism.

Some proof by the senses has always been the ground of the prevailing science or philosophy. Therefore the four divisions or stories of our "Positive Classification" show an enduring truth, because the Senses have been the foundation upon which the intellect, then their activity, and then the emotional life of Man have ever rested.

It will thus be seen that though the emotions have not, as is often erroneously supposed, a logical value, yet they are the subjective flower and the glory of all life; but they can bloom beneficently only as they are sustained by the sensation, intellect, and activities of man. Evidently, then, man must have and cultivate feelings under the new philosophy, different from the old. This is plain enough. The new scientific foundation must give us a new "heart." The difficulty in making this emotional transition is really the greatest obstacle in passing into the new world. The heart is used to the old story and cannot suddenly respond to the new.

Man has become so in the habit of believing what he wishes to be true, rather than what the senses and reason prove to be true, that he lingers long on the border-land of science with the heart. Prof. Tyndall, in his Belfast address, beautifully states and appreciates this problem and its difficulty in these words:

"There are some things woven into the texture of man, as the feeling of awe, reverence, wonder—and not alone the sexual love just referred to, but the love of the beautiful, physical, moral in nature, poetry, and art. There is also that deep-set feeling which, since the earliest dawn of history, and probably for ages prior to all history, incorporated itself in the religions of the world. You who have escaped from these religions into the high and dry light of the intellect may deride them, but in so doing you deride accidents of form merely, and fail to touch the immediate oasis of the religious sentiment in the nature of man. To yield this sentiment reasonable satisfaction is the problem of problems at the present hour. And grotesque in relation to scientific culture as many of the religions of the world have been and are—dangerous, nay, destructive to the dearest privileges of freemen as some of them undoubtedly have been, and would, if they could, be again—it will be wise to recognize them as the forms of a force mischievous if permitted to intrude on the region of knowledge, over which it holds no command, but capable of being guided to noble issues in the region of emotion, which is its proper and elevated sphere."

The recognition of the constructive and religious nature of Science by the heart as well as the head of Man is now his greatest difficulty. It is only by mastering the subjective view that this difficulty can be overcome. That is the reason for calling attention to the position of the emotional nature of Man in this connection, for the heart of multitudes fails to recognize the true position of Science in its religious value.

How can the discordant demands of the head and heart be reconciled? Until they are, the practical life of man is but a chop-sea of contending science and rebellious feelings. Prof. Tyndall is by profession only a physical scientist, and as such he wisely restates this "problem of problems," and leaves it to those engaged in the study of the higher Sciences directly affecting Man, his society, progress, nature, and religion, to indicate the temporary alleviation, and the final remedy.

This all-important problem such men have not been slow to attempt. At first their answers seemed but a confusion of tongues, and many supposed and still suppose that Science will here fail. But finally sufficient clearness has been attained to enable us to perceive the following at the fundamental harmony of the Scientific responses.

1. It is idle and foolish for sensible men and women to suppose that they can go on wishing, longing for, and expecting with the heart, the fond hopes and kind of a future which the old Theologic explanation of the world justified as reasonable, but which the Scientific solution shows to be illusory. The child who had learned from its nurse that the moon was certainly a huge cheese might perhaps as a boy long and cry for it, but when he grew up and learned the truth from Science, how ridiculous to not only keep up his longing and crying, but to actually argue that his longing for it to be a cheese was proof that it must be one in spite of Science, for else he would not have the longing! Yet it is easy to find volumes of this kind of sentimental logic. If we can't have what we want, the cure is to make the most of what we have.

2. Nor is this so difficult as it appears at first. As soon as the heart is fed by the truth it learns to love it, and to feel contented and happy under it, while the old feelings seem more and more narrow, dim, and unsatisfactory.

The savage, and even those who prior to 1600 lived under the "Universe" of the Ptolemaic Astronomy, had the comfort of Heaven just above the mountains from whence the guardian saints and angels were watching them, and passing to and fro. How terrible to the heart to have all this Heaven destroyed by a glance through Galileo's telescope! Yet who is there now who feels the glorious freedom of his mind and soul as it wanders through the infinity of space and worlds, who would have the old firmament replaced and the telescope abolished?

So it is with every other illusion—the larger the truth, the better and the more comforting will it be in the end, even to the most religious of our emotions. The heart will soon grow to fit the facts. Let Prof. Tyndall have no fear that this "problem of problems" can be solved satisfactorily in any way but by the continuance and extension of Science itself into the very heart and domain of these religious emotions. Science heals the wounds she brings, if she is trusted and given the opportunity to show her medicinal powers.

3. To accomplish this change of feeling comfortably, it is only necessary to live under the subjective order, that is, with Science and for Man. In this wise the old sentiments derived from Theology are soon and beneficently destroyed, because replaced by the glories of the actual world, and the glory and dignity of Man and his life, under the Infinite World, and the infinite hopes and possibilities of his future. The child longs for the Theologic playhouse and the happy feelings he cherished there, but the man rejoices in his strength and powers, and glories in his manhood by putting away childish things.

4. But then shall we have naught left but an orphaned world? Naught but a beating heart and a desert? Ah, no! Such it will not be but to those who are blind to the transformation going on every day around them. Others will find far more than they lost, and more than they sought. We are told that it became a saying in Israel that "Saul the son of Kish went forth to seek his father's asses and found a kingdom." Words of this kind read by us in youth in the Hebrew Story, and re-read at the end of Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister," point to the law that the seeking to do faithfully the humblest service is the path to the highest fortune; the true location of heaven is at the end of duty done.

And story of Saul illustrates well the role that Science has played in the history of the world. Its origin was in humblest efforts to make human life, especially domestic and social life, more tolerable. It began as the drudge and servant of human needs. It was deemed good and useful only as it served and supplied the material necessities of the Master; as it was drawer of water, hewer of wood, or as it sought his asses. And there are some now who pretend to be Scientists, (and shame upon them!) who have not risen above this bread-and-butter slavery of Science. But it was the dream of the glorious Lucretius that her ultimate mission was to throttle superstition and wholly replace her as the Queen of Man.

Like Cinderella, she has gathered strength and beauty quietly, silently, among the uses of material needs and duties, to be revealed in the fullness of time as the Queen. Gradually in the course of dutiful progress she has ascended the golden ladder of the Special Sciences, bringing light and order into the domain of each, until she has touched now the brian and the heart of Man himself. She has begun to reduce that to order, and so has founded THE KINGDOM OF MAN.

She turns at last subjectively to rest her eye upon her work, her splendid duty done. Behold, she has gained unspeakably more than all she or her Master dreamed. She started to seek but the kingdom of Earth and matter—then the realm of life and living things became hers—now even the kingdom of the Society of Man acknowledges her laws and control. But when she turns and would see this Kingdom of Man realized under her sway, behold, like a transformation scene, it becomes the Kingdom of Heaven itself! Heaven is pointed out by her as not above, but beyond us.

The dream of heaven that our race has cherished in all times past is seen not to be the reality, but only the mirage of the reality, which this Kingdom of Man on earth is to render passible more and more under the sway of Science and Man—the Religion of Humanity.

Can it indicate the solution of the great religious and practical questions of life? Let us take up the more important of them and see.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 68.

755. As a summing-up of the question of the Bible, these points may be repeated: 1. It is a human production, there being not the slightest proof that any part of it was written by any other agency. 2. The writers of the greater portions of it are utterly unknown. 3. Very few of the writers even set up the feeble claim of being inspired by a power superior to themselves. 4. The writings in themselves present no proofs of inspiration. 5. Very few of the entire books were written by the persons whose names they bear. 6. The writers were mostly an ignorant class of men, not understanding the simplest teachings of science. 7. They knew nothing of astronomy, geology, geography, chemistry, and numerous others of the recognized sciences. 8. It abounds in errors, improbabilities, absurdities, contradictions, indecencies, impossibilities, and falsehoods. 9. It imparts very little really valuable information of a useful and practical character. 10. It is largely made up of crude accounts of wars, battles, bloodshed, marrying and begetting children, concubinage, rapes, adulteries, incests, sacrifices, useless ceremonies, and crude superstitions. 11. Even if it possessed any value to the world at the time it was written, it has very little now. 12. Every original copy of the different parts of it was lost long, long ago—that of the Old Testament twenty-five hundred years, and that of the New Testament eighteen hundred years ago. 13. All that we have are transcripts of transcripts, and copies of copies, containing thousands of changes, additions, interpolations, and forgeries. 14. The men comprising the councils that have undertaken to establish the canon were designing, tricky, and weak. 15. There was no harmony in those councils; quarrels, contentions, and fighting was the general rule. 16. Thousands upon thousands of errors of copyists, compilers, and revisers are known to exist. 17. The book is ill calculated to give an exalted idea of the supreme being. 18. On the other hand, it represents him as a fickle, irascible, passionate, changeable, whimsical, anthropomorphic, unlovable, revengeful, cruel, malicious being. 19. It is regarded by Christians, particularly the Protestant portions of them, as the savage tribes of Africa regard their fetiches—as possessing some hidden, marvelous, mysterious, supernatural power—but which they do not possess. 20. It is a relic of the benighted past, and does not belong to the present advanced age of the world. It is stationary and unprogressive. Its God knew just as much five thousand years ago as now, and hence he can learn nothing new, and neither can his worshipers. The best interests of the age and the race demand information superior to what is to be obtained in the Bible. It is my belief that none of us can do better than to embrace the light and truth which science gives us, to study the universe and its laws, and let the legendary fables of the Bible take their place with the outgrown relics of the old systems of religion.

756. In connection with the New Testament and the principal character treated in it, it may not be amiss to give the views of some distinguished Christian fathers and writers upon the subject of its antiquity and originality. Justin Martyr wrote this apology, addressed to Antoninus Pius, about the middle of the second century: "If, then, we hold some opinions near akin to those of the poets and philosophers in most repute among you, why are we thus unjustly hated? For in saying that all things were made in this beautiful manner by God, what do we seem to say more than Plato? When we teach a general conflagration, what do we teach more than the Stoics? By opposing the work of men's hands, we concur with Meander the comedian; and by declaring the Logos—the first begotten by God, our master Jesus Christ—to be born of a virgin, without any human mixture, to be crucified and dead, and to have risen again and ascended into heaven, we say no more in this than what you say of those whom you style the sons of Jove. For you need not be told what number of sons the writers most in vogue among you assign to Jove. There is Mercury, Jove's interpreter, in imitation of the Logos, in worship among you. There is Æsculapius, the physician, smitten by a thunderbolt, and after that ascending into heaven. There is Bacchus, torn to pieces; and Hercules, burned to get rid of his pains. There are Castor and Pollux, the sons of Jove by Leda; and Perseus, by Danæ. Not to mention the others, I would fain know why you always deify departed emperors, and have a fellow on hand to make affidavit that he saw Cæsar ascend to heaven from the funeral pile. And as to the son of God, called Jesus, should we allow him to be no more than man? Yet the title of the Son of God is very justifiable on account of his wisdom, considering you have your Mercury in worship, under the title of the Word and Messenger of God. As to the objection to our Jesus being crucified, I say, suffering was common to all the aforementioned Sons of Jove, but only they suffered another kind of death. As to his being born of a virgin, you have your Perseus to balance that; as to his curing the lame, the paralytic, and such as were cripples from their birth, this is little more than you say of your Æsculapius." It will be seen by Justin's own showing that Christianity contains no belief that pagans had not previously held to. I do not believe there is anything new in it.

757. Justin Martyr again says: "It having come to the devil's ears that the prophets had foretold that Christ would come for the purpose of tormenting the wicked in fire, set the heathen poets to bring forward a great many who should be called the sons of Jove. The devil laying his scheme in this to get men to imagine that the true history of Christ was of the same character as those prodigious fables." It is hardly likely the devil was so much of a prophet as to see more than a thousand years ahead, or that he was able to influence the Hindoos, Persians, Egyptians, Grecians, and Romans to get up systems of mythology as prototypes of the Christian system which was to come to be believed later. It is far more likely that the Christian idea was taken from the older religions which he found in existence long before it was known. It is preposterous, that even with the devil's help, the old could pattern af er the new, any more than a father could take pattern by his son before he was born. Justin should have explained how the devil was able to know so long beforehand what the Christian system was to be.

758. Tertullian, a Latin Christian father, was born at Carthage in 150. In an apology for the Christian religion, he admits the existence of the doctrines of the gospel in Gentile literature, and in explanation said, "The heathens, from a design, or curiosity, put our doctrines into their works." How wrong of the Gentiles to borrow thus from the Christians, when they (the Gentiles) lived many hundreds of years the earlier! I doubt Tertullian's correctness.

759. Melito, bishop of Sardis, in Lybia, in an apology addressed to Marcus Antoninus in the year 161, a fragment of which was preserved by Eusebius, spoke in this way: "Pious men are now persecuted and harrassed throughout Asia, which was never done before; and impudent sycophants, and such as covet the possessions of others, take occasion from the edicts, rob without fear or shame, and cease not to plunder those who have offended in nothing. . . . For the philosophy which we profess truly flourished aforetime, but having blossomed again in the great reign of Cæsar Augustus, thy ancestor, it proved to be above all things ominous of good for thy kingdom. . . . Retain, therefore, the religion which grew as your empire grew, which began with Augustus, which was recovered by your ancestors before all religion. Only Nero and Domitian, through the envy of certain malicious persons, were disposed to bring our doctrines into hatred." Origen, in reply to Celsus, said, "I answer, that since I have granted that some notions of good and evil are originally implanted in minds of men, we need not wonder that Heraclitus and others, whether Greeks or barbarians, have acknowledged to the world that they held the very same notions that we mention." Again, he says of the heathen, "God revealed those things to them, and whatsoever they have well spoken." It seems God revealed it just about as well to the heathen as to the elect. Ammonius Saccus, a prominent father, said: "All the Gentile religions, and even the Christian religion, are to be illustrated and explained by the principles of universal philosophy; but in order to do this the fables of the priests are to be removed from paganism, and the interpretations from Christianity." St. Clement, of Alexandria, an eminent father, explained Christian belief in this way: "One article of faith is that Christ is the first begotten of God, and we have proved him to be the very Logos of universal reason, by which mankind were all partakers; therefore those who live by reason are in some sort Christians, notwithstanding they have passed with you as Atheists, such as among the Greeks were Socrates, Heraclitus, and the like. Such among the barbarians were Abraham, Ananas, Mizcal, and Elias." He further says: "All virtuous thoughts are imparted by divine inspiration, and that cannot be evil, or of evil origin, which tends to promote good; therefore the Greek philosophy is good. But God is the author of all good, and therefore the Greek philosophy is from God. It follows that the law was given to the Jews, and philosophy to the Greeks, until the advent of our Lord." He further on says, "This philosophy the pagans received from the fertilizing influence of the divine Logos, which descended at the same time upon the Jews, giving them the law and the prophets; and upon the Gentiles, giving them philosophy, like rain which falls on the house-top as well as on the fields." It was generous in St. Clement to let the pagans have a full share in the blessings in the divine Logos, and he seems to think they received about as good a share as the Jews or the Christians. I cannot see but they were equally as fortunate and equally correct. Again, this father has the fairness to ask: "Doth not Plato mention both the rivers of fire and that profound depth of the earth which the Jews call Gehenna? Does he not prophetically mention Tartarus, Cocytus, Acheron, Phlegithon, rivers of fire, and certain other like places of punishment, which led to correction and discipline?" Another concession that even in the invention of a future place of punishment the pagans were many hundred years in advance of the Christians.

760. Eusebius, born in Palestine in 270, and one of the first Christian writers of his time, the first historian of the church, did not believe, any more than I do, that Christianity contains anything new or original; but he tried to explain the mystery of the pagans earlier holding to the same view on the silly ground that the devil stole the Christian doctrines from heaven and gave them to the poets and philosophers of pagandom. In his "Ecclesiastical History," book i, chap. 4, entitled "The Religion Announced by Christ Nothing New nor Strange," he asserts that every pious person, from Abraham to the first of the human race, was a Christian, and concludes that "the doctrine of Christ is not a new or strange doctrine." Again, after giving a translation of Philo's account of the Therapeuts of Egypt, before the birth of Christ, and which people had churches, scriptures, gospels, and epistles, he expresses the opinion that possibly the New Testament gospels came from Egypt. Again, after quoting Marcus Aurelius, the pagan emperor and writer, to the effect that Mercury was the Word, by whom all things were made; who was with God and was God; who descended into a body, and, by putting on flesh, took the appearance of man, etc., he here recognized the harmony between Grecian paganism and Christianity.

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

One remark is very important; it is that at the close of the second century there were many very rich Christians. It is not at all strange that in two hundred years the Christian missionaries, impulsiv and indefatigable, had attracted the best people to their party. Excluded from high office because they would not participate in the ceremonies instituted for the general welfare of the empire, they carried on trade, just as the Presbyterians and other nonconformists do in France and in England, and they enriched themselvs. Their love-feasts were grand reunions; they were reproached for their luxury and fine living. Tertullian thus speaks of this (chap. xxxix): "Yes," he says, "did they not indulge in good living in the Egyptian and the Athenian mysteries? The little expense we make is both useful and pious, since it benefits the poor." Quantiscumque sumptibus consted lucrum est pietatis, siquidem inopes refrigerio isto juvamus.

The unruly Tertullian complained that the philosophers were not persecuted sufficiently, and that they repressed the Christians (chap. xlvi): "Is there anyone who compels the Christians to sacrifice and swear by your gods?" Quis emin philosophum sacrificare aut dejurare? This difference clearly proves that the philosophers were not dangerous, and that the Christians were. The philosophers ridiculed popular superstitions, but they did not create a party or a faction in the empire; but the Christians, on the other hand, commenced to form a faction so dangerous that in the end it contributed to the destruction of the Roman empire. We judge from this alone that they would hav been more cruel persecutors had they been masters; their sect was unsociable and intolerant, and only desired for the moment more liberty in order to snatch freedom from the rest of mankind.

Rutilius, a prefect of Rome,* spoke as follows of that half Jewish and half Christian faction:

"Atque utinam nunquam Judaea subacta fuisset
Pompeii bellis imperioque Titi!
Latius excisae pestis contagia serpunt;
Victoresque suos natio victa premit."——

["Would that Judea had never been conquered in the wars of Pompey and by the empire of Titus! For far and wide spreads the contagion of the destroyed nation, and the conquered people press upon the conquered themselvs."]

We see from these lines that the Christians made a parade of the most fearful and intolerant dogmas: they published it everywhere that they would destroy the ancient religion of the empire, and we see that it was either a question of extermination or exterminating others with the Christians. But the leniency of the Roman senate was such that there were very few capital condemnations, as Origen admitted in his answer to Celsus in book iii.

We cannot here make an analysis of the writings of Tertullian. We hav not examined his work, entitled "The Scorpion," in which he pretends to say that the Gnostics sting as scorpions; nor hav we read his book upon mantles, which Malebranche has ridiculed sufficiently. But we cannot pass by in silence his work upon the soul; not only does he attempt to prove that it is material, as all the fathers of the first three centuries thought; not only does he agree with the great poet Lucretius, but he assures us that the soul is marked with figures and is colored. Such were the champions of the church, the fathers. As for the rest, we must not forget that he was a priest and husband. This is not still a part of the sacrament, for the bishops of Rome did not defend the institution of marriage among the priests when they became powerful and desirous of controlling in a part of Europe a body of soldiers who were without family and country, and were more than submissiv to their orders.

"Taugere enim ac taugi, nisi corpus, nulla potest res,"

* Lord Bolingbroke deceived himself. Rutilius lived more than a century after Justin; but this proves how all honest Romans were aware of the progress of superstition. It made immense progress during the third century; it became a kingdom within a kingdom, so that it was very politic in Costantius-Chlorus and his son to put themselvs at the head of a faction which became so rich and powerful. It was not the same in the timeof Tertullian. His "Apology," written by a man so obscure, it was only known in the time of the emperors as the trash of the Presbyterians is known to Queen Anne. No Roman has spoken of Tertullian. All that the Christians to-day relate with so much ostentation was at that time unknown. This faction has prevailed; well and good—some one must prevail over the others in a country. But let it at least not be tyrannical; or if it must ever seize upon our goods or bathe itself in our blood, let us at least put a check upon its avarice and its cruelty.

CHAPTER XXIII.

CONCERNING CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

Clement, a priest of Alexandria, always called the Christians Gnostics. Was that one of those sects which divide the Christians, and will continue to divide them? Or was it well that the Christians adopted the title of Gnostics? However that may be, the only thing that is instructiv and pleasing in the works of the Gnostics is the verses from Homer, Orpheus, Museus, Hesiod, Sophocles, Euripides, and Menandrus, which are cited very badly indeed, but nevertheless are relished with great pleasure. Clemence is the only one of the fathers of the first three centuries who has written with the following good taste: he displays a profound knowledge of the ancient Greek works of the Asiatic and Egyptian rites in his "Exhortations to the Nations," and in his "Stromates;" he does not reason very much, but this is so much the better for the reader.

His greatest fault is in considering the fables invented by the poets and romancers as the foundation of the religion of the Gentiles—a fault that is common to the fathers and all the polemical writers. The foolishness they impute to their adversaries; what they believe is all right—or rather, they make an allowance for ridicule. They say: "If you think it bad that our Jesus is the son of God, remember you hav your Bacchus, your Hercules, your Perseus, who are the sons of God; if our Jesus was carried by the devil to the top of the mountain, your giants hav cast mountains at the head of Jupiter.

"If you do not wish to believe that our Jesus changed water into wine at a village festival, we, on the other hand, do not believe that the daughters of Anius changed all that they touched into wheat, wine, or oil." The parallel is the same, and exact on both sides.

The most singular miracles in all pagan antiquity is reported by Clement, of Alexandria, in his "Exhortation;" it is about Bacchus in Hell. Bacchus did not know the way there; a man named Prosymnus, as Pausanius and Hyginus were otherwise called, offered to show him the way upon the condition that he would upon his return repay with favors, and that he would supplicate Jupiter to make him a Ganymede, and turn Apollo into a hyacinth. Bacchus accepted the conditions; he went to hell, but upon his return he found Prosymnus dead. He did not wish to fail in his promis. He found a fig-tree growing near the tomb of Prosymnus, and he cut a branch, and planted it in the name of his benefactor in its destined place, according to promis, so that he would not be reproached.

Such extravagant tales are common to almost all the ancient religions. They prove very clearly that all those who avoid the true religion and the true philosophy (which is the adoration of God without superstition)—all those, in a word, who deliver themselvs up to rites and creeds, cannot deal otherwise than in such nonsensical stories.

In good faith, are not the Milesian fables the foundation of the Roman religion? Would the senate hav erected a temple to Bacchus for defiling himself? To Mercury, a robber? Ganymede had his temples. Hadrian, in truth, erected a temple to his friend Antinous, like that Alexander erected to Hephæstion; but did they honor the wretches? Is there a medal, or monument, which was inscribed to Antinous, the Sodomite? The fathers of the church made merry at the expense of those they called the Gentiles; but the Gentiles had their revenge! The fact that a pretender called Joseph was the bosom companion of an angel; that a God was a carpenter, and that his ancestors were adulterers, and immoral prostitutes; that a man named Paul ascended to the third heaven; that a man and his wife were beaten to death for not having given all their goods to Simon Barjona—all these furnish the Gentiles with terrible arguments! Is the story of the angels of Sodom any more probable than that of Bacchus and Prosymnus, or the fable of Apollo and Hyacinth?

Common sense is the same the world over, and should be the same guide for Clement as well as his brother priests (vide Stromates, vi). God, according to Clement, made the world in six days, and rested upon the seventh, because there are seven wandering stars; because the little bear, a constellation, is composed of seven stars, likewise the Pleiades; because there are seven chief angels; because the moon changes its face in seven days; and because the seventh day brings the crisis of all sickness. There are people of this faith who prefer this stuff to the philosophy of Plato and Cicero, and they think it necessary for us still to revere all those obscene pedants whom the indulgent Romans permitted to teach their fanatical reveries in Alexandria, where, indeed, the doctrins of Christianity were chiefly formulated.*

* Voltaire forgot to say that Clement believed in the indestructibility of matter, and in the existence of many worlds previous to ours, and in the transmigration of souls, etc.

Judicial Bigotry.

Three interesting cases of judicial bigotry hav recently taken place in Canada.

The first was the refusal of the presiding judge to let Mr. Belford, an Agnostic, giv his evidence. The decision was rendered in obedience to Canadian law, which law was condemned by the judge, although he felt bound by it.

The second was that of Albert White, who, likewise, is an Agnostic. His evidence was barred out, the bigot on the bench taking the occasion to differ from his legal brother, saying he regarded the law as very fortunate and good.

The third is that of a young woman who refused to take the oath because Jesus said, "Swear not at all." She was convicted of contempt of court and committed to prison for forty-eight hours.

It seems to us that things are getting much mixed over the line. Heretical books are seized by zealous secular officials, men are thrust out of court for being Infidels, and women are imprisoned for being zealous Christians. What can a person be to be safe from Christian bigotry? So far, it appears to be safer to be an Agnostic, for they are only put out of court, while the too literal Christian is imprisoned. Messrs. Belford and White should congratulate each other. Especially should Mr. White congratulate himself, for the judge, had he the power, would undoubtedly hav imprisoned him, if not worse.

All of these cases are a disgrace to Canada. It is infamous in a country to make a law debarring any person from giving evidence on account of his or her religious opinions. It is infamous in a judge to so rule against an important witness. It is infamous in a judge, after having taken the Bible as a standard, to imprison any one for living up to that standard.

Canada can now take rank among the first Christian countries. She can go back alongside of Spain and Italy. She is earning a great reward from the hands of the church. Her government officials, her clergy, her judiciary, hav all put their shoulder to the wheel to roll their land back to the dark ages, when differences about theological tenets and heresy were punished with imprisonment and death.

It is not Catholic officials who seize Paine's and Voltaire's and Volney's works; it is not Catholic judges who shut out Agnostics; it is not by a Catholic that a woman is immured for forty-eight hours in a cell for interpreting the Bible just as it reads, but it is by Protestants that all these things are done. And it is a Protestant government that sanctions by its silence these crimes against society. For they are crimes, although committed by those who are supposed to protect the people. An Agnostic may be sole witness to a murder, and yet he could not testify to bring the murderer to justice. Suppose that the Canadian law obtained exclusivly in this country, and that Col. Ingersoll had been the only witness to the assassination of Garfield, Guiteau could hav walked free till shot by some good Christian, as he undoubtedly would hav been in less than twenty-four hours.

It was a crime none but a dastard bigot would commit, to imprison a woman, perhaps weak in intellect, for clinging tenaciously to teachings that hav been instilled in the race for centuries. The Bible has been pounded into the race with pike and musket-butt. Is a poor, weak woman to be imprisoned for believing what her father believed, and what she learned at her mother's knee? Such work is a disgrace to humanity.

But it all goes to show that Christianity is a cruel and useless religion. In Canada it is wedded to the state and is called a part of the common law. When so interpreted the world has seen what injustice has been perpetrated under it. Mr. Belford is an honest, honored, and intelligent business man. Yet in an important case he is denied the right that would be accorded the most ignorant Catholic in Canada. Mr. White is a prominent and highly respected resident of Yarmouth, and yet because he does not believe in the Jewish Jehovah he is cast aside with less respect than would be a Hottentot who swore by his fetich. The evidence of a Chinaman who swears on the entrails of a fowl can be received; so can that of a circumcised Hebrew, or a prophet-adoring Mohammedan, but the testimony of an intelligent, honest man is rejected because he has no fetich to swear by. Canada is called a Christian and a civilized country. So is the United States. And yet we hav known of the same things here. But a year or two ago a man was incarcerated in Ludlow-Street Jail, in this city, for the same reason as the woman in Canada. When Joseph Treat, an Infidel, was called to the stand to testify against the woman Woodhull, she instigated her lawyer to question him in regard to his religious opinions, and, finding he did not believe in the Jewish Jehovah, his testimony was rejected. His case is not an isolated one, but has been paralleled many times. Discriminations for opinion's sake are constantly being made all over the country. Liberals are denied privileges which Christians can hav for the asking. The leaders of the Young Men's Christian Association can advertise so-called immoral articles with impunity, while Infidels are dragged to prison for selling books which are purity itself compared with the Bible. Christian people can load the mails with thousands of pounds of worthless stuff, while a Liberal is denied the privilege of mailing a few hundred copies of his anti-orthodox journal.

Just as fast as the church can she is obtaining control of this government. She began by getting Christians into office; then her chaplains into our legislatures, our army, our navy, thereby drawing thousands of dollars from the public treasury to feed the pious drones, humbugs, and hypocrits who fatten at the people's expense. Then she got her own property exempted from paying its share of the public burden; then she instigates laws against unbelievers, and puts her own judges upon the bench to enforce them. Let this go on for another fifty years, and the United States be bound in a theocracy as galling and as absolute as ever flourished in Geneva under John Calvin. The only salvation of this country from such exhibitions as hav disgraced Canada is in Liberalism. It rests with the men who know and respect the intentions of the founders of this Republican government—a government sadly and ingloriously perverted. With the Liberals of this country rests its future honor or dishonor. Let us work for a strictly secular government, a government without a priest in its pay or a God in its Constitution. Unless we hav such a government the United States will surely, and that ere long, repeat the history of Old World nations. Its institutions will be undermined, and secular government, under which all men can worship, or not worship, as they see fit, will be sacrificed to the Moloch of Christian superstition. One such judge as he who sits across the Canada line is more dangerous to our liberties than Nihilism to the Russian throne.

The "Observer" and Mr. Frothingham.

Irenæus Prime's blanket-sheet pats the Evening Post approvingly on the back, in its issue of December 29th, for its course in regard to Mr. O. B. Frothingham's doubts. In view of what has been published since then, we must say the Observer has not improved its morals since it lied so maliciously about THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor.

The only change in Mr. Frothingham's opinions is that he is a more pronounced Theist than formerly. He rejects now, as formerly, revealed religion; but evangelical religion is revealed religion, and the rejection of the one is the rejection of the other. The Evening Post's first report was erroneous, and it is dishonest now in claiming it was not; and the Observer and other religious papers must share in the dishonesty of the transaction if they support its course.

Because Mr. Frothingham has a "growing suspicion that there is something behind or below revealed religion that cannot be accounted for at present, but which nevertheless exists," does not make it so. But Mr. Frothingham never was an Atheist. He has never rested securely in the knowledge that man knows not "God," and never can. He has restlessly been searching for him, but never found him; and now he has but a "growing suspicion" of him. A "suspicion" of him, whether growing or not, is all any one can hav. Mr. Frothingham is of the school of Chadwick and Savage, both Theists, and both rejecting more or less of the dogmas and creeds of Christianity. It is not surprising that he should be a Theist, nor that the Observer should endeavor to make out that he has materially changed his belief; but it is surprising that a secular paper should go deeper into the mud and mire of falsehood to support statements made by a reporter who should hav been discharged for maliciously distorting a man's words and sentiments.

The Observer asks, with a solemnity which is laughable, if it is "not true that the scientific Infidelity which two years ago taught that men are born of brute beasts, and therefore hav no immortal souls, is now silent, if not converted? Is it not true that Atheistic evolution sticks in the mud because it must admit a First Cause, an admission as fatal to itself as pulling out the staple by which the chain holds fast?" and adds, "If Atheism has not yet found courage to cry out after God, it is feeling after him if haply it may find him."

We should say decidedly that it is not true. Scientific Infidelity does not claim that "men are born of brute beasts," although the obtuseness of religious editors is a first-class premis to start such a proposition from. Scientific Infidelity claims that man has evoluted from lower to higher conditions and states, but the monera, or protists, from which man sprung were made different by different conditions from the protists from which were evolved vegetable and the lower brute life. The evolutionist is very far from being stuck in the mud for want of a "first cause." Matter being indestructible and uncreatable, it follows that it must always hav existed, and consequently no "first cause" is needed. But what a dilemma the Christian is in who says to every question asked him, "God!" If because the universe exists, it must hav had a creator, or "first cause," how much more does that creator need a "first cause?" And what was the first cause of that first cause? Could any creator make time? Could any "first cause" create space?

Let the editor of the Observer make a little time and space. He cannot do it—not even a little space in his paper for the truth. Time and space are entities. If they were created, what was there before their creation? No, the trick of pulling "God" from the skies, and putting "First Cause," with capital letters, in the place, will not do. The first cause cannot be any more than the last effect. The universe did not begin with the Jewish Bible, and it will not end with the Christian religion.

The scientific Atheists of the present day are neither feeling nor crying after God. He is to them the unknowable, and they are content to let him be the unknowable. The Atheism of the past is the Agnosticism of the present. The scientists do not presume to "know it all." They are content to study and to learn. It is only the priests, who liv upon the people, who pretend to hav a first mortgage on all the secrets of the universe, and glibly deal out as science the pretended writings of a man who was so supernaturally smart that he wrote an account of his own burial.

THE pope is having a rather hard time of it in Rome. Since Italy took away his temporal power, he has been treated on some occasions with scant respect. Where he is known the best he is most feared and hated, because of his intrigues. An Italian legislator, in debate the other day, gave utterance to this sentiment: "I would rather see Rome in ashes than again under the dominion of the Vatican." He, evidently, is a student of history. He knows what Rome was, what all Italy was, under the reign of the popes. He knows the corruption, the debauchery, the ignorance, the superstition, the bloodshed, that prevailed in the old times of church rule. Any Italian who has the welfare of Italy at heart must applaud his sentiment. And any statesman of any time, any lover of any country, must say the same of his own. Catholicism and ignorance are twin sisters, and all the crimes in the calendar are and hav been but their children. They should never be allowed to secure a foothold in any land.

THE Boston Globe says the Bible is about the only book New England people will not borrow and read. If that is so, it shows much improvement in that steril region over the time when the Puritans hanged witches on Boston Common, in accordance with the command of that book; for in those days the Bible was about the only book allowed to be read. But the world is going ahead, and the path it is following does not lead toward Christianity.

BEECHER recently preached again against hell, saying he wished to "clear God's skirts of any such aspersion," which leads the Graphic to ask if God is of the feminin gender. We can tell the Graphic (which is not an esteemed contemporary) that the only account there is of God makes him to be a big man, but there is no doubt that if he had been of the other sex he would hav been a good deal less brutal, cruel, and bloodthirsty than his own so-called word makes him out to be. The loving heart of a woman would never hav given the Midianites over to slaughter, save the maidens kept for the lust of the soldiers; would never hav taken cities and killed every man, woman, and child; would never hav commanded a father to slay his son or daughter, nor hav done any of the hundreds of cruel deeds recorded of him. We imagin the world would hav seen much less bloodshed had the Jewish deity been animated by the loving spirit of a woman instead of the tyrannical instincts of a barbarous man. The idea of hell was never conceived in a woman's mind.

A SHOCKING accident occurred on the New York Central railroad last Friday night, by which several people were killed, among them Webster Wagner, the monopoly senator. The Chicago express stopped to repair an accident to the air-brakes, and the two rear cars were telescoped by a following train. The blame is being industriously shifted onto the shoulders of a poor, under-paid brakeman, who is under arrest, while the parsimonious and over-paid officers of the road sit in their easy-chairs and say they are sorry. It is a significant commentary on the power of money that rich officials are never troubled, whiln the lowest subordinate is singled out to be punished. It is a good deal like the Christian scheme of salvation, which these officials so generously support with money better spent in employing more me to look after the safety of the passengers.

M. HEROLD, French Prefect and Senator of the Seine, who died recently, was a Freethinker. The funeral services were of an entirely civil character.

GEORGE CHAINEY was recently the recipient of a generous contribution from his Boston friends in appreciation of his good work for Liberalism the past year.

M. M. POMEROY requests the exchanges of the Great West to say that he is neither dead nor busted up in business. He has been sick for several weeks, but is worth a good many dead men yet.

THE treasurer of the N. L. L. has, in the short time he has held the office, spent several hundred dollars more than the receipts. He says he is willing to do his share, but this is a little more, and he cries out for help.

THE British Parliament will meet early in February, when Mr. Bradlaugh will again endeavor to be admitted. It is to be hoped that England will not further disgrace herself by shutting the legislativ door in his face.

MESDAMES COLBY AND SMITH hav been very successful in their evening lectures at the Harvard Rooms. They will continue them until further notice. Societies desiring their services may address them at 1,294 Park ave., this city.

WE regret to note the death by paralysis on the 11th inst. of Mrs. Laura Kendrick. She was well known all over the country as one of the ablest of Liberal lecturers, and her demise will be learned with regret by thousands. She was only forty-nine.

THE Denver, Iowa, League will celebrate the birthday of Paine on the 29th. M. Farrington, of that place, writes us that he has lived in Denver more than thirty years, and never before heard of that Liberal colony in Iowa told of by that Portland, Or., lawyer (liar) referred to by Brother W. C. Clow, of Forest Grove, Or.

THE National Liberal League secretary reports two new Leagues this week. Mr. Follett organized one at Bloomington, Ill., A. S. Burrows, secretary; and the soldiers at Fort Keogh, Mon. Ter., hav enlisted to form another, Price Moody, secretary. These Leagues carry up the number of chartered auxiliaries to 235.

THE letter which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER a week or two since under the heading, "A Genuin Christian on the Guiteau Case," was copied by the religious wretch in full in his statement to the press. He said it came to him providentially, and it did as much as anything is done by providence; it was sent to him by mail.

THE first parlor meeting of the Institute of Heredity in this city will be held at 120 Lexington ave., Jan. 26th, at 8 P.M. Those interested are invited. All who would be informed of the objects of the movement, and also of the time of subsequent meetings, should send their address to E. B. Foote, Jr., M. D., secretary, 120 Lexington ave.

MRS. E. L. FERNANDEZ delivered a most entertaining lecture before the Liberal Club last Friday night. Her lecture was "The Story of a Factory Girl." She worked in a sketch of the club itself, whose lectures her heroin attended, and touched up some of the prominent members in a way that was highly relished even by the subjects of her scalpel. Mrs. Fernandez, though new to the lecture platform, is an undoubted success.

FRIEND Joseph White requests us to ask for information regarding two sisters of his, who are somewhere in the West. The names are Mrs. David Williamson and Mrs. Mahaffy. The last he knew they were in Garden Grove, Iowa. He has not heard from them for many years, and if this comes to their notice, or to that of any one having information of them, they are requested to write to him at 258 11th st., Jersey City, N. J.

PURSUANT to call, a meeting of the Liberal citizens of Canton, Ill., was held in the Stockdale Hall on Saturday, Jan. 7th, Wm. Donn being chosen president of the meeting, and John W. Abbot, secretary. The meeting was called for the purpose of organizing a Liberal lecture bureau. It proceeded to a permanent organization with the following results: Dr. J. H. Rainey, president; Hon. C. N. Henkle, secretary; Mr. Alexander Slack, treasurer.

A LADY rather prominent as a Spiritualist recently died in New Haven, Conn. The funeral was announced to be held at the Universalist church, and the pastor, Rev. Mr. Houghton, was to officiate. At the last moment the one-man-power of one of the trustees was used, and the church denied, and a public hall in the city was opened for the occasion. Mr. Houghton took occasion during the services to tell the cause, to name the party to blame, and to condemn the action.

CORRESPONDENTS should be careful how they write to editors what they don't want printed. The recent letter from D. P. Wilcox, concerning his League hotel enterprise in Deadwood, Dakota, it seems, was meant to be private. Besides, there occurred an error in it which got him into trouble. He was made to say that the hotel had been "a rum-hole run by Christians and courtesans." It should hav been printed, "Run by Christian citizens." Also what was said about mottoes should read "spread mottoes upon the walls of the interior and exterior front." But we hope his League Hotel will be a success all the same.

THE National Reformer says: "The Canadian customs is the censor of the Canadian press. Its officers hav made another seizure of books, which are described by the Toronto Mail as 'bestial' and as 'indecent' and 'immoral.' When we tell our readers that those books are Paine's 'Rights of Man,' 'Age of Reason,' and 'Common Sense,' and Volney's 'Ruins of Empires,' they will understand that the Toronto Mail would do well to find an editor who understands the English language. A week or two ago we noted that some works of Paine and Voltaire had been seized, and now comes the news of fresh seizures. Our Canadian brethren must be up and doing, or they will soon only be allowed such scanty food for their brains as will suffice for those of their customs' officers."

THE Liberals at Liberal, Mo., in League assembled, resolved that "we regard Sec. 1 of Art. III. of the Constitution as wholly uncalled for, not necessary, and should be struck out; that we believe Judge A. Krekel's view of the article as sound, viz:

"We had always supposed, and do now affirm, that the Constitution of the United States provides for a secular government and no other, however much we may, in practice, hav departed from its provisions."

The article in the National Liberal League Constitution thus opposed is as follows:

"ART. III. As means to the accomplishment of this general object, the specific objects of the National Liberal League shall be:

"1. To urge the adoption of such a 'Religious Freedom Amendment' of the United States Constitution as shall effect the complete secularization of the government in all its departments and institutions, state and national, and shall secure to every American citizen the full enjoyment of his opinions on the subject of religion, whatever they may be, without molestation, disability, or deprivation of any civil or political right."

New Ideas and Philosophy.

Dr. Simms lectured last night to a crowded audience in the Temperance Hall, Pitt street, upon the "Nervous System and Mind," and his discourse was undoubtedly a most philosophic and instructiv one. In his happy style he chained the attention of the audience throughout the lecture, and the frequent cheers and outbursts of laughter attested the effect of his essays of wisdom and the natural but unusual and striking association of original ideas. He lectured on the brain and nerve work in substantially the following manner: The first thing formed in animal life is a cell. Around that cell others form, and at last it is a system of living cells. Every animal is formed on the cell plan, man being no exception. Every portion of animal structure is made of cells. The brain consists of millions of cells. No cell can be formed without a nucleus around which to form. In the brain the nucleus is phosphoric oil. We start in life as an egg, 1-120th of an inch in diameter. Animal life may be divided into four great classes—the mollusk, articulate, radiate, and vertebrate. All living organisms having a nervous system are enabled to move, reason, remember, feel, love, obtain a living; and many of the small ones, like ants, carry on war, own slaves, and are very industrious, according to Sir John Lubbock. Yet ants, caterpillars, and all the Hymenoptera—the last being insects, having four membraneous wings—hav no brains. He then proceeded to refute the proposition that brain is an organ of thought. Many men confound brain and mind. We find in Dr. Draper's "Physiology" an account of cases in France, where, when the head was severed by the guillotin from the body, the latter showed resentment and performed thoughtful acts, the same as when having a head. Harper's "Journal" has recorded similar facts. If the brain is an organ of thought, how can a body without brain perform thoughtful acts? A proposition brought forth by some persons is that the size of the brain, other conditions being equal, is a measure of power. As other conditions are never equal in any two individuals, so this proposition kills itself by being untenable. Upon investigation it will be found that many of the greatest men and minds had small brains. John Selden, one of England's ripest scholars, had a small head, as had Shelley, a great poet. John Marshall, a chief justice of the United States; Raphael, the greatest painter the world ever saw; Byron, the greatest poet of modern times—all had very small heads. Captain Cook, England's greatest discoverer, possessed a small head; likewise Archbishop Whately, a religious metaphysician, and Geo. Bancroft, an American historian. Prince Talleyrand's head in horizontal circumference, measured only 20 and 4-10ths inches, which was smaller than a thousand idiots' who resided in France, while he was the wisest diplomatist, wit, and statesman of that country; his head was extremely small in every measurement. Sir Walter Scott had a small brain—not large, at most. Dr. Watts, who wrote beautiful lines, belonged to the little-headed—not small-minded—class, as did Grote, William of Orange, and Francis Jeffrey, founder of the Edinburgh Review. A proposition as to intelligent and cultured men possessing thin skulls was also, the lecturer said, erroneous. History informs us that Porson's skull was one of the thickest ever observed; Agassiz had a very thick skull, and his brain weighed only 53 oz., which is 10 oz. less than that of hundreds of men in Sydney. Comte, the author of the Positiv Philosophy in France, had an unusually thick skull. Many large heads hav belonged to idiots. Joachim's brain weighed almost as much as that of Cuvier, and Joachim was imbecil. Esquirol speaks of a monomaniac whose head measured in circumference over 26 inches, and mentions an idiot whose head measured 33 inches; also, another that measured 22½ inches, exactly the size of the head of the Rev. Charles Spurgeon, the great preacher. Esquirol mentions Audry, an idiot with a 22-inch head. He also says there is no form proper to idiocy; that idiots' heads offer as many varieties as do the crania of sound men. The lecturer measured two idiots in the insane asylum at Dunedin, in New Zealand, and each head measured 23 inches in circumference, and were as bold in their front head and as high as those of intellectual men. Proportion in all bodily parts is the secret of mental power. The brain does not think, but the spirit which fills the entire frame does; and when it leaves its bodily abode the finest brain and body no longer think, because that which thought has taken its eternal flight, to continue to think and improve forever. The office of the brain is that of supplying nervo-vital fluid to the body and feeding the spirit. That it givs life to every portion of the body may be demonstrated by cutting any nerve, and the part dies where that nerve reached. Cut the six nerves that extend down the axiliary or inside region of the arm, and the arm is instantly dead, and loses all feeling, motion, and life, and dwindles away. Large heads are found in the cold regions, and smaller ones in warm regions. The Lancet, published in London, once stated that men with large heads endure cold better than those with small ones. More vitality is required to sustain life in cold climates than in warm ones, hence nature give largest heads at the north. The Lapps hav the largest heads in Europe in proportion to their size. Norwegians next; then come Swedes, Danes, Germans, French, Italians. Arabs hav the smallest of all men in Europe. Muscular men hav wide heads, because the large muscles on the sides of the skull pulling daily while chewing pull the side plates outwards. Bony men, with stronger bones and less powerful muscles, hav narrow, long heads. There are signs of character in the form of the skull, but they are less reliable, not so easily scanned, and there are not one-tenth as many as in the face. The form of the head is principally given by the bones and muscles, and not by the brain, as some believe. Here the lecturer gave an amusing description of the cause and cure of sick headache; also an eloquent discourse on the effect of light on the mind. He related a very amusing story illustrativ of the force of imagination. The entertaining character-readings of the faces of ladies and gentlemen brought the instructiv and valuable entertainment to a close.

WHAT shall we say when Christians tell us that hypocrits and frauds are not Christians? That the church is responsible for them as long as she tolerated them; that the system to prove its efficacy must present uniform virtue in every member; that dogma and doctrin obscure the moral vision and lead the mind to rely on belief in irrelevant things; that no belief can be of a saving nature unless it applies immediately to an act of the body or mind affecting ourselvs and our fellow men; that men think so much of God that they hav no room left to think of man; that in the churches is found such a difference of conduct among the members as to furnish indisputable evidence the men may believe exactly the same theologically, and yet act diametrically opposit in a moral point of view. Hence Christianity, which is all theology, does not make men better or worse.—Reuben Dailey.

Lukewarm Liberalism.—Innovations Wanted.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Fate has removed me one state farther west. My season of labor for the Elgin Liberal League has expired; they hav a Liberal Sunday-school, and a sufficient number of members to keep the flag of liberty afloat if each one stands bravely by his colors. But the indifference and cowardice of Liberals is the great obstacle to success in our movement. Some of the answers which one receives when making inquiries in regard to arranging for Liberal meetings are really amusing. One will write, "I am heartily in sympathy with your work, I am a 'pure' Infidel, but the town is run by Christians, and I wish you the greatest success in your labors elsewhere, but can't encourage you to come here." Another will reply, "We—that is, a few friends—would be glad to hear you speak, but really the most of us are so busy getting ready for Christmas" (celebrating the birth of the Christian God!) "that we hav no time to arrange for the lectures." Others will write, "We cannot feel like interesting ourselvs in getting up meetings unless we know you are a genuin Spiritualist." Others, organized into Leagues, wish to arrange with you, but they want Infidelity, pure and proper, preached; they will take no Socialism, Nihilism, Spiritualism, or Liberalism, in their mental pabulum.

Societies are organized sometimes, by some lucky influence, only to be split up, later, into this and that faction, representing this or that phase of the great Liberal movement.

Now the question is, as it appears to me, why can not all classes of Freethinkers unite to learn of, and discuss, all subjects which agitate the minds of men. This must be done if Infidels are to be preserved from the bigotry and one-sidedness of most Christians.

And, more than this, they must also learn that, if the Liberal movement ever succeeds, in any sense whatever, there is work to do as well as talk to listen to. With the exception of the labor of Felix Adler, and the contemplated movement in that direction by George Chainey, I know of nothing being done in that direction. I read, a week or two since, of an enterprise inaugurated by some Christian ladies in Chicago, to giv good, nutritious, and wholesome food in a bright and attractiv room, at a most moderate figure, thereby hoping to attract the empty stomach of the working man from the groggery to this resort, but I hav yet to learn of any wide-spread movement for humanitarian purposes (excepting the two already mentioned) on the part of wealthy Infidels. It is not necessary, indeed, that these movements should be inaugurated and carried on by people of large means, unless we confess that we lack that enthusiasm and devotion to the cause which is so continually displayed by some little, struggling, unpretentious congregation and church in the small towns scattered over our country. I do not myself wonder at Mr. Frothingham's plaintiv lament, "My work seemed to amount to nothing." I think I can appreciate fully the feeling that inspired his remarks, though I cannot lay claim to the long and honorable service which he has given the cause of Freethought. He felt, and feels, I presume, that while he has given of his brain and his being the best that he had to bestow upon the world, still the spirit that prompts men and women to go into the hospital, and on the battle-field, into the slums of filth, and dens of disease, in search of wretchedness to relieve is found very largely within the church.

And if we are not to hav in our ranks many more who will halt for "more light," we must hav more organizations like that upon which Felix Adler breathes the breath of his heroic soul, inspiring it to work out the problem of society's salvation. If we would not giv our Christian friends at least a pretext for taunting us with inhumanity, we must band together and bestir ourselves in season and out of season for the object, not only of breaking every intellectual fetter from the soul of man, but also binding up the broken heart, and brightening the desolate pathway of our brother.

From many quarters I hear the cry of dead Leagues. Why dead, my friends? Is the world's work done? Is ill and evil conquered and the millennium insured? Or are you so weak or weary that you cannot carry the burden of the work, and drop it for your Christian friends to lift and carry on?

"By their fruits ye shall know them." I write this from the city of Burlington. It numbers 20,000 inhabitants. There are several churches rearing their costly and untaxed heads, supported quite largely, no doubt, by the means of Infidels; there is a Young Men's Christian Association reading-room, and the usual machinery of the Christian church. But there is no Liberal reading-room, no Liberal Sunday-school, no Liberal lecture platform. Yet I am told there are large numbers of Infidels, wealthy and influential, as well as those in more moderate circumstances. Next Sunday (Jan. 8), at Mozart Hall, an effort will be made to gather together these scattered forces, and range them in line of battle for the world's work? Who will respond? How many hav time, and enthusiasm, and interest, and courage to meet me at Mozart Hall each Sunday evening, and coöperate in the work of serving the world upon a new basis? How many in adjacent towns will communicate with me to arrange for week evening meetings for the same objects?

The harvest is ripe and the laborers are few.

Those New Commandments.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav read with pleasure your article on the new commandments. I thank you gratefully for your pleasant and able notice of the same.

The evangelical world has for centuries stood in the sorest need of new commandments, as well as corrections and amendments of the monstrosities of the Decalog, given to the world by a murderer and conjurer (according to his history written by himself) as written by the "finger of God," on the authority simply of the "say-so" of Moses. The Catholics, long since, had the good sense to amend the Decalog, conforming it to better language, better sense, and making it a better moral guide for human conduct.

Those new commandments are dedicated and submitted to the prayerful consideration and adoption of the Protestant world. To show their great need, I will note one command only as a specimen: "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor;" and that is all about lying. The heathen commandment is, "Thou shalt not lie!" Nature's intuitional moral precept is, "Thou shalt not lie." St. Paul acknowledges he lied for the glory of God, and the orthodox, taking the cue from Paul, lie for the benefit of the "cause of Christ," not to mention their laxity in this matter in daily life. Tho ninth new commandment is, "Thou shalt not lie for any purpose."

I cannot here note in detail the amendments to the Decalog, so far as the new commandments follow it, but the above must serve as a specimen of the whole.

Moses's commandments are like a bucket of sap—there is some sweetness in them; but they need manufacture to find the valuable, throwing away the débris and skimmings.

You candidly state that it would hardly do for Liberals to adopt the first and second of the new commandments. At first blush, or prima facie, as lawyers say, it might seem that the teaching is that some god, so called, is known to be God and therefore no other god must be had before him; but on a second view and thought, it will be seen that the whole teaching is truly and deeply Agnostic. Simply, we must first know there is a being who is God and good, and then the honors will be easy. The same principle applies to "everything known to be sacred" in the second commandment.

I am glad and thankful that your criticism has been so light and kindly. Will not the view I hav given (which I apprehend must be the meaning of the first two precepts referred to), be accepted and satisfactory to Liberal thinkers? Then may not these new commandments "serve for the meridian" of all Liberals, saints and sinners, "great and small, short and tall."

Could I hav had these fifteen new commandments deeply impressed upon the plastic mind of my youth, I feel that I should hav been a better man all my life. How much more good I might hav done in moral teachings in the three hundred and fifteen public schools I superintended four years; in the institutions of learning in which I taught, and in the teachers' institutes I served by lessons and lectures in seven states of the Union!

Is it not time, high time, and over time that the good sense of the world should repudiate as false the bungling and defectiv precepts of the Decalog, enunciated by a murderer and conjurer? (See Ex. ii, 12–16, and iv; also the plagues of Egypt.) And while you are about it, please read the last half of the nineteenth chapter of Exodus, and see how Moses describes the acts and character of the God he says wrote the Commandments. If such acts were imputed to a man, the world would call him a deceiver, a liar, and as ferocious as a wild beast.

Pardon the length of this letter; as Sheridan said, "A speech is in me, and must come out." I hav strongly bound in the heart of my memory the fifteenth commandment for my own especial benefit, to wit, "Thou shalt be honest, kind, just, and true at thy home and abroad."

Now, my good friend, will you hav the goodness to publish, side by side, at the foot of this letter, the Decalog and the New Commandments, that all may compare, judge, and choose the good.

I hav often thought of that noble desire and prayer of Beecher for the health, preservation, and safe return of Theodore Parker when he crossed the sea. The same desire animates the Liberals in regard to our dear Bennett.

And now may great peace and loving kindness abide with you. Yours for life, and the good I may do,

WORTHY PUTNAM.

Berrien Springs, Mich.

[We accede to our respected friend's wish, and giv below the Commandments of Jehovah and Judge Putnam side by side]:

JEHOVISTIC.	PUTNAMISTIC.
1. Thou shalt hav no other gods before me. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth; thou shalt not bow down thyself to them nor serve them; for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments.	1. Thou shalt hav no other god before him who is known to be God and good.
2. Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.	2. Thou shalt not take in vain the name of any thing that is known to be sacred.
3. Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy.	3. Thou shalt keep, by thy words and works, all days holy and pure.
4. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested on the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it.	4. Thou shalt be industrious and honor labor.
5. Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.	5. Thou shalt honor relativs that are true and all others that deserve honor from thee.
6. Thou shalt not kill.	6. Thou shalt not assault another nor commit murder.
7. Thou shalt not commit adultery.	7. Thou shalt not practice lewdness.
8. Thou shalt not steal.	8. Thou shalt deal justly with all thy fellow-beings, and not despoil another of his goods.
9. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.	9. Thou shalt not lie for any purpose.
10. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's.	10. Thou shalt render justice for evil.
	11. Thou shalt be temperate in the use of all things.
	12. Thou shalt not persecute thy fellow for his religious opinion.
	13. Thou shalt depress anger and use kind words in thy intercourse with mankind.
	14. Thou shalt use domestic animals kindly.
	15. Thou shalt be honest, kind, just, and true at thy home and abroad.

The Twelve Commandments.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I read with pleasure those new commandments which came to our worthy friend Putnam a few nights since, and noted also your exception to one or two of them, which ones are, perhaps, after all, only friend Putnam's way of wording a precept which all Rationalists should feel themselvs bound to respect, only differing as to the choice of words in which the sentiment should be expressed. I hav been looking them over, and by culling and pruning hav reduced the number to twelve (an interference which I trust friend Putnam will pardon), in which form they retain essentially all the principles of the list as first given, with the merit, perhaps, of being more concise. It was a good idea of our honored friend's—this giving of the duties which every earnest Liberal should strive to observe. Christians hav their Decalog (more honored in the breach than the observance), with the added commandment of the holy Nazarene—the principal word of which they seem to have translated hate—why should we not "go them one better," and present to the world the twelve commandments of Rationalism which inculcate a higher morality, and in which is found no echo of the mutterings of a jealous God. Liberals, repeat the creed!

1. Thou shalt have no God but goodness.
2. Thou shalt not persecute for opinion's sake.
3. Thou shalt render equal and exact justice to all men.
4. Thou shalt keep all days holy through good words and deeds.
5. Thou shalt strive to alleviate the sufferings and promote the happiness of thy fellow-men.
6. Thou shalt be industrious in work, upright in deal, and temperate in the use of all things.
7. Thou shalt honor truth, and justice alone shalt thou worship.
8. Thou shalt abstain from sin and practice virtue.
9. Thou shalt be merciful to domestic animals.
10. Thou shalt fairly compensate all hired labor.
11. Thou shalt refrain from slander, and be not hasty in reciting thy neighbor's faults.
12. Thou shalt do all the good thou canst, and as little harm as possible.

Fellow Truth-seekers, do you not think our twelve commandments more comprehensiv and better than the old Jewish ten. I think them worthy of inscription on the primary card of the "Brotherhood of Humanity," of which I believe our friend Putnam is playfully termed "the Bishop." At all events, they are a brief synopsis of those duties which are alike incumbent upon all, and need no indorsement by a mythical deity to render them obligatory in their nature on those who seek to "make the world better for having lived in it." D. LOUIS BODGE.

Cremation.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: You lately announced the formation of a cremation society in San Francisco, but seem to hav overlooked a similar organization nearer home. Permit me to inform your many readers here and elsewhere that a cremation society was organized in this city in March last by some thirty persons, that it is duly incorporated under the laws of the state, and now numbers over one hundred members. Meetings are held semi-monthly, and several valuable and interesting papers upon the subject of cremation, and the disposition of the dead in its various aspects, hav been read before the society. Cremation societies are also forming in Chicago, Washington, and Savannah; they exist in several parts of Europe, including one of two thousand members in Copenhagen. Crematories are in successful operation at Milan in Italy, at Gotha in Germany, and at Waking in England, and there will soon be one in this city, a cremation company having been chartered and its stock in part subscribed.

Cremation is not popular here because it is an innovation. People hav become so accustomed to putting their dead into a hole in the ground,

"To lie in cold obstruction and to rot," while preyed on by the "politic worm," that the question of its propriety never arises, and the suggestion of any other method is almost, or quite shocking to them. It is the business of cremation societies to dispel this unreasonable prejudice and disseminate enlightened ideas regarding the disposal of the dead.

It is true that cremationists believe in burning people; but it is the dead they would burn, not the living; and in this world, not the next; and with the view, not to purify or punish souls, but to preserve from corruption the air we breathe and the water we drink.

There are nineteen public cemeteries in New York and its suburbs, which receive annually more than three thousand tons of human bodies, to slowly rot, exhale noxious gases and poison the wells and other water-sources in the vicinity. It is not a pleasant thought.

Mr. Bennett is now, I believe, in a country where cremation prevails, and I suppose he will giv us, in his letters from India and Japan, some information on this question, with a description of the rude processes of incineration which he will see anywhere on the banks of the Ganges, and to some extent in the land of the tycoon.

But cremation as practiced in the East at the present day, and as it was practiced by the Greeks and Romans, is a very different thing from the modern and scientific process, which I will not take space to describe here, but which I may say is simple, speedy, economical, unobtrusive, devoid of offensivness in any way, and must commend itself to every thoughtful mind as far preferable to earth burial.

D. W. CRAIG.

Gospel Temperance.

If there is any ridiculous combination of words, it is that above this sentence. As if there were more than one kind of temperance, a gospel temperance and an anti-gospel temperance.

It is largely our own fault as Liberals that we hav not brought the temperance cause forward as a part of the moral teaching of Liberalism. We hav allowed the church to make its fling at lager-beer Infidels and hav never responded with a practical total-abstinence Freethinker's arguments.

Some of our German friends drink lager-beer, therefore some of our Liberal papers, and most of our Liberal writers and speakers, think it a great mistake for any Freethinker to advocate the prohibition of the entire accursed traffic.

The Germans who hav come to this country are fast finding out that whatever lager-beer may do for them in the fatherland, in this country it is proving a curse, and a dreadful one, to the Germans themselvs. Here, under a lager-beer diet, a German bloats almost to bursting, and can barely move about from the gout. If our German friends wish to compete with the lithe, activ, intelligent Yankee, they must stop the lager-beer business.

There is no occasion whatever for Liberals to handle this liquor question with such tenderness. Rum is just as certainly a poison to a Freethinker as it is to a Christian. The defaulting teller in the Poughkeepsie Bank was not only a Freethinker, a Liberal, but he was a libertin and a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The long slimy hand of crime is upon us, and let us not try to lie out of it. When a church-member falls, they say he was not a Christian after all. We don't stand in a position to say this man was not a Liberal nor a Freethinker. He was too liberal—with other people's money; he was too free, altogether—freer than he will be for months, if not years to come.

His course of crime was not the result of Freethought—it was in spite of Freethought. It however shows the importance of making morality the cornerstone of Liberalism.

Seneca V. Halloway, charged with taking from the bank of which he was teller $57,000, is the mere wreck of a once bright, honest, Liberal gentleman, who was loved, and honored, and trusted far more than it is the happiness of most men to be. A wreck, a dilapidated man—rum has done its work upon him. Had he never used intoxicants he would to-day hav been an honored member of our Liberal ranks.

Let us no longer permit the hypocrits in their sheep's clothing to steal the livery of decency with such an incongruous phrase as "Gospel temperance.' We want just a little Infidel temperance, and we must make it as good a preserving article as the one labeled by the gospel mill. Such howling cranks as Talmage and Sawyer and the whole tribe of solemn old monkeys who follow in their wake make any cause disgusting, and do more harm than good to the very thing they pretend to help. Instead of setting an old toper to praying to God to take his thirst away, we should find him work, if he needs it, sober society, and words of encouragement. It is time Infidelity began to show its helpfulness. Felix Adler is to-day at work with his Ethical Culture Society, making a place for the young beyond the reach of superstition and vice that is inestimable. We should encourage him. Every word from week to week uttered by him as a public teacher should find its appropriate place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The corps of Liberal writers whose names appear in Liberal papers ought to giv this matter a little attention. I hav been looking for a terrible blast on this point from the "Institute of Heredity." Surely there is much to be said of the drunken father, the drunken mother. What hope is there for the child begotten in the very arms of drunkenness, carried in the womb of drunkenness, nursed at the bloated breast of drunkenness, and then weaned upon a bottle of alcohol? The answer is, idiocy, insanity, a drunkard's course of crime, at last a drunkard's death.

Liberalism comes as a herald of a new day; it is her province to point out and assist in removing the the curses that ignorance and vice hav laid upon the human race. Superstition and intemperance are twin monsters. Let us attack them with a fury that will never abate, though guided ever by reason and justice.

LIBERTA.

Prohibition.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: "Liberta's" savage, abrupt, and Guiteauish onslaught upon "Law" is significant. It betrays the spirit which impels too many of our advocates of "prohibition."

From reading their articles I should certainly judge "Law" to be the more temperate man of the two. I dare say he is quite undeserving of the charges, "wanting in morality," etc. In my humble opinion no advanced Liberal will fling out such grave charges against a brother for a mere difference of opinion.

Few questions are harder to solve than this everlasting so-called temperance question. So let us avoid hobbies, dogmatism, and fanaticism. The right road generally lays somewhere near midway between two extremes.

Intemperance in drink is an evil. Does prohibition cure, prevent, or curtail it? No. Does not its universal failure everywhere seem to indicate that the principle is not in strict accord with the unwritten law of the universe? Does prohibition commend itself to the mind of any real, deep-thinking, philosophical Liberal as a legitimate motiv power for the ear of progress. Good, well-meaning men honestly believed the Inquisition to be a legitimate agent for moral reform—for the salvation of mankind. They also believed in fire and fagot as a means of grace; and that nothing could promote holiness and cause righteousness to run down the streets like a river equal to penal law against unbelief. But those delicious times hav passed. Now it is something else. Not so bad, it is true, but the principle is the same. The eminent poet who said, widely missed the mark. Stealing a railroad is no more wrong than stealing a pin. The right to drink "rot-gut" is not a very valuable right, one would think; still, such as it is, I doubt the equity of robbing a man of it. The validity of nine sober men's titles to their right cannot be affected by the acts of one drunkard.

"'Tis a sin to steal a pin—
'Tis a greater to steal a tater,"

How the prohibitionists will succeed in jerking or ejecting our race up the hill of knowledge by legislation remains to be seen. It is a dismal failure here in Kansas so far. I believe that evolution and education will slowly and surely lift mankind above all forms of intemperance and ignorance; that stringent license and anti-treat laws, with other regulations, can accomplish more good than prohibition; that inebriety is a disease, and every inebriate should be promptly sent to a state inebriate asylum; that beer, wine, and cider are harmless drinks as to quality, if pure, but that distilled beverages contain murder and pauperism, and their retail sale should be restricted to druggists, and then sold only to sober adults, and put up in bottles labeled on one side with the skull and cross bones, and the word poison! The other side should be ornamented with the most horrid and frightful picture possible, in colors, of a man with the jim-jams, tearing his hair, and fighting forked-tongued serpents. Beneath should be this legend: "The fate of fools who drink this poison."

As for me, I do not drink it; neither do I stimulate with tobacco, tea, coffee, or spices. But should I ever become so narrow as to wish to compel my neighbor to gauge his appetite by mine, or to force him to hunt through the statute-book, or consult a lawyer, in order to find out what, where, and how much he may legally eat or drink, I hope my friends will take me to a lunatic asylum.

Radical Pulpit.

"The Radical Pulpit" is the title of a volume issued by the Liberal and Scientific Publishing House of D. M. Bennett, New York. It contains a series of discourses by two of the most eminent men of the age, O. B. Frothingham and Prof. Felix Adler. The most radical thing about these discourses is that Christianity is looked upon as a thing of the past, and upon its ruins the grand edifice of the Religion of Humanity is being constructed. The morality inculcated in "The Radical Pulpit" is pure and beautiful, and is full of hope for the human family.

Of the fifteen discourses in this volume ten are by O. B. Frothingham, every one of which is well worth reading. Mr. Frothingham's present attitude in the world of religious thought will naturally cause the book to be read with more interest than it otherwise would, and his treatment of the following subjects will attract special attention: "The Consolations of Rationalism," "The New Song of Christmas," "The Sectarian Spirit," "The Dogma of Hell" and "Life as a Test of Creed." Prof. Adler is a speaker and writer of great ability, whose merits are well known to the adherents of radical views in religion.

"The Godly Women of the Bible" is a volume of 345 pages, issued by the same house. It is a critical survey of the influence of the Bible on women, and is specially severe on the attitude of Paul toward "the divine sex." The authoress is said to be a resident of southern California, and is evidently of the strong-minded persuasion.—Jewish Times.

Obituary.

DIED, in the thirty-second year of her age, at the residence of Dr. S. M. Clarke, in Metamora, Ohio, Mrs. Anna Kahle, wife of Daniel Kahle, after an illness of over seven months, of chronic inflammation of the bowels, followed by a fatal derangement of the heart, which ended her life with very unexpected suddenness.

Deceased was a faithful and loving wife, much respected and loved by her acquaintances, and had been a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER more than two years. She had ceased to believe in the terrifying threats of a revengeful God as taught by the Bible and the Christian churches generally, hence she had no fear of future punishment, and lived the last few years of her life and died without any anxiety concerning her soul's salvation. She attended with her husband the Freethinker's Convention at Lake Chautauqua, and the following year at Hornellsville, when she and her husband joined that association. In respect to the feelings of her Christian parents and relativs, the services of a Methodist minister were engaged for the funeral. The services were introduced by the reading of a chapter in the Bible concerning the truth of God, etc., which of course could not hurt the feelings of the deceased, and possibly was a comfort to some.

HE Kansas Liberal givs us this pleasant notice:

"We hav just received from the publishing house of D. M. Bennett some large posters advertising that sterling Freethought journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER. As many of our readers know, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is now making a tour of the world, and writing weekly letters to his paper describing the scenes and incidents met with in his travels; and, what is of far greater importance, giving the observations and reflections of a fearless, outspeaking, and close-observing Freethinker upon the manners, customs, and religions of foreign lands. It has been too much the habit of tourists heretofore to write books of travel with a view chiefly to making money out of them; and hence they hav been careful not to offend the prejudices of their Christian readers by letting them see wherein the morals and religious customs of so-called Christian countries show to a disadvantage when compared with those of heathen lands. The last letter from Mr. Bennett was written from Athens, whence he went to Constantinople, and hence his opportunities will be ample for comparing the workings of Christian creeds with those of Mohammedanism. THE TRUTH SEEKER is published weekly at 141 Eighth street, New York, at $3.00 per annum; trial subscribers for three months, fifty cents."

WM. H. LEFF, of Tip-Top, Arizona, says he was "born, bred, baptized, and raised a Roman Catholic." Nevertheless, he has just sent a dollar for an annual membership in the National Liberal League. Who says Roman Catholics never abandon their faith?

MR. EDITOR: I notice in your paper you are likely to be short of means to take you round the world. Inclosed find $5 to help you through. I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER since May 1, 1881. Very respectfully, NOAH COLER.

LAKE MILLS, IOWA, Jan. 4, 1882.
EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Find inclosed postal draft, for which you will please continue my name as a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, a paper that bears for its heading two of the grandest words in the English catalog of words; $5 for the book that is to be styled "A Trip Around the World." I was among the few that were not in favor of the trip, but as it is being made, and the book forthcoming, I shall not go back on my pledge for the "V." The book will be well worth the money, but the money that is spent in the trip, had it been used judiciously in missionary work at home, I think would hav done more good than it will now. I find in the course of life that if we make a mistake it sometimes can be corrected. Now to correct this one and to make it a satisfactory correction, I will suggest that Mr. Bennett, on his arrival at home, and having a good, sufficient rest, make a trip through the states at home, so that about every one of the patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER can hav the privilege of seeing, and hearing him talk and recite his expeence of that trip, as occasion may require, providing the lovers of truth and liberty will donate enough to pay all reasonable expenses. I will start first by the pledge of another "V" for the home trip. Will not call it missionary work, but a visit to all subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not mean visits of the Methodist style, but to visit towns and counties so that every one can, by going a few miles, see and hear him speak. Yours for the right,
S. D. WADSWORTH.

PARIS, ILL., Jan. 1, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: A happy New Year to THE TRUTH SEEKER working corps and all its patrons and the Christian world; but then, how can the latter be happy with a frowning, revengeful God overhead and a yawning hell beneath? I am happy to be able and willing to send you the within draft for $5 to help our old friend and neighbor around the world on his mission for facts and truths. With a good wish for a safe and pleasant voyage to the old veteran,
Yours truly, JACOB CRETORS.

WEST NEWTON, MASS., Jan. 1, 1882.
BRO. BENNETT: I wish you and yours a happy New Year. And now I propose to make you a New Year's present of $8.50, for which I expect in return you will make me a present of the good old TRUTH SEEKER for 1882, a life-size lithograph of yourself, and print my name in the forthcoming book of your travels, as one who givs $5 for your safe return home to your family and friends. I want the books bad enough to deny myself of an inherited appetite for that nasty, disgusting weed called tobacco. And I hope the power that governs this country which you are circumnavigating will help me to do away with the use of this filthy habit, and thus make me a man instead of an animal which chews its cud. And I would say to my brethren all over the world, Go thou and do likewise. Try it one year, my friends, and see if you don't feel yourselvs more like men than the cringing slaves you now are to the use or a filthy weed which even a hog won't touch. Come one and all, commence the new year with me. Send your $5 to the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and receive in return his books of travel, which is truth, and truth elevates and ennobles, while tobacco used in any form (except to kill lice and sheep-ticks) degrades our manhood and poisons our blood.
Earnestly and sincerely your friend in the cause of progression, CHARLES N. WOOD.

LADOGA, IND., Jan. 3, 1881.
EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Permit me, though a little late, to greet you with a Happy New Year, and not you alone, but all the brave men and women in this semi-happy land who hav dared to throw off the yoke of orthodox superstition to bask in the genial sunshine of mental liberty.
When the Round-the-World trip was being canvassed pro and con, I pledged a V to Mr. Bennett, provided he would stay at home, instead of banishing himself for a year in the lands of all the original gods, such as Allah, Yahweh, Jove, Bacchus, Confucius, Jesus J. Christ, Holy Hobgoblin, etc.; and I saw fit to giv him an introduction to Mr. Bridges, an estimable young friend of mine, as a traveling companion. He is sending us such intensely interesting accounts of the various countries through which he passes, describing manners, customs, arts, agriculture, religious rites, ceremonies, and foolishness, gods, god-houses, temples, and ruins, that I must break my pledge and send for the book; and I hope a thousand more will do likewise.
Fraternally yours, M. M. HENRY.

GOMER, OHIO. Jan. 5, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I am sorry that I neglected to forward my subscription when my time expired, but through your kindness hav been receiving your paper regularly. I send you $5, which place to my credit, including the time that has passed. I cannot well do without it. I liv in a hotbed of orthodoxy, where the majority are full of ignorance and superstition, though we hav a few Liberals, and they are gaining in numbers. I hope Mr. Bennett will hav a successful trip around the world; it is a journey that was needed by such a man, so we can have the truth about the heathen lands, as we hear but little from there but from the missionaries, and I hav but little confidence in them. Yours, etc., JAMES NICHOLAS.

KEOTA, IOWA, Dec. 22, 1881.
MR. EDITOR: I inclose you post-office order for ten dollars—three on my subscription, two for the "Trinity of Freethought," and as you offer stars so cheap as $5 apiece I will take one, although as Materialists we are to leave those ethereal possessions for Spiritualists. May it be one drop in the ocean of "fives" to flood Bro. Bennett's canoe toward sweet home again. It is said who travels livs twice, and by traveling he may gain the year he lost in the hands of the modern inquisition. I would rather see him take a recess at home and circulate his publications in the land of the free than to write up half-civilized nations; but the word "rest" is not in the lexicon of a man of his ability and character. Had he even not written more than the letters to Mr. Mair, his name would shine and liv forever in the wreath of the celebrated. May the burden of years not be too heavy upon him if he has to carry his mule awhile (like Mark Twain) to keep up with his company. May he not spend a decenium in study of Sanskrit, like Volney, to disclose the secrets of Hindoo religion. American Liberals can and will protect him against pawnbrokers, but are powerless against cholera and disaster. I hav passed a terrible half hour on the Atlantic, when shrieks and blazes mingled in the air; I hav seen the pearls fly in the trembling fingers of the praying-machines on board. Yes, to count prayers at such a moment required machine-work. I resolved not to go in that fiery vehicle to heaven, like Elijah, but to rather keep house within the whale, like Jonah. We were saved, not by the virgin mother, but by the energy of the officers, who, fortunately, did not stop to pray. May Bro. Bennett never hav to decide between fire and water, and escape from the lion and the cholera.
Bro. Bennett is to search for descendants of the widow's jug that never was found empty, for a full jug, like a full purse, is welcome to all nations. But to make his journey most beneficial to mankind he is to take those dead weights from the wheels of progress, those indolent idlers, those leeches who absorb the beggar's penny as well as the banker's dollar, and which he so well described in his "Truth Seeker in Europe." Take from the land of lemons superstition and hierarchy; from the land of oranges ignorance and poverty. Take them around to the thousand islands of the south Pacific Ocean, where the Feejees use them as material for steaks. Italy will bless our hero for such energetic purification of that country, for they would, if only once in their life, feed the hungry. May their road from the teeth of the Feejee to resurrection run smoothly, for "Jordan am a hard road to travel." I pity the poor pagans, for they will all die of dyspepsia if they continue such obnoxious, unwholesome diet. How natural to these children of nature to eat up and put out of the way their oppressors, and how perfect and radical the cure! How unnatural of our Christian neighbors to eat their Savior, redeemer, and benefactor!—eat the flesh and blood of a Jew who died a criminal death two thousand years ago, and offer such a horrid feast as a universal remedy for all sin whatsoever; and whosoever doubts that he really eats the flesh and drinks the blood of Christ shall be damned! Can a person with sound reason, with common sense, go to heaven? Impossible; only cannibals and idiots are worthy and able to go to that insane asylum. How absurd for Christians to claim that their religion is the foundation of all morality; how absurd to say outside the church morality does not exist! I turn the lance around; an action or deed done in the hope of reward of heaven, or fear of punishment in hell, is not moral in the purest sense of the term. The doctrin of absolution is degrading and immoral; the doctrin that the greatest sinner is most welcome in heaven (there is more joy in heaven over one sinner who repenteth than over ninety-nine righteous) is persuading to sin, and most immoral; the creed that the deepest sinners, even murderers, by repentance in their dying moment will secure free admittance to the right hand of the judge, among the sheep who hav washed their garments in the blood of the lamb, is still more immoral. How impudent, then, of Christians to say, "I cannot believe a Freethinker, even under oath, because they do not fear God." Now, Christians never see the beam in their own eyes; but can justice rely upon a witness who settles his bill, perjury included, by confessing to the priest—the priest who absolves and forgivs the murderer—and while an innocent victim suffers death or life-long imprisonment, and his family do suffer disgrace and shame, the real murderer rests easy and soft on the pillow of his absolution, and the priest is doomed to silence by the creed of his religion? Verily, they hav their eyes full of beams and their brains too. How can they claim moral actions if not a hair can be lost without the will of their governor, who destined ninety-nine per cent to hell before they are born?
Scientific education is the fountain of morality, of virtue, and of humanity. Morality and virtue are on the increase since the progress of science in spite of the degrading doctrins of religion. Knowledge, not faith, is the cornerstone of morality. We Freethinkers know that no god nor priest can forgiv or annihilate the consequence of a bad act, and will liv so as to look on our past life with pleasure when Charon's skiff approaches. We do not hope for reward nor fear punishment after life; our aim is the welfare and happiness of the human race. We find our reward in the estimation of the righteous and educated, and in the contentment of our own heart, and the sentence of a just spirit should grant us reserved seats in Walhalla if continuance of thought could be possible after life is extinct and the capacity to think has ceased. This letter is growing entirely too long, else I should serve a few remarks to Mr. D. Thing's "Spiritual Arm," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 10th.
Yours most respectfully, CHARLES NAUMANN.

LION CITY, M. T., Dec. 14. 1881.
MR. EDITOR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 25th ult., also back numbers of the paper, for which I thank you, and sincerely appreciate your courtesy. It is rather slow work in this region introducing light, as most of the inhabitants are either Scandinavians or Poles, and the latter think they hav not lived sufficiently long and near enough to the classic world to retrograde, even for Luther's sake. They think it is a new kind of orthodoxy, and fancy it will tend to stop work on Sunday. I pity the poor fellow who would pass here with a white necktie, or who would pass a saloon without visiting it. Doubtless their education was slightly neglected in their infancy. They hav a god of creation—lucre—and how they worship it, equal to any creed but the one! And they worship nothing but what they can elope with. The Turk, Hindoo, Malay, Tartar, Chinese, Siamese, and every other nationality I hav been amongst, when they hav lost all faith in their original and nativ castes, feel sufficient degradation to be on an equality with a Christian. None of the above will touch, taste, or handle anything after a Christian until it has been thoroughly purified. It may be said they will sell their daughters, barter their honor, and thereby sell their own souls. Need we go far to find whether the heathens are the only ones who are so sordidly ambitious? Believe me, the question is too easily answered even to cause a blush within our own range. Believe me, our worthy explorer will hear and see more than has ever been written of oriental customs, manners, and habits. Most books that I hav read of oriental nations hav had too deep a daub of sale-coloring for a traveler to make a passport of. I hav ever found them generous to a fault until some Christian or civilized trick was performed, and when they found it out I suppose they became civilized or Christianized as well. Inclosed please find $3, my subscription to the paper for next year. It is a paper that has no equal for assisting every human being in carrying out the maxim of one of the greatest philosophers that ever lived, "Make your heaven on earth."

Yours respectfully, R. YEAMON.

MOUND CITY, KAS., Jan. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Happy New Year to you and your entire corps. Inclosed find post-office order for your paper for the ensuing year. I see that our hero is prospecting close to the Jordan, where he probably will take a cool bath and shake off the rubbish he encountered in going through my old, priest-ridden birth-place. Good wishes to you, Mr. Macdonald, for the good management of our great paper.

Your friend, FRED MANTEY.

LIBERAL, MO., Jan. 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: We hav just got over a grand, good time we had on New Year's Day, at Freethought Hall. It was given out a week or so previous that we would hold a basket picnic at the hall, and all partake of a "co-operativ dinner." We know if the co-operativ business was not carried out to perfection at that dinner it was simply because the individual could not eat his share. But we believe they did. The League was to meet that day to transact some business, but it was simply absurd to mar the enjoyment of that occasion by any "formality," so we postponed.

We are now making grand preparations for the celebration of Thomas Paine's birthday. All our entertainments heretofore hav been a success. We hav had crowded houses; but we intend that this shall be best of all. There will be nothing left undone that will tend to make the celebration of the founder of American liberty a day long to be remembered by all the participants.

We hope every Liberal society throughout the United States will make that day resound with their demonstrations.

THE TRUTH SEEKER seems to be the main paper circulated in Liberal, outside of our home Liberal, and we watch with much anxiety the course of "the wanderer." We wish THE TRUTH SEEKER friends, one and all, a very happy new year, and hope to meet many of them soon at Liberal. One has no time to get lonesome here; we keep something on the "boards" most of the time. We hav our dramatic club, dancing club, library, singing, and benefit meetings. We meet at some private house, and each will write a subject on a slip of paper, and the slips are thrown into a hat, mixed up, and then each draws out in turn any subject he or she may happen to get; they then speak upon the subject five minutes. This givs the ladies, and those not accustomed to speaking, a means of development, and is also very amusing and instructiv.

Yours fraternally, S. PARIS DAVIS.

JAVA VILLAGE, N. Y., Jan. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5—$3 of which is to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year. The other day I found a postal which you sent me stating that your paper was $3, instead of $2, which was the amount I sent. I reckoned on the basis of fifty cents per quarter. I see that you credit me on your paper for a full year; but as yours is not an orthodox paper, it teaches me no way to cheat you out of it, and get God to credit me with it.

I should like to ask a few questions through the columns of your paper: 1. Has there ever been any way discovered by which thought, mind, or spirit, as they see fit to call it, can be produced without an activ brain and body? 2. If there is a way, what is it? And if there is none, how do they manage to ship the spirit off to heaven, or hell, or anywhere else, when the body and brain hav ceased to act? I should like to know how it is done, and perhaps some brother Spiritualist, or any one else who claims to know, will inform me.

Yours truly, BENJAMIN WHALEY.

THE SERPENT-RODS, OR BATTLE OF THE GODS.

SOLEBURY, PA., NOV. 27, 1881.

"They cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents; but Aaron's rod swallowed up their rods" (Exodus vii, 12).

MR. EDITOR: Permit me, if you please, to cast my mite, with other mites, to your valuable paper, being an individualized entitity among the many entities, and formed, as I conceive, from the atomical substance of the universe, from whence all perceptible matter has its being, according to the laws of nature.

I will now proceed to answer, according to my view, the puzzling query, "Is there a God?" This query, taking into consideration the many reputed gods and saviors of mankind, reminds me of the Hibernian's reply when asked for the number and names of his brothers: "Well, sir, I hav fourteen brothers, and they are all named Bill, but Bob, and his name is Tom."

There's lords many, and gods many,
Like the Hibernian's pun;
Or, like the figure of the rods,
They center all in one—
One stupendous mighty whole,
Circumference like the air,
Existing perfect in itself,
With center everywhere.
Science laws they govern cause,
In all the realms of nature;
They form the orbs that roll in space,
And every tiny creature;
Hence all matter has its being.
As we may plainly see,
Formed from ever-working power,
As fruit developed from a tree.
When science laws are understood,
Mankind will then applaud
The power of the universe—
The one eternal God—
And sleep no longer in a name,
Belonging to tradition,
Of the saints in creedal chains—
The chains of superstition.
When science knowledge shall be free
To all as ambient air,
Then the priests will cease to preach
And utter vocal prayer.
Till then free souls must labor on,
If they be thought as saucy,
To win the prize that is in store,
As said the poet Massey:
Triumph and toil are twins: and aye
Joy sees the cloud of sorrow,
And 'tis the martyrdom to-day,
Brings victory to-morrow."

E. W. ALLEN.

MILWAUKEE., OR., Dec. 21, 1882

MR. EDITOR: After a long hunt I hav found $3 in greenbacks, which I forward to apply on my TRUTH SEEKER account.

On the banks of the Willamette sat I musingly one day,
Watching its placid waters flowing majestically and gay;
Sat I there musing, musing, an eye cast o'er its waste,
Caught something in the distance that seemed to make some haste,
And as I nearer moved, I clearly could make out
A man was being swallowed, for I saw two legs stick out.

Some said it was a salmon in the act of swallowing man,
But that's not my opinion; I hav another plan.
Although the salmon's a big fish, the idea we will snub,
For in these mountain waters it seldom partakes of grub.
But it's my real opinion old Jonah and his whale,
For to surprise the world anew concluded to take a sail.

And starting for the center, the hub of all the world,
He sailed up the Willamette; now the mystery's unfurled.
It's well to keep eyes open and look for more anon,
For Arab Noah and his old ark is sure to come along.
The way I'm doing it's all been done, the religion of to-day,
The story started first for fun, which moves us now to pray.

Yours truly, BORDER RUFFIN.

UNION IS STRENGTH.

CINCINNATI, O., Jan. 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: At the beginning of the present year the great body of Materialists should unite and become as one man, and work together with a resolute zeal worthy of so true and noble a cause. The great masses of people are floundering along with a dead weight of clerical creeds, dogmas, and meaningless superstitions, with all its ponderous expense and lecherous suckers. Is it not time for free minds to act? Is it not time for every sincere Materialist to show his real colors, and step to the front with his co-workers, and boldly attack the sly and hypocritical bigots and dogmatic bummers, and cause them to lose their grip on the credulous multitudes? Religions of all kinds are impostures, and the people should know this, and refuse to sustain them with money. All the clerical drones of the whole world could not supply one moment of life, and death is final against the power of one hundred gods. This world is our all, and outside thereof nothing. Therefore the jargon and twaddle about another world is the most ridiculous and farcical buncombe. As Materialists, let us try to block the way; then the wheels of superstition must stop, and millions of people be largely benefited thereby.

A squeamish Infidel should be unknown. Every one should be cool and brave, and never shun the inventors and perpetrators of pious frauds and shams. Therefore, my brother Materialists, fight superstition, wherever found. T. WINTER.

FLINT, MICH., Dec. 30, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith send you five dollars, which please credit as follows: two dollars for arrearages, and three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1882. I could not well do without the paper, although money is rather hard to catch onto just now. I would like very much to send you five dollars more for the Round-the-World trip, but must wait for better financial conditions to do this. The letters are very interesting, and well worthy of an extensiv reading.

I sent you two new subscribers the past year, and am in hopes to do better for the year 1882. May success crown all your efforts for the right and the truth, and may you in due time reap the full measure of reward that your sacrifices so well merit.

During the past year I hav noticed in your columns some quite spirited letters on Materialism vs. Spiritualism. And since they hav failed to clear up the mist, and hav seemed careful about staking out the divide, I would like to ask that some one more fine in the distillation of thought come out squarely and tell me through your columns just where to draw the line. They hav all affirmed that matter is not inert, and if that is so, then matter can only be rationally considered in its correlation or connection with the spirit or life principle of the same. And since every manifest of the spirit, so-called, requires this correlation to make it visible to our senses, I am led to ask, What are the true meanings of these words? Again, as they hav asserted that "something can't be nothing, and nothing is not," are not all these generic forces and variegated powers so co-allied, yet as separately and analytically considered, but qualitate properties of matter?

Ism, when affixed to a word, implies philosophy—a method of thought, a certain line of reasoning—and in so considering these two subjects I am wholly at a loss to know how to think the one independent of the other, and together only under the observed comparativ law of relativs, whether tangible or intangible. To my mind as yet matter and spirit are so closely allied as to preclude all possible separation; in fact, but different forms of matter; the one so ethereal as to require the grosser to make a tangible or visible manifest. There is, no doubt, a possible limit to man's think, the finite within its radius, the infinit always beyond. Yet as we grow into the realm of the latter in the work of to-day, it becomes the substantiv for to-morrow's research, etc. And yet if I should ask, What the think and its genesis? but few would be hasty in responding. But I will tease you with but the one query now, simply to know where the line is to be drawn between the two recognized isms, for as yet I am of the opinion that these conjoint philosophies are really but one, and form the basis and baptismal fount for all truth.

This being your first letter from Flint, I will add, we hav a nice, enterprising, little town situated on Flint river at the junction of the G. T. and F. P. M. railroad; population, ten thousand; manufactures, principally lumber, wool, and cotton. Good hotels, schools, and churches. Of the latter we hav nine, representing eight different routes to the "kingdom come" and "city of many mansions."

Liberal thought, however, is gaining ground. C. Fanny Allyn is now discoursing with people here and exciting some thought. She is a ready talker. Her discourses and arguments are very logical and reasonable. She speaks impromptu on subjects given by the audience. Bros. Jno. H. Burnham and M. Babcock are expected with us for one Sunday in January.

Asking pardon for this lengthy intrusion, I will close. Fraternally yours, WM. R. ALGER.

SOUTH BARRE, N. Y., Jan. 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find my dues for the past year. Am sorry to be so tardy, when we know you need every dollar in advance for the paper. Hard as it may be to raise the money, the paper we must hav as long as we liv, and it is published. We hope the old hero will liv to circumnavigate the globe and return to wife and friends again; yet we do not think it worth while to spend our time in prayer to God for his safe return, but rather depend upon his environments or surroundings. We hav recently had a big job of prayer in the case of President Garfield, and, as usual, nothing came of it but great expense and loss of time.

O human folly, when will people cease to be so blind? Never, as long as led by popes or priests If the interest on the money spent for what is called religion was spent for THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal, Spiritual, and scientific books and papers, including T. B. Wakeman's "Scientific Gospels," and their doctrins read and put into practice, it would develop our manhood and womanhood. We should then be in search of truth, with some prospect of obtaining a small portion of an endless amount of truth and fact yet unknown to this age. I shall want the big book "Around the World." I lost one a colporteur gave me once, which, if I remember, said something about the world—that it was flat, and made in a hurry, and such like. I did not think much of it for truth. M. B. DELANO.

Is It Come?

"Is it come?" they said on the banks of the Nile
Who look for the world's long-promised day,
And saw but the stride of Egypt's toil
With the desert's sands and the granit gray;
From pyramid, temple, and treasured dead,
We vainly ask for her wisdom's plan;
They tell of the slave and tyrants dread,
Yet there was hope when that day began.
The Chaldee came with his starry lore,
That built up Babylon's crown and creed;
And bricks were stamped on the Tigris's shore
With signs which our sages scarce can read.
From Ninus's temple and Nimrod's tower
The rule of the old East's empire spread,
Unreasoning faith and unquestioned power;
But still, "Is it come?" the watcher said.
The light of the Persian's worshiped flame
On ancient bondage its splendor threw;
And once on the West a sunrise came,
When Greece to her freedom's trust was true.
With dreams to the utmost ages dear,
With human gods and godlike men,
No marvel the far-off day seemed near
To eyes that looked through her laurels then.
The Roman conquered, and reveled too,
Till honor and faith and power were gone;
And deeper old Europe's darkness grew,
As wave after wave the Goth came on.
The gown was learning, the sword was law,
The people served in the oxen's stead;
But ever some gleam the watcher saw,
And ever more, "Is it come?" they said.
Poet and seer that question caught
Above the din of life's fears and frets;
It marched with letters—it toiled with thought,
Through schools and creeds which the earth forgets;
And statesmen trifle, and priests deceive,
And traders barter our world away;
Yet hearts to that golden promis cleave,
And still, at times, "Is it come?" they say.
The days of the nations bear no trace
Of all the sunshine so far foretold;
The cannon speaks in the teacher's place,
The age is weary with work and gold;
And high hopes wither and memories wane;
On hearths and altars the fires are dead;
"And has our faith but lived in vain?"
But this is all that our watcher said.

REPLY.

Watcher, What of the Night?

The Nazarene came with the cross and crown,
And the Jewish altars were laid in the dust,
And a new light, 'twas said, o'er the nations was thrown—
A light that would giv the promised rest,
So said the preacher, but the watcher saw
Naught but contention and armed men;
The earth still reeling with passion and war,
And the world still in arms even now as then.
Next came Mohammed with crescent and sword,
And an Eden of bliss was promised then
To all who accepted his one true lord;
The nation's false gods they were to condemn.
Then the watcher he pondered and drew aside
The veil that so long had his vision obscured,
To see the new doctrins spread far and wide,
One God worshiped and his prophet adored.
Straight the Nazarene's followers took the alarm—
A war was commenced. 'Twas a holy war;
Their standard, the cross, was a powerful charm
The Christians to rally from countries afar,
Their leader a hermit, a Christian austere,
Blinded with zeal for the Christian creed;
Their watchword, the holy sepulcher,
Where tradition reported their prophet was laid.
Thus the watcher saw that the promised rest
With the saints on earth was glorious war,
Christian, like Moslem, fighting his best,
Giving blow for blow, and scar for scar.
Then the watcher grew weary and sad at heart,
And doubted the story so often told,
Of a people saved—an infallible chart
To conduct the sheep to the shepherd's fold.
Thus the watcher continued his weary round,
As the the seasons waned and the years rolled by,
But still there came neither sign nor sound
In response to the watcher's weary cry,
Still the watcher stood at his post, and cried,
"What of the night?" as he did of old.
And the voice of science at once replied,
That their age of rest was greed and gold.
That prophets prophesy, and preachers preach,
Only against gold when beyond their reach.

Book Notices.

[From the Chicago Times.]

"THE PYRAMID OF GIZEH" is the title of a little brochure by Van Buren Denslow, LL.D., of this city, which has just been issued in New York. Much, possibly all, of the matter has appeared before in the columns of some newspaper or periodical, but this is the first time it has appeared together. It professes to discuss the relation of ancient Egyptian civilization to the Hebrew narrativs in Genesis and Exodus, and the relativ claims of Moses and the pyramid to inspiration. The latter clause of this sentence is rather an odd way of putting the matter, since probably Moses and certainly the pyramid, hav never made any claim to inspiration. Mr. Denslow himself rather strongly insists upon the fact that there is not even a hieroglyphic asserting or claiming anything to be found on or in the pyramid. Some hav probably claimed a sort of inspiration for the builder, but a moment's thought will show that the only possible object or purpose of inspiration is the communication of knowledge which cannot in its nature be otherwise conveyed. It is a curious way to communicate information to lock it up in a vast pile of stone, the very object of whose existence shall be a standing mystery to the whole race for thousands of years. Of course Mr. Denslow does not subscribe to the inspiration theory, and it is mentioned because it seems beneath the dignity of so incisiv a thinker to consider it at all. The location, character. dimensions, and the various theories of the purpose and meaning of the huge structure are discussed with abundant evidence of wide reading and shrewd, critical thinking. The author has plainly studied closely the works of pretty much all the Egyptologists and all the Hebrew literature relating to Egypt and the Israelitish captivity there, and criticises them all with the ease and freedom that come of thorough familiarity. He can scarcely be said to announce any affirmativ results except that the pyramid is a huge mystery which nobody has yet found a key to, but among the negativ results of his researches he practically holds that the whole story of the sale of Joseph into Egypt, his rise to power, the long captivity of the Jewish people, and their final deliverance, is simply a Hebrew novel—"only this and nothing more." This little work may not convince anybody of anything beyond its author's capacity to write a pungent and learned paper, but it certainly is good proof of that.

"THE RADICAL PULPIT."—A pulpit of this kind is the best that can be got up, and in the one before us we hav a number of discourses on interesting topics by O. B. Frothingham and Felix Adler. These lectures are very able and Liberal, and as all their discourses are of a high order of merit, their friends will read this collectiou of sermons with much interest and satisfaction.

"THE GODLY WOMEN OF THE BIBLE."—This volume of 345 pages, written by an "Ungodly Woman of the Nineteenth Century," as the author styles herself, is a history of the more prominent women of the Bible, or those whom the clergy and church hold up as patterns and models of the female sex. "An Ungodly Woman" is strictly Biblical in her biographies, but no Liberal can read them without concluding that the women of to-day, though they can be improved some, no doubt, are yet very far superior in every commendable respect to the "godly women" of the Bible. As with men so with women; they improve with the increase of knowledge and the advantages growing out of a wiser and a better civilization. The above two volumes are published by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth st., New York.

[From the Liberal (Mo.) Liberal.]

IT is wonderful with what rapidity the land is being filled with Freethought books—all good, all to the point, and many very excellently composed. Among the good books just issued by the publishing house of D. M. Bennett is "The Godly Women of the Bible," by "An Ungodly Woman of the Nineteenth Century." This book presents, for the first time, the godly women of the Bible in their true light to the public.

In the introduction she touches Eve, the snake, God, and the apple, thusly: "Oh, that accursed apple! what has it not cost us! O Eve! thou mother of all living, what a powerful being wert thou, since thou didst change the decrees of almighty God; since thou (and the serpent) didst pervert the whole order of nature, turn topsy-turvy all God's work, upset his infinit, divine plans, thwart his best-made schemes, putting him to his wit's ends, compelling him to pause just where he stood and begin again and do his work all over. What a power in one snake and one woman!

"'Earth felt the wound, and Nature from her seat,
Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe
That all was lost.'

"O snake, how couldst thou do this? how couldst thou encourage in thy wicked heart a desire to overthrow thy God? O woman! O man! behold thy work! the work we are called to contemplate in these histories of the godly women of the Bible, without whom the Hebrew records would be incomplete, a savior unknown, and man unredeemed."

WE hav before us a most excellent book, "The Radical Pulpit," by O. B. Frothingham and Prof. Felix Adler, which is simply grand. Prof. Adler in one of his lectures, says: "What we desire we hav declared; a religion so plain and clear that the most simple understanding shall grasp it, so strong in its commands that the most obdurate heart shall own its swaydom, and yet so high and pure that the elite of mankind—those choice, rare souls that dwell upon the hights of humanity, shall own it as their religion; nay, shall declare in humility that the scope of its demands far transcends what even they can ever hope to accomplish. And we hav found what we desire. We are like men who hav discovered a great treasure and who go about and again and again publish the news of their good fortune. We are like men who hav been tossed on the mad sea and who now stand on the rocks, whence the surges can no more dash them. We are like men who hav feared the loss of some dear friend, and to whom their friend has been given back, even from the brink of death. All this hav we endured. We hav been tossed on the mad sea of doubt; we hav seen the friendliest influence of human life in jeopardy—our trust in the good. If they ask you of our religion, tell them, the pursuit of justice, purity, love—this is it." In one of Frothingham's, on the "Language of the Old and New Testament," the philologist says at once a book containing such words could not hav been written by Moses, for he could not hav employed words which only came into use five or six hundred years after he died.

"VOLTAIRE IN EXILE," by Benj. Gastineau, contains many good things. Although the church apostrophized him as a firebrand of hell, tool of Satan, oldest son of his Plutonic majesty, miscreant of the damned, and with other sweet sonorous names, he said, did, and wrote things that liv in the hearts of a grateful and appreciativ world, when his malignance will rest in the tomb of oblivion. Voltaire was usually logical, always satirical and witty. Speaking of the devil, he says: "They speak to you of the evil one, they frighten you with the mere name of the devil because they want to hav you believe that devils are the most wicked, mean, and frightful of beings. But our painters deceive themselvs when on their canvas they represent devils as monsters frightful to see; they deceive themselvs, I say, and deceive you, as also do your sermonizers, when in their pictures or sermons they make them appear to you so homely, hideous, and misshapen. They should rather, both painters and preachers, represent them to you as these fine grandees and nobles all—as these fine ladies and young damsels whom you see so well tricked up, so well dressed, curled, and scented, and so dazzling with gold, silver, and precious stones. The devils which your preachers and painters sketch for you and represent under such homely and monstrous forms and countenances are certainly no more than imaginary devils who could only frighten children or ignorant boors, and who could only inflict imaginary evil on those who bear them. But these he and she-devils, these ladies and fine gentlemen of whom I speak to you, are certainly not imaginary, they are really visible, they must assuredly know how to inspire fear, and the evil they do to the poor is most undeniably real and palpable."

WE also hav some very interesting pamphlets. One is about "The Pyramid of Gizeh," by Van Buren Denslow, LL.D., of Chicago. Speaking of the grandeur of the pyramid, he says: "The tourist of to-day moves among the pillars of the temple of Carnac, sixty feet high and thirty feet in circumference, yet rising on either hand through long corridors of columns, as if they were but saplings growing in the nurseries of the gods; and leaves them with the mental query, What motiv ever induced this mighty race to sacrifice its nerve and muscle, blood and life, so prodigally, so wastefully, upon these altars of stone? When St. Peter's at Rome shall hav crumbled to dust; when Macaulay's 'New Zealander' shall hav climbed up the archless turrets of London Bridge to sketch the moldering ruins of St. Paul's; when men shall look on ancient maps for the outlines of what was once the American republic—supposing this republic to endure like that of Rome, for thirteen centuries—even then the sphinx will look out in stony mystery upon the Lybian desert, and the tourist will find the pyramids as difficult a riddle as they are to-day, but essentially as perfect in their preservation."

"SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY, ANCIENT AND MODERN," is the title of a sprightly pamphlet by James Anthony Froude. He says: "Religion had been the curse of the earth, and though fools might still torture themselvs with a belief in it if they so pleased, Lucretius, speaking the very inmost conviction of the imperial Roman mind, informed them that religion was a phantom begotten of fear and ignorance. The universe, of which man was a part, was a system of things which had been generated by natural forces. God there might be somewhere in space, created by nature also, but not gods who troubled themselvs about men. All things proceeded from eternity in one unchanging sequence of cause and effect, and man had but to understand nature and follow her directions to create his own happiness undisturbed by fear of supernatural disturbance. If the sufferings and enjoyments of this world were distributed by a superintending providence, it was a providence which showed no regard for moral worth or worthiness. The good were often miserable, the wicked flourished, and a power so careless of justice, even if it existed, did not deserve to be reverenced. But it existed only in the brain of man. Evils, or what were called evils, were a necessary part of an imperfect existence. But evil was disarmed of half its power to hurt when its origin was known, and the more carefully the laws of nature were studied, the more successfully man could contend against it."

[From House and Home, N. Y.]

The Afflicted.

Disease is an effort of nature to get rid of impurities. Did every one liv properly and obey strictly the laws of health, disease would be an impossibility in all populated countries. Unfortunately we all deviate from the course of health in some way, and by our habits of eating, drinking, sleeping, and clothing as fashion rather than nature dictates, we predispose our bodies to disease. The physician then becomes a necessity. The innocent often contract certain diseases by contagion, but whether from neglect of their own, or infection, nature must be helped to rid the system of disease, or death ensues. To prevent death and aid nature is the physician's work. It is with pleasure that we are able to advise our readers, if any of them should suffer from any disease specified (see advertisment in another column), to consult Dr. Fellows. We never praise because an advertisment is given us, but solely because we hav evidence of genuinness and good faith. Dr. Fellows is no charlatan, but an honest, straightforward, able physician, whose career has been blessed by thousands of cures, and whose very name is loved by thousands.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authorit of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progres and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which man kind are capable of receiving.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an which is the Doctor's latest and greatest med discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful plaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; o upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had becou bolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernie (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be good and state in what paper you saw this.

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY:

Ancient and Modern.

By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE.

Gems of Thought.

YOU acknowledge that the whole Bible is not true, useful, or good, for you only preach certain portions of it. You pick out parts of "God's word" and silently ignore the rest of it. There are whole pages you could not be hired to read to your audiences. There are passages and texts you never dream of quoting, and if asked to preach from them you thrust into them meanings never intended by the writer. You quibble, re-translate, and improve God's word till you get it in some unrecognizable shape, and then call it divine!—Elmina D. Slenker.

IT is quite impossible to resist a feeling of sadness sometimes, as we sit in a great and brilliant assembly of people and think how short the time will be ere every one, the youngest, brightest, fairest, as well as the most venerable, will hav vanished from the sight and even from the memory of men. But, unless we are thoroughly selfish, a deeper sadness would afflict us if we knew that there could be no others come to take our places. The thoughts which robs death of its enmity is that when we are gone, others as full of life as we will swarm into our places. Death is impartial distribution. What it stands for is "the greatest good of the greatest number." Though there should be no other life in store for us, we should be willing to move on and make room for the new comers.—J. W. Chadwick.

IF thou art worn and hard-beset
With sorrows, that thou wouldst forget,
If thou wouldst forget read a lesson, that will keep Thy heart from fainting and thy soul from sleep,
Go to the woods and hills! No tears
Dim the sweet look that nature wears.
—Longfellow.

WHETHER a heathen, to whom the light of the gospel was never made known, can be saved by obeying the law of reason, and whether salvation be attainable in such Christian societies as are generally corrupt in very important doctrins, are questions to which our Savior would hav replied, "What is that to thee? Follow thou me!" But one thing is very certain, that no man can be saved who does not sufficiently endeavor to find out the truth for himself; who wilfully propagates known errors, and has no solicitude to reform his own vices, and (as far as lies in his power) the vices of his companions and friends.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

CONSIDERING all the heresies, the enormous crimes, the wickedness, the astounding follies which the Bible has been made to justify, and which its indiscriminate reading has suggested; considering that it has been, indeed, the sword which our Lord said he was sending; and that not the devil himself could hav invented an implement more potent to fill the hated world with lies, and blood, and fury; I think, certainly, that to send hawkers over the world loaded with copies of this book, scattering it in all places, among all persons . . . is the most culpable folly of which it is possible for man to be guilty.—J. A. Froude.

IF I owe a person money and cannot pay him, and he threatens to put me in prison, another person can take the debt upon himself and pay it for me; but if I hav committed a crime, every circumstance of the case is changed. Moral justice can not take the innocent for the guilty, even if the innocent would offer itself. To suppose justice to do this is to destroy the principle of its existence, which is the thing itself; it is then no longer justice; it is indiscriminate revenge.—Paine's Age of Reason.

IF you are ashamed of rational religion, go back to the leeks and onions of the traditional faith.—Chadwick.

IF Christians would teach Infidels to be just to Christianity they should themselvs be just to Infidelity. It can do truth no services to blink the fact, known to all who hav the most ordinary acquaintance with literary history, that a large portion of the noblest and most valuable moral teaching has been the work, not only of men who did not know but of men who knew and rejected the Christian faith.—Mill's Liberty.

THANKS to thee, O death; there is never any lack of little children in the world; never any lack of boys and girls; never any lack of fresh young minds trying anew to solve the old, old problems; never any lack of fresh young hearts to thrill with the old, old rapture; never any lack of fresh intelligence and curiosity and will; never any lack of men and women, in their full-orbed maturity, ready and glad to grapple with the tasks and questions of their day. O death, thou art the life-giver, the health-giver, the joy-giver! We will sing praises to thy great and holy name. But for thee how stale, flat, and unprofitable would be all the uses of this world! And, thanks to thee, what everlasting freshness, what perennial love and joy and strength abound!—J. W. Chadwick.

OH! what would the world be to us,
If the children were no more?
We should dread the desert behind us
Worse than the dark before.
What the leaves are to the forest,
With light and air for food,
Ere their sweet and tender juices
Hav been hardened into wood—
That to the world are children;
Through them it feels the glow
Of a brighter and sunnier climate
Than reaches the trunks below.
—Longfellow's Children.

SEEN in the light of universal order, we see that death is no fatality, no accident. We see that death is just as natural as life; that it is a necessity of the human organism; that there is a time to die; that when this time arrives death is a relief from pain and weariness; no enemy, but a most true and tender friend.—J. W. Chadwick.

DUNCAN is in his grave:
After life's fitful fever he sleeps well;
Treason has done his worst; nor steel nor poison,
Malice domestic, foreign levy, nothing,
Can touch him further! —Shakspere.

THE New York plumbers are to hav a paper. Probably one of the craft was called to mend a pipe in a newspaper office and has taken the establishment for his bill.

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES hates slang, and will not listen to it. He has even been known to leave when a Sunday-school song was sung to the tune of "Swanee River."

"THE only way to put an end to the innumerable suicides which occur in France every year," said a speaker in the Assembly, "is to make the act a capital offense, punishable with death."

THE vessel that always accompanies a courtship is a "smack." The course of love, by the way, may be full of craft, and the tug comes after marriage, when, if the husband chance to be a little fleet, the wife's happiness is frequently disturbed by the too frequent sail of the schooner.

A NEWS item in a country weekly says a neighbor "is building a three-story hen-house for his chickens with skylights." That's right. Such thoughtfulness is commendable. If any fowls deserve to liv in a three-story hen-house it is chickens with skylights. They are valuable, and should be carefully protected.

THE boys were being examined in astronomy. When it came the visitors' turn to put questions, somebody asked what the constellation in which the Pointers are located is called. The infant phenomenon of the class promptly answered, "The Great Dipper." "Why is it called the Great Dipper?" asked another visitor. "Because the gods used it to take a drink out of the Milky Way," responded the phenomenon.

Coming down in joy,
Each a sparkling diamond
To the happy boy.
See his mother bang him

AN entirely new scheme has been developed by the ladies of Washington. They hav organized themselvs into "Guardian Angels," for the purpose of warning such Congressmen as drift over the line of moderate drinking into the sphere of guzzling. What could be more pleasant than for one to find a little note like this on his desk? "To the Honorable Member from Podunk: My dear sir, it becomes my painful duty to warn you that if you are as drunk to-night as you were last night, a postal card will be forwarded to your family. With deep solicitude, YOUR GUARDIAN ANGEL."

A GOOD many years ago, when a certain place in Texas was a very small town, quite a number of prominent citizens went out on a hunting expedition. One night, when they were all gathered around the camp fire, one of the party suggested that each man should giv the time of and reason for his leaving his nativ state and coming to Texas, whereupon each one in turn told his experience. Judge Blank had killed a man in self-defense, and left Arkansaw, Gen. So-and-So had forged another man's signature to a check, while another came to Texas on account of his having two wives. The only man who did not make any disclosures was a sanctimonious-looking old man, who was usually called "parson."

"Well, parson, why did you leave Kentucky?"

"I don't care to say anything about it. Besides, it was only a trifle. None of you would believe me anyhow."

"Out with it! Did you shoot anybody?"

"No, gentlemen, I did not. As you want to know so bad, I'll tell you. I left Kentucky because I did not build a church."

Deep silence fell on the group. No such excuse for coming to Texas had ever been heard of before. There was evidently an unexplained mystery at the bottom of it. The Parson was called on to furnish more light.

"Well, gentlemen, you see a congregation raised $3,000 and turned it over to me to build a church—and I didn't build the church. That's all."

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

A LADY at New Cross, England, a few days ago, died while saying her prayers. The jury found a verdict of "Death from the visitation of God." Why was not the murderer committed for trial?

SPURGEON boasts of his "Calvinism, out-and-out Calvinism," and says that "John Calvin was the greatest divine that ever lived." We suppose he was especially divine when he roasted Servetus to death.

A CONNECTICUT jury set aside a will which had been made by a Spiritualist. The ground of this verdict was that a person who is a Spiritualist is necessarily insane. The parties interested in the will appealed the case, one of the chief grounds of appeal being that the jury was composed chiefly of Congregational deacons who were prejudiced against Spiritualism.

IT is a mere waste of space for the Chicago Herald to say, "The Deacon Smith of Manayunk, Pa., who was arrested for kissing a pretty girl on the public street without her permission, must not be confounded with the truly good Deacon Smith of the Cincinnati Gazette, out on a lark." And it is wanton and brutal in the Herald to add, "The truly good deacon was never known to kiss a pretty girl more publicly than behind a hall door."

WHEN the Dunkers of Indiana made up their minds that the study of grammar was frivolous, they protested against their children being taught it in the public schools. The teachers refused to be bound by the protest, whereupon an appeal was made to the superintendent, who has decided that teachers may omit the offensiv study. He insists, however, that they shall impart orally to all Dunker pupils "all that is practical on the subject."

A NEWLY-MARRIED pair on their wedding tour stopped at the Hotel Bennett on Friday, and, being given a room, were escorted to the elevator. After viewing the interior of the little room in the elevator, the groom stepped out and asked the clerk if he took him for a greenhorn. The clerk replied in the negativ. "Then giv me a room with a bed in it," replied the unsophisticated young man. Matters were explained, and the elevator shot upward to the the third story.—Binghamton Leader.

BROTHER CONWAY, of Brooklyn, strikes back at Brother Fulton, and makes sundry unpleasant allegations about the pastor. Conway compares his case to that of a Louisiana negro who was before a colored judge. The defendant's attorney offered both law and evidence to prove his client's innocence. The judge replied: "No use ob law an' evidence, sah; de court is agin you." Conway says that Fulton managed the church meeting much after the fashion in which this judge held court. Feeling rages very high over the matter between the adherents of the contending parties.

LAST month the wife of Adelbert Dewey, a well-to-do farmer of Chautauqua county, New York, was taken sick with fever. Dewey would not hav a doctor. He said that the sickness was sent upon his wife as a judgment on his sins, and she could only recover through his doing penance and praying for forgivness. Edward Dewey, his father; Joseph Luce, William Luce, and Elder Collins, neighbors of the farmer, agreed with him. The five men surrounded the sick woman's bed, and for five days remained in constant prayer for her recovery. None of them took nourishment during the time, and gave no care or attention to the wants of the sick woman, who was raging with delirium. At the end of three days other neighbors forced their way into the house, and Dewey was arrested and placed under bonds to giv his wife proper care. She died soon afterward. Dewey is to be held responsible for her death.

AARON KING and Joseph Edwards, colored murderers, were yesterday cleansed of their sins by the sacrament of baptism. The baptismal ceremony took place in the jail, with the Rev. Mr. Lewis and a deacon of his church officiating. In the cell there are two bath-tubs, which were specially filled with water for the occasion. The two men knelt down in the tubs, and the minister pressed upon the heads of the neophytes and pushed them backward until their entire bodies were covered with water while the words were being pronounced. The ceremony over, the two men came forth.—St. Louis Republican.

THE St. Gothard tunnel is now daily traversed by eight trains, four each way. Touching solidity of construction, the tunnel leaves nothing to be desired. The official inspectors express themselvs perfectly satisfied with the condition of the work. Particular attention was paid to the windy stretch, which has caused so much trouble and given rise to so many fears, but the massive granit masonry with which this part of the passage is stayed seems admirably adapted to its purpose, and shows no sign of yielding to the immense pressure that weighs upon it. The ventilation is good, and no inconvenience was experienced from the temperature. The tunnel is lighted with lamps placed about two hundred rods apart.

THE Chicago Sabbath Association formally requested the publishers of the newspapers to use their influence to stop the noise made by newsboys on Sunday mornings. The Times declares itself "most earnestly, unalterably, and ferociously opposed to everything in the nature of needless noises on Sunday." But it takes the occasion to put forward the following theory: "It cannot be supposed that the members of the Sabbath committee are so inappreciativ as to think the musical notes with which the newsboys arouse sluggards from their sleep on Sunday morning deserve to be called noise. They resemble, rather, in their dulcet cadences and pious use, the Turkish muezzin's call to prayer. Let the committee remember how many pious but drowsy Christians would inevitably doze in bed through the hours of morning service in church every Sunday but for the newsboys' cheery summons, and they will applaud rather than condemn so important an aid to piety."

AROUND some of the parsonage houses of England may yet be seen enormous barns dating from the time when tithes were paid in kind. The author of "Not Many Years Ago" relates some stories about this period which few now generally recall. His father, a farmer, sent a polite message to the rector that he intended to gather his apples, and thought the yield promised some fifty bags; he would, therefore, if the rector pleased, send six. But the rector preferred sending his man to watch, who, therefore, appeared with a chair, table, and good supply of cider, and, after sitting in the orchard two days, carried back three bags. On another occasion some potatoes were taken up for dinner, and half an hour later a message came from the rector's daughter demanding the portion due of the potatoes taken up that morning. Every tenth day the rector sent to take the milk of the cows, and on those occasions the milker was not too careful to extract the last drop.

WAGONS loaded with the various products of Utah industries are constantly passing through the gate into the tithing house in Salt Lake. The Mormon law requires that one-tenth of all the things produced by the labor of the faithful shall be given to the church, and the compliance is in the main honest, though attempts at shirking are occasionally detected. The annual income from this source is kept a secret by the rulers, but has been estimated as high as $5,000,000, and undoubtedly reaches $3,000,000. "It is thought by the gentiles," says a correspondent of the Boston Herald, "and intimated by the saints themselvs, that a portion of the tithing fund has been employed, and very effectivly employed, in securing favorable legislation in the national Congress. The departed Brigham was wont to speak very contemptuously of Congress, boasting that he cared nothing for it, because he could influence its votes with money whenever he deemed it desirable. And there is reason to think that his boast was not wholly idle."

SOME time ago a man named Chesnut, while digging a well in Louisiana, found, sixty feet under the surface of the earth, what he supposed to be a wonderfully large bone of some wonderfully large animal. After excavating the jaw and tibia bones, the water rushed in upon him so rapidly that he was compelled to leave further investigations to time and curiosity. He succeeded, however, in bringing up with him the jaw and "shin" bones of the monster. It is almost incredible to speak of a jaw-bone three feet in length, yet such is the length of a part of a jawbone. The teeth are exactly like the teeth of a human, and the jawbone, in all its peculiarities, indicates that it belonged to some gigantic specimen of the family remotely and orthodoxly represented by Adam. Several physicians examined the bones, and declared their inability to name their origin. One prominent physician, the best anatomist probably in the state, after consulting works upon the subject, declared the bones to be those of a gigantic mastodon. Men, though, who hav visited the world's best anatomical museums, say that the jawbone does not resemble that of a mastodon, but that it is au enormous type of the human jawbone. The "shin" bone also is strikingly correct in comparison with the known bone of a human being.

Liberty reads this hard lesson to W. J. Colville, who performed the last rites over Laura Kendrick. Mrs. Kendrick was a Spiritualist, not a Christian, and Colville's remarks about "Christ Jesus" were insufferably impudent. No Spiritualist should snivel at the door of the church—no true Spiritualist would; but a mountebank might. Colville well deserves Mr. Tucker's castigation: "In another column of this issue is given our estimate of the life and character of an earnest fellow-worker recently taken from the ranks forever. It is written from our own standpoint, as it should be. But how far one who accepts the task of conducting an actual funeral ceremony is justified in flying in the face of the dearest beliefs of the deceased is another question which we are driven to consider by the action of W. J. Colville, the Spiritualist priest chosen to say the parting words over Laura Kendrick's coffin. He began the exercises by reading selections from the Bible which he knew to be in direct conflict with the teachings of her life. 'Blessed are the dead who die in Christ Jesus,' he began; 'The Lord is my shepherd,' he continued; and so on to the end. Laura Kendrick did not die in Christ Jesus, and would hav rebelled at the very thought. She died in her own glorious self. If, beyond the veil which separates us from the future, there is a judgment day when the damned are separated from the saved, Laura Kendrick, unescorted by any mediator, will walk straight, erect, and fearlessly into the presence of the great white throne, there to receive her sentence, confident in the power of her own virtues to achieve her own salvation. Nor was the Lord her shepherd. Her role through life was that of a shepherdess. She belonged to no flock, but tended many. And if, the other side the grave, there are green pastures and still waters, our word for it she will discover them unaided, and lead countless others to enjoy their benefits. Mr. Colville, by reading these passages, outraged her memory and insulted her friends; and nothing but the proprieties of the occasion saved him from being confronted with at least one rebuking protest on the spot. He cannot plead ignorance; he knew her too well for that. We can view his conduct only as a feeble imitation of the cowardly efforts long practiced by the Christian church to capture the Infidel dead."

A Truth Seeker Around the World.

Beyrout, Baalbec, and Damascus.—Concluded.

This temple stands on a lower plane than the other, and the columns are somewhat smaller, being over six feet in diameter and sixty-five feet high. There were forty-six of these columns originally, of which nineteen still remain, one having fallen against the cella, where it still stands in a leaning position. The portal of this temple must indeed have been beautiful. Incredible as it may appear, the door-posts are monoliths, ornamented most richly with foliage and genii. The architrave is of three stones, and on the lower side is the figure of the eagle, the emblem of the sun. The cella is one hundred feet by seventy, and is exceedingly rich in ornamentation; eight fluted half-columns are on either side, with niches in the spaces between, probably used for statues.

The circular temple, said to have been erected to Venus, is just without the massive walls which inclose the two large temples, and is a gem in the exterior, though there is nothing remaining in the interior to particularly attract attention. Eight Corinthian columns, each of which is a monolith, surround it, and a richly-executed frieze of flowers adorns the wall of the cella. The entablature is heavily laden with decoration. The Christians, down to a century ago, used this as a church. The smaller of the temples on the acropolis was also used by the Christians as a place of worship.

When the Romans possessed Syria, they held the temples of Baalbec as sacred, and probably rededicated them to their own gods; but when the bloody Constantine came to have power there, after he had become a convert to the new religion, with the zeal of a new convert he must, of course, endeavor to strike down the gods that had been worshiped there, and substitute the one he had adopted. He caused the magnificent works of art to be destroyed, and the statues to be demolished, as he did at Ephesus; and he caused a large basilica to be erected in Baalbec of the columns of porphyry and other costly stone taken from the temples described. The columns of this basilica are still standing. In view of the destruction of the fine work performed by men who lived centuries before his time, as well as for much else that he did, his name deesrves to be execrated by good men among all nations.

A SERMON IN THE TEMPLE.

Sunday, Nov. 13th.—Our tents were pitched within the walls of the Acropolis, in the very court of the large temple, and here at our leisure we can wander around among the old ruins, and look through the large rooms still surrounded by massive walls which tower up heavenward, as well as explore the vast subterranean arches and storehouses under the temples, which for ages have been used as places of safe deposit for valuables of all kinds. Grand thoughts are awakened here, and a profound veneration is aroused for the giants who once peopled this country.

Pursuant to an invitation extended last evening to the Rev. Mr. Getz to deliver a sermon to us, our little company assembled at half-past ten this morning in the old temple to hear him. As we have two preachers in our party it would seem that we ought to have a little preaching. I was feeling quite ill, but I deemed it best to show the courtesy to listen to him; besides, I had a curiosity to see what ability he possessed. The sermon was preceded by a long installment of the church of England service, and prayers, which under the circumstances became very tedious. After reading two chapters in the Bible the reverend gentleman read a sermon he brought with him from home, and which possibly he has delivered several times before. The text was from Paul, to the effect that "Christ is the Rock." The gentleman then started off with Moses and the children of Israel in their forty years' journey in the desert, and said that as Moses smote the rock at Horeb, and obtained living waters for the great number of people with him, so every day for the forty years he ministered directly to the people, and gave them the waters and the bread of life. He then took the position that the rock which Moses struck, and from whence living water flowed, was Christ; that Christ being eternal with the Father, was with Moses and the children of Israel during all their wanderings, and that it was Christ who guided and protected them all those years. This was the substance of his remarks.

I would like to have made a short reply to his remarks, but it would have been throwing a firebrand into our little camp, and would doubtless have made my traveling companions more or less unhappy. It is but right that I should consult their feelings, and not mar their happiness while on their journey to and through the "Holy Land." I should, however, have shown that no man has ever been able to find in Egypt, on papyrus or monuments, the slightest record that such a people as the Israelites ever lived in Egypt, that they ever escaped from the country, or that its king and army were overwhelmed in the Red Sea while pursuing them, though the Egyptians were a remarkable people to make a minute record of all the events that transpired in their country, including the crops raised on their farms, the number of fowls kept, and the number of eggs gathered. If such events as are told of Moses and the Israelites had ever occurred, the Egyptians would not have failed to have a full account of it.

I would next have shown that no explorer or traveler has ever been able to find any such rock as Moses is said to have brought a gushing stream of water from by hitting it a tap.

I should also have shown that there is an account of but two years of the wanderings of the Israelites given in the Bible, and that if it is true they were forty years in making the journey, there are thirty-eight that the Bible says nothing about. It is therefore the merest assumption to undertake to say what was done for those people during all those forty years. It is at least worthy of note that it is very strange that forty years should be required to make a journey of a hundred miles or so, which Joseph and his virgin wife and child were able to make in a few days, when fleeing from Herod. There is, however, one drawback about Joseph's journey to Egypt. Matthew is the only evangelist who said anything about it, and seems to have sent them there to fulfill a prophecy which was never made—"Out of Egypt have I called my son," which referred no more to Jesus than to Mohammed, Napoleon Bonaparte, or Joseph Smith. At the very time Matthew was hurrying Joseph, Mary, and Jesus off to Egypt, Luke safely ensconced them in Nazareth; and at the end of forty days took them to the temple in Jerusalem. If one told the truth the other certainly told an untruth; both cannot possibly be true.

I should have undertaken to show that if the rock of Horeb was a reality, it could not have been Jesus; nor is there the first word in all that has been written about that forty-year Israelitish journey to show that Jesus was there or had anything to do with it. If the Rev. Mr. Getz is correct in saying that Jesus was with the Israelites on that journey (whether he was the rock of Horeb or not), a very shabby trick was played upon Moses as well as upon all the patriarchs and prophets, for though they held such constant communion with Yahweh, and knew his will most intimately, they were kept entirely in the dark about the existence of Jesus. If he did have an existence prior to his conception, and if he was able to be a rock and produce a stream of water, then Moses was egregiously fooled, for he had not the slightest idea of it. John was the only evangelist who had a thought that Jesus had an existence previous to his conception, and that book was not written by John, but by some one in the last half of the second century to establish the Hindoo and Egyptian doctrine of a trinity as a Christian doctrine. The other three evangelists had no knowledge, and never even dreamed, that Jesus existed before he was begotten. The very idea of a person existing thousands of years before he was begotten is monstrously absurd. But the whole system is so full of absurdities and untruths that one can but be appalled at them.

A LITTLE ILLNESS.

In the afternoon I grew worse, and had a stubborn attack of diarrhea, with vomiting, amounting almost to cholera morbus, a disease to be feared in this oriental world. The cause was a subject of discussion; some thought it was the grapes I had eaten, but I do not. It is true only yesterday I bought a cluster of grapes of people who were gathering them by the roadside, and I ate them with a good relish; but it was no more than I had done on preceding days; in fact, I have eaten freely of grapes since I came upon the continent. Grapes never hurt me. I believe in them, and cannot think a single cluster of grapes brought on that attack of cholera morbus. I am much more inclined to think it was the excessive heat and my getting greatly fatigued, that were the causes. Be that as it may, I sent to the little apothecary store in the village and had a few pills made, containing a grain each of opium, camphor, and capsicum, and two or three gave relief, though the first I could not retain.

Monday, Nov. 14th.—I did not feel well enough this morning to undertake a three days' ride to Damascus over a very rough mountain road; and as Mrs. Judge Lawson, a lady about my own age, does not feel able to stand the ride, and has decided to wait here one day and take the diligence back to Shtora, and then the main diligence from Beyrout, I concluded to join her. We accordingly took our leave of the party in the camp and went to the Hotel de Palmyre in the village. She speaks French some, so we make out to be understood. I have spent the day in rest and fasting. I think more of these two remedies in curing many ills than of drugs or poisons. I am feeling better to-night.

Tuesday, Nov. 15th.—We were unable to leave to-day, as the seats in the diligence were all engaged. I was, however, quite content to remain here another day, for the quarters are very comfortable, and it is just as well to wait here another day as to have to wait for our party in Damascus. This hotel is kept by an Italian by the name of Pericly D. Mimikaki. He understands how to keep a hotel, and has been very attentive to us. If any of my readers should ever come to Baalbec let me recommend to them the Hotel de Palmyre; charges ten francs per day. I have spent considerable of the time to-day on the housetop in the sun; that is to say, on the top of the one-story part of the hotel, a portion only being of two stories. My room is in the second story, and it is perfectly easy to walk out upon the roof; and as the hotel is on the principal street, in sight of the bazars and most of the traffic of the town, I even sat there in the sun and did some reading and writing, for it has not been so warm to-day as to be uncomfortable, while rather cool in the shade. I was much amused to watch the manners of the people. Early this morning I saw some half a dozen calves being butchered in the street in front of the little meat shops; the blood was allowed to flow into the street, where there is no pavement. Soon the little stores were opened and the business of the day begun. Many sell a little grain or a few vegetables on the street, the same being carried on the back of a donkey. I could but observe how much noise it requires to transact a little business. The outcry made over a peck of grain, half a dozen fowls, or half a bushel of vegetables is almost deafening. It reminded me of the remark the devil is said to have made when he sheared the hog—"Great cry and little wool." The Syrians appear to be a quarrelsome people. Not less than half a dozen quarrels were gotten up to-day in the vicinity of my place on the housetop; they are, however, principally wars of words; the combatants shouted, gesticulated fearfully, and looked the fiercest kind of daggers at each other, and all the idle Syrians ran up to aid in the melée, but it blew over and nobody was hurt. I saw several Bedouins from the interior, and they certainly present a very villainous appearance. I watched several trains of camels tramping slowly by, carrying loads of different kinds, looking as grave and serious as old Time himself. The camel is not a frolicsome animal.

A WALK.

In the afternoon, feeling altogether better, I took a walk outside the town to what is called the fountain, which is a magnificent spring; enough water gushing out of the earth at the foot of Anti-Lebanon to run half a dozen mills, and the liquid as clear as crystal. It is this stream that makes a town here possible. As I followed along up the stream I stepped into several rude mills, where wheat is being ground by the water-power which the stream affords. The whole affair is very simple. The wheel is not an overshot nor an undershot, but a sort of side-shot; the shaft is upright, the paddles or arms of the wheels are horizontal, and the stream, being conducted so as to strike the side, of course makes it go round. The millstones are much like those used in our country; and the upper one rests on the shaft of the wheel, and goes around with it, but rather slowly. No curb is required, and the stones are naked, the flour falling quietly by the side of the lower stone. The hopper is suspended over the stones by cords, and the wheat runs in very slowly. As I was once a miller, I, of course, was interested in flour-making. The grinding I did, however, was drugs—roots, barks, and herbs—but I could dress a set of millstones right well.

Over the stream, on a level grass-plot, I saw several females sifting and cleaning something; and, wishing to learn what it was, I went to them and began to investigate. I found it was coarsely-ground wheat that had been cooked, and they were sifting it on large sheets, and spreading it to dry. It is quite an article of diet with the people of this country; upon asking them the name of it, I think they called it Yahma, or something that sounded like that. I tried to be sociable with them, but not being able to understand each other, we could not get on very well. They were very pleasant, and did not seem to regard my visit as an intrusion. They gathered around me, about twenty of them, from ten years of age to fifty, and some, of course, of a very interesting age. They seemed as much interested in me as I was in them, and I trust the admiration was mutual. Many of the girls were really good-looking, barring the dark complexion. Some had their faces uncovered, while others kept the yashmak constantly over the lower part of the face. I motioned them to remove it, but they chose not to; but what I lacked in seeing the face was made up in busts; I do not remember seeing so much bosom at any one time since a small child. They were not afraid of me, nor was I afraid of them; one examined my watch-chain, opened the locket attached to it, and, of course, wife's picture and my own had to be shown around; then the watch had to be seen and opened. Noticing they were fond of pictures, I showed them some photographs I had with me, at which they were very much pleased. I left a couple of my own with them, and bade them adieu. Some followed me quite a little distance.

Near the fountain is the ruin of an old temple, which was converted into a church, and afterward into a mosque, thus illustrating how one religion succeeds another. I followed down one of the streams from the large spring, and approached where some women appeared to be washing clothes. At seeing me approach they evinced displeasure, or alarm, and began shouting out, "Yarrah! Yarrah! Yarrah!" throwing up their arms as though they were driving geese. I know what yarrow is in our country, though not so well acquainted with the same in Arabic; but I inferred that it means, Go back, don't come this way, for they evidently did not wish a visit from me. Possibly some of them were en deshabille; but, however that might have been, not wishing to intrude, I yarrahed, and struck off to the left, up through a vineyard, to the summit of a hill four or five hundred feet high, where stands the ruins of a small temple, said to have been devoted to the worship of the sun, which was afterward used as a mosque, but now is unused, as the roof is gone. It is some fifteen or twenty feet square, and some ten feet from the ground the corners are drawn in so as to make an octagon, leaving niches inside for statues. Some fragments of carving and cut stone are lying around. I climbed to the top of the heavy wall which yet stands, and from thence I had a fine view of the town below, the piles of ruins, and the extensive valley extending north and south, as well as the two Lebanons, one on either side.

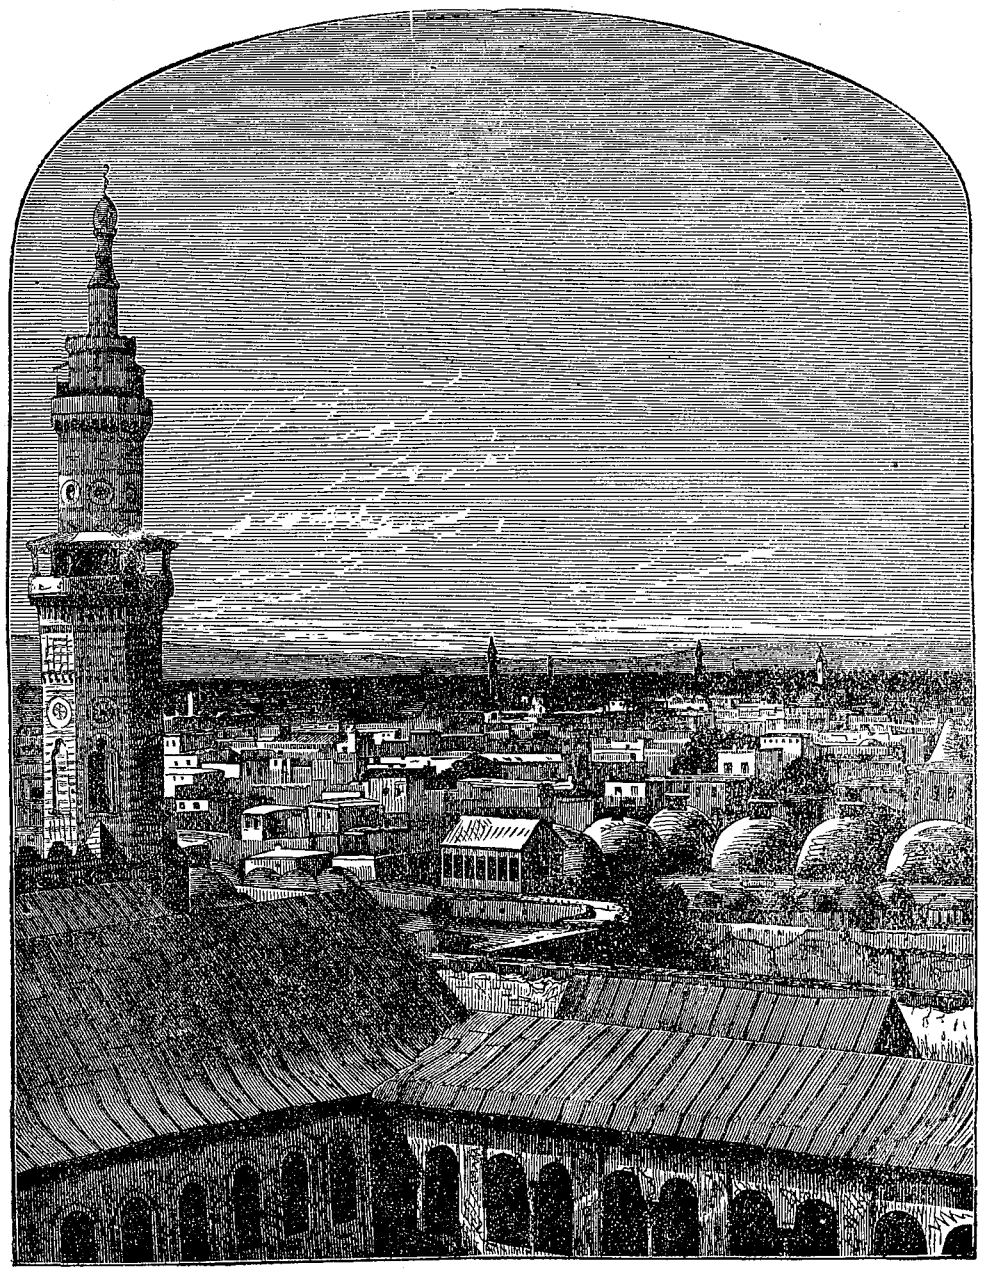
Some thirty or forty miles north of Baalbec are said to be some four hundred cedars, of all sizes, some of them thought to be very old, and large, though not tall; and those are all there are left of the mighty cedars of Lebanon, of which so much was said in olden times. Nearly all of the two Lebanons, as I have intimated, is entirely barren of trees.

Returning to the hotel, I visited, with Mrs. Lawson, the missionary school for girls which is conducted here under English auspices. Over the gateway is a sign reading in this way:

JEHOVAH–JIREH.

British-Syrian School for Girls.
Established in 1870
by Mrs. Bowen Thompson.

The sign looks as though Mr. Jireh, whose first name is Jehovah, ran the establishment. Some fifty or sixty girls attend the school, and are taught both Arabic and English. We were informed that the girls learn readily, and are pleased at doing so. I was given a specimen of penmanship of one of the girls, eleven years of age, written in Arabic, with a translation in English. The teachers are educated Syrian women. I noticed that needle-work is taught the scholars. Such schools are beneficial, though some errors are also taught.



We also visited the extensive old church, said to have been erected by order of Constantine. Many columns are here standing, taken from the old pagan temples on the acropolis. We then again visited, for the last time, the grand old ruins, which are most interesting; though not so much so as they would be were the history of them as well-known as is that of those at Athens and Rome.

ON TO DAMASCUS.

Wednesday, Nov. 16th.—We were called at 4 A.M., and, after taking an early breakfast, at five o'clock took the coach for Shtora. The diligence being fully engaged by a party of Spaniards who were on the Saturno with our party, we secured a private carriage by ourselves, which was more expensive than a seat in the diligence, but was more comfortable. The road proved to be not so rough as the appearance of thousands of small stone up it had led me to think it would be. For six hours we retraced the road we had gone over by horseback three days before, and at ten rested at Shtora, where we had to wait an hour and a half for the diligence from Beyrout for Damascus. In the meantime a good dinner was served up. We were waited upon by two young Syrian damsels, the first female waiters I have seen since leaving London.

At 11:30 we took our seats in the coupé of a regular French diligence, with six horses in front, three abreast, and are rolling finely across the valley of Lebanon to Anti-Lebanon, on our way to the ancient city of Damascus. Anti-Lebanon is not so interesting as Lebanon, and is far more barren, but a small portion of its surface being plowed or cultivated at all. Much of it is rugged, naked rock, and where the red earth does appear it seems too poor to raise even trees, the largest shrubbery to be seen being about the size of walking-sticks. Much of the mountain appears made up of semi-independent hills thrown promiscuously up, leaving between a ravine or gulley, up which the road ascends. In some places the road takes decidedly a serpentine course, and, in order to make the steep ascent, a very zigzag course is pursued. The grade is made easy, and the road is very smooth, so that the horses trot the most of the way up the hill. A change of horses is made about every hour, station-houses and stables being located once in five or six miles. Scarcely any other dwellings are to be seen on the mountain.

It took nearly five hours to rise the mountain, 4,700 feet above the sea, on the western side, and to make the descent on the eastern side. It has been a cloudy day, and a little rain fell while we were crossing the mountain. When we reached the foot of the mountain, we came to a huge spring gushing out of the base, much like the one described at Baalbec—not a mere spring, but almost a full-grown river—which for four thousand years has thus been throwing up this beautiful crystal stream, which is called the river Barada, and which, joined with the water of another similar spring, forms the water-supply of Damascus, making the place a grand oasis in a large extent of desert stretching away to the east for hundreds of miles. We were kept hedged in among the hills, the road keeping close to the little river, until we nearly reached the city.

DAMASCUS

Just a few minutes before six we entered the city gate, and the diligence came to a halt at the government building, where the formalities of official inspection have to be gone through with. Here Mr. Clarke, the muleteers, and some of our party were waiting to receive us, and seemed very glad to find my health again so good; they having arrived nearly four hours before us. I learned that the horse-back trip had been very severe on the party, and that Mr. Bridges and some others had been forced to succumb. In view of this, though my diligence fare and hotel bill had amounted to over ten dollars, I felt that it had been money well expended. I doubt whether, in the condition I was in on Monday, I could possibly have withstood the hardship; for the traveling was very rough, in some places the horses having to descend mere narrow strips in the rocks two feet wide, where great danger existed, if the horses slipped, of going headlong down a precipice of fifty feet. Yes, I was glad I came by diligence, if it did incur an extra expense. I missed some good mountain scenery, and the ruins of some old pagan temples; but I had others in return, and withal a pleasant ride.

Here we are at the Hotel Demetri, a very comfortable place of abode, where we stop till Monday, the 21st.

Thursday, Nov. 17th.—Yes, here we are in what is considered, according to Bible story, the oldest city of the world, though I presume there were cities in central Asia and in China before Damascus was founded. From all we can learn, those countries had a population before this portion of Asia. Where man first evolved from the lower orders of animal life cannot now be determined; perhaps the claims of Damascus are as good as those of other localities. There is a story that the Garden of Eden was here, and the two rivers, Barada and Abana, are cited in proof; but they hardly fill the description, for it must be remembered that four rivers took their rise in that celebrated garden. No four rivers take their rise in the vicinity of Damascus, nor is there any garden-spot on the earth where four rivers do take their rise. Such a state of things exists nowhere except in dream-land. Probably somebody thought this to be the Garden of Eden because of its greenness and fertility in comparison with the barren deserts and mountains which surround it. With regard to the two rivers, they are hardly worthy to be called rivers, for when the two form one stream, I think the entire body of water could easily run through a tube four feet in diameter.

Damascus is said to have been founded by Uz, the grandson of Noah, but whether it it was so or not there is no way of deciding. It is also claimed to have been a city before the time of Abraham, for it was here, in this very city, that he picked up his steward Eleazar; and, to go still farther back, it is claimed that Cain murdered Abel here, and no less a person than Shakspere helps to sustain the theory. In his "King Henry VI." he makes Winchester say:

"Nay, stand thou back; I will not budge a foot;
his be Damascus, be thou cursed Cain
o slay thy brother Abel, if thou wilt."

Every person who chooses to believe that this is the place where Cain killed his brother, can do so without violating any law. The deed, if done, might as well be here as anywhere.

The fame of Damascus began with the old patriarchs and has continued to the present time. It is older than Athens, and older than Troy; older than Ephesus, and older than Smyrna. It may be older than Thebes, but that is hard to determine. It was probably founded before Palmyra and Baalbec, and has outlived them both. While Babylon is a heap in the desert, and Tyre contains but a pitiful five thousand inhabitants, Damascus remains in a comparatively flourishing condition. Position and water are what have done it. The two unfailing springs which for thousands of years have supplied the city with water, and have made its surroundings teem with fertility, and its position as the natural supply-place for the vast extent of country east of it, have kept it up midst all the vicissitudes and calamities which have befallen it.

Frequent mention is made of Damascus in the Bible. In 2 Sam. viii, 6, and 1 Chron. xviii, 6, it speaks about David establishing a garrison here after obtaining one of his bloody victories; and in 1 Kings xi, 24, of the opposition presented here to Solomon. The history will be remembered of Naaman, who belonged here, and who to be cured of leprosy was ordered by Elisha to bathe seven times in the river Jordan, when the proud Syrian expressed a preference for the magnificent rivers of his own land. In the chronicles of Jeroboam and Ahaz, in the prophecies of Isaiah and Amos, allusion is also made to this ancient city. Ezekiel also alludes to it in describing the commercial greatness of Tyre. Beyrout, however, has taken the position with reference to Damascus once occupied by Tyre.

Alexander the Great sent his general Parmenio to take it, while he himself marched from Tarsus to Tyre. Pompey later on occupied it. The Romans called it "The Eye of the East."

It was while Paul was journeying from Jerusalem to Damascus to persecute those who believed in Jesus that it is claimed he was smitten to the earth by a very brilliant light from heaven, and heard a voice which spoke audibly. Such forcible arguments are well calculated to convince any one of the existence of a power a little out of the common course of things; and I thought, as I was journeying toward this city, whether it would not be a good stroke of business for me to be converted to Christianity in a similar manner. I do not know that I am any worse than Paul was when he was visiting over the country for the express purpose of persecuting those who had embraced the new religion; in fact he was much the worse, for I have persecuted no one, but simply used such arguments as to me seemed tenable. I hold myself open to conviction, and am ready to embrace the truth whenever I am convinced that truth exists which I have not. I cannot think it would take any stronger knock-down arguments to convince me than it did Paul, and it might be a good thing to convert me; who knows but I might be a shining light in the ranks of Jesus if I could only be thoroughly converted? If I could only return home and tell you how I had been felled to the earth by a strong light, and a voice not from a human source had instructed me what to do, some of you, knowing me somewhat and not regarding me as a great liar, might be converted also, and the number of believers would be increased by a few hundreds. All we require is the unmistakable arguments that carry conviction with them; we are ready to accept Christianity at any moment when we can be convinced of its truth; but we will have to have real arguments, not false ones or untruths. Nothing of that kind, however, seems to be for us; no such luck in our favor; if we ever become Christians, we will be compelled to accept the weak arguments and the untruthful claims which seem so potent to gain the assent of others. We will have to take as facts a mass of fables and silly stories which a person of good hard sense can not believe; that is all that is to be offered to us; it is that or nothing; consequently we cannot become Christians.

There are four different places pointed out in the vicinity of this city as being the identical place where Paul's conversion was effected, and I am inclined to give one just as much credence as the other, and to believe them all equally correct. I regard it as a pity that there is such a variety of statements about this important matter. Paul himself seems to have been troubled to tell a consistent story about the matter. In the first statement it does not say that the companions of Paul saw the light; but in his speech at Jerusalem he positively asserts they did. In Acts it says that the companions of Paul heard the voice, while Paul, in his speech, expressly contradicts it. This is a deviation from the truth, something like the statement that Paul returned to Jerusalem immediately after his conversion, while in Galatians he asserts positively that he went into Arabia, and did not return to Jerusalem for three years. In Acts xv an account is given of a council held in Jerusalem, to which Paul and Barnabas were sent from Antioch. Paul, in Galatians, gives a very different account. Again, in Acts, it is decreed that even gentiles must abstain from meats offered to idols; while Paul, in this epistle to the Corinthians, orders directly to the contrary. Acts mentions a visit of Paul between the first council and the one alluded to; Paul makes a different statement. In Acts the gift of tongues is a remarkable gift of the Holy Ghost; while Paul insists that it is unmeaning, unintelligible gibberish. The account in Acts of the arrival of Paul in Rome is entirely different from what Paul says about it in his epistle to the Romans; in the first Christianity is virtually unknown, in the second a flourishing church is in existence. It is such discrepancies and contradictions as these that make the Jewish scriptures unreliable. A man must stultify himself exceedingly to believe both sides of such direct contradictions about the most simple matters. Can it be that the cause of truth requires so many falsehoods and contradictions to sustain it?

Mohammed is said to have visited Damascus while he was still a camel driver, and before he set up business as a prophet. He did not enter the city, but viewed it from the hill northwest of the town; and to him, after traveling many days over the arid sands of Arabia, the city, with its vesture of green foliage, its gardens, and orchards of orange, lemon, fig, and pomegranate trees, looked indeed like a paradise. He viewed it with delight, but would not enter the city, saying, "There is but one paradise, and I prefer to have mine above, and not in this world." It has been thought by more than one person that the prophet acted sensibly, for to view the city from whence he did it presents a lovely appearance; but to enter it, and travel its narrow, dirty streets; to pass through its miles of somber mud-houses, or rough walls, plastered with mud; to wind among its crowded and dingy bazars; to see its mass of miserable beings ekeing out a hapless existence, takes away all the charm, and gives one to understand that it is not much of a paradise after all. Mohammed doubtless ever retained a better opinion of the city for not having entered it.

THE MASSACRE OF 1860.

Sunday, Nov. 20th.—This is our fourth day, and we have spent the time somewhat industriously in looking around the ancient city of Damascus, but I cannot say that I am hugely pleased with it. It of course possesses objects of interest, but a great deal that is repulsive and offensive. It is an oriental city in the strictest sense of the term, and is wholly unlike the cities of Europe and America. Its population is estimated at 250,000, 200,000 of which are Mohammedans; 25,000 Christians, mostly of the Greek church; 7,000 Jews; and the balance divided up into numerous small sects. The city probably has as much religion for the number of its inhabitants as can be found anywhere, though there is no more harmony among the devotees of the different systems than in other places. Religions seem to act to make enemies of the human race. Every individual is certain that he has the truth—that his religion is directly from God. Of course all devotees of other systems are believing a falsehood, and consequently are enemies of God, deserving castigation and death. The Mohammedans here are said to be very fanatical, and to entertain a positive hatred toward Christians, whom they regard as degenerate dogs. This spirit of fanaticism and enmity broke out here in 1860, as it did in all the principal towns of Syria, and a terrible massacre ensued. In Damascus seven thousand Christians were put to death, and in all of Syria the number of the victims was estimated at fourteen thousand. This was a terrible state of things; but, while it was later than any Christian massacres of a similar character, it pales into insignificance in comparison with many Christian massacres which had taken place within the past few centuries. One has but to recall the terrible massacres of the Waldenses, the Albigenses, the Huguenots, the heretics in the Netherlands, the mutual slaughterings of Catholics and Protestants in England, Scotland, and Ireland, to become convinced that the Mohammedans fall far short of the Christians in the business of killing and slaughtering for opinion's sake. In the Netherlands alone fifty thousand were put to death in cold blood, while of the Huguenots alone, on the occasion of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, one hundred thousand were put to death in France. The Waldenses and the Albigenses were pursued for years, and thousands upon thousands were put to death, while those who escaped with their lives were driven from their pleasant homes to the glens and rocks of the mountains. The Christians surely have very few stones to throw at Mohammedans on the score of massacres and persecutions.

It was on the 9th of July, 1860, that the Mohammedans of this city perpetrated the bloody deed alluded to. By sunset the whole Christian quarter was in flames; the water supplies were cut off, and miserable thousands were hemmed in by a hopeless inclosure of fire and steel. There was one good man among the Mohammedan fanatics, Abd-el-Kader, who no sooner gained intelligence of the frightful work that was being perpetrated than he sent his faithful Algerines into the Christian quarter with orders to rescue all the wretched sufferers they could meet. Hundreds were safely escorted to his house before dark. Many rushed to the British consulate. As night advanced, fresh hordes of marauders—Kurds, Arabs, Druses—entered the city and swelled the furious mob of fanatics, who now, glutted with spoil, began to cry out for blood. The dreadful work then began. All through that awful night and the whole of the following day, the pitiless massacre went on. Hundreds disappeared, hurried away to distant parts of the surrounding country, where, to save their lives, they were married to Mohammedans. Men of all ages, from the boy to the old man, were forced to apostatize, were circumcised on the spot, in derision, and then put to death. The churches and convents, which, in the first paroxysms of terror, had been filled to suffocation, presented piles of corpses, mixed up promiscuously with the wounded and those only half-dead, whose last agonies were endured amidst flaming beams and calcined blocks of stone falling upon them. The thoroughfares were choked with the slain. Abd-el-Kader alone stood between the living and the dead. Fast as his Algerines brought in those whom he had rescued, he reassured them, consoled them, fed them. He had himself gone out and brought in numbers personally. Forming them in detailed parties, he forwarded them under successive guards to the castle. Then, as the terrific day closed in, nearly twelve thousand, of all ages and sexes, were collected and huddled together, a fortunate but exhausted residue, fruits of his untiring exertions. There they remained for weeks, lying on the bare ground without covering, hardly with clothing, exposed to the sun's scorching rays; their rations, scantily served out, cucumbers and coarse bread. Lest they might obtain a little repose, the Turkish soldiers kept alarming them with rumors of an impending irruption, when they would all be given to the sword.

Abd-el-Kader himself was now menaced. His house was filled with hundreds of fugitives, European consuls, and native Christians. The Mohammedans, furious at being thus balked of their prey, advanced toward it, declaring they would have them. Informed of the movement, the hero coolly ordered his horse to be saddled, put on his cuirass and helmet, and, mounting, drew his sword. His faithful followers formed around him—brave remnant of his old guard, comrades in many a well-fought field, illustrious victors of the Moulaia, where, on the 18th of December, 1847, twenty-five thousand men, under his inspiring command, attacked the army of the emperor of Morocco, sixty thousand strong, and entirely defeated it. The fanatics came in sight. Singly he charged into their midst and drew up. "Wretches," he exclaimed, "is this the way you honor the prophet? May his curses be upon you! Shame upon you, shame! You will live to repent. You think you may do as you please with the Christians, but the day of retribution will come! The Franks will yet turn your mosques into churches! Not a Christian will I give up! They are my brothers! Stand back, or I will give my men the order to fire!" The crowd dispersed. Not a man of that Moslem throng dared raise his voice or lift his arm against the renowned "champion of Israel." Consternation spread throughout Syria, and in every town and village the Christians anticipated a speedy doom. Such is the effect of religious fanaticism. When men undertake to do the work of God they make this kind of a mess of it.

The French and English squadrons, however, were seen off Beyrout, and the French standards were soon waving on the soil. But for the promptitude with which assistance came, it may have been that the whole Christian race would have been immolated, the impression among the Mohammedans being that the sultan had issued a decree for the extermination of the infidels. As it was, sufficient restraints were loosened to give power to the vengeance and lusts of the Turks, who, on a small scale, performed such bloody tragedies as have so recently been carried out to a more fearful extent in the "Bulgarian atrocities." The sequel of this Syrian slaughter was, one pasha was shot, also three Turkish officers, and one hundred and seventeen individuals, chiefly Bashi-Bazouks, police, and wandering characters. About four hundred of the lower classes were condemned to imprisonment and exile. Of the citizens, fifty-six were hanged. Of the notables, eleven were exiled to Cyprus and Rhodes, and their property sequestered for the time being; but it was afterward restored and they were enabled to live in luxury. Such is the amount of retribution imposed for this most bloody and savage outrage—one class of religionists attempting to suppress a rival class.

WALKS ABOUT THE CITY.

Two guides who can speak English were furnished us to go with us through the bazars and to visit the various parts of the city. The bazars, of course, were the first objects of attention, and they are indeed numerous, though not as rich in goods and appearance as some of us had dreamed. There are some miles in all of the bazars, much like those of Constantinople—narrow streets covered over with a roof on top. All along on both sides are small shops, from six by four feet to ten feet square, on the shelves of which the goods are displayed so as to attract the passer's attention. Customers never enter the shops, as with us, for there is barely room for the shopkeeper, but step up to the front and make their purchases. The shop-keeper can reach from his seat nearly all the goods he has for sale. The shops of the same kind are usually together in a locality by themselves. One street is nearly filled with shoemakers, and in a space ten feet square six or eight persons are busily at work. It is very interesting to watch the different mechanics at their various avocations, their style of work being so unlike what we see in our country. I accidentally, in stopping to look at something, got separated from the rest of the company, and wandered around for two or three hours by myself, mainly watching the various artisans at their labor. The work of the silversmiths and the coppersmiths is quite interesting, as they turn out many articles of curious workmanship. The furniture makers, whose work is extensively inlaid with pearl and silver wire, exhibited a great amount of ingenuity. On some small articles, like a work-box or small stand, are inlaid thousands of pieces of pearl in the form of leaves and vines. The turners are a numerous class, and seem to be a long way behind the same craftsmen in our country. Their lathes are extremely simple, being two points on which the piece to be turned is placed, with an iron bar for a rest. This is generally on the ground. The turning of the piece is effected by a bow with a loose cord which winds once around the article being turned; with one hand the bow is manipulated, turning the stick backwards and forwards, the chisel, which is held by the other hand and the toes, cutting only half the time; that is, when the stick makes the forward motion. It is a slow, imperfect process, and I think our turners could dispatch twenty pieces to one of the Damascus turners. Bedposts, banisters, and even larger objects are turned in this way, as well as articles of brass and iron.

The coppersmiths seem to understand their business pretty well, and by continued beating their heavy sheet copper they bring out kettles, pans, and other vessels with decided skill. Their shops are noisy places, but I like to stand and watch the steady change they effect in the wares they turn out. The confectioners are an important class, and many of their shops are to be met with. They do not make much candy like ours, but they manufacture a great variety of sweetmeats. Damascus has long enjoyed a reputation for its sweets, and they are sent abroad in many directions. The bakers are also numerous; their flat, limpsy, half-baked cakes are met with in all parts of the town, and are hawked about by numerous pedlers. The cakes do not present a very tempting appearance. The fez-makers who bow the wool, work it into the proper form, and full it up, color it bright red, press it into shape, and attach a black tassel to the top, are often to be encountered. Almost everybody wears the fez here, save those who have the regular turban. Those who have made a pilgrimage to Mecca are permitted to wear a green turban, and in this way they are honorably distinguished. It is also said that the descendants of the Prophet are allowed to wear the green turban.

I was struck with the number of small boys who work at the different mechanical arts. They are early instructed in the business which they are to pursue for life. I saw several as young as six and eight, who were working as steadily as old men. They cannot have much chance for acquiring education, when all the days of childhood are spent working at some trade. Here are many weavers, weaving fine silk fabrics, as well as cotton. Damascus has long been noted for its rich silks and satins. Much of this class of goods is decidedly beautiful. There are here many wholesale shops, called khans, where heavy stocks of silk goods are carried, and where dealers from distant parts obtain their supplies. The fabrics of Damascus are taken many hundred miles in all directions. The manufacture of common pottery is extensively conducted here; nearly all the ordinary vessels for carrying water in, etc., are red earthenware. I have not seen a wooden pail or bucket since entering the country; the water in all instances is conveyed in a large earthen bottle, about the size of a demijohn, holding from three to five gallons, carried on the shoulders of women. I have seen hundreds of women going to and from the wells and fountains with these large bottles upon their shoulders. The Damascans delight in bright colors, and it is common to see weavers turning out bands and straps of the most brilliant hues. Some do nothing but make sandals, generally of red morocco, while large numbers of others are engaged in making wooden clogs with a sole which raises the wearer from two to six inches from the ground. Many of these are worn by the women, and are held on the feet by a strap over the ball of the foot. They are very good to keep the feet from the wet, but are an awkward, clumsy kind of foot-gear. The manufacture of swords and knives has long been a characteristic of Damascus workmanship. The fine quality of "Damascus blades" has been known for many centuries. I saw many cutlers forging them and finishing them up. Many of the blades are ornamented with figures and etchings, while a high polish is given the steel. Nearly all the mechanics work in a sitting, kneeling, or squatting position, and the feet are made to play quite an important part in their work. Nearly all are barefooted, and the toes become very handy in performing a share of the work. The streets on which the bazars are located are traversed a good deal by camels, donkeys, and horses, laden with all sorts of commodities, transporting them from one part of the city to another. If a person is not watchful, he is often run against or knocked aside by the bulky loads thus being transported. Street porters are not seen here as in Constantinople and Smyrna; neither are dogs as plentiful as in the former city, though they are in nowise scarce. The street called Straight, mentioned in the New Testament, is the principal one in the city, and is something more than a mile in length, reaching from one side to the other, from west to east. It is not so wide as it used to be, as it was thought too much space was allowed it, and the houses were brought nearer together. It is largely occupied by bazars and shops.

THE GREAT MOSQUE.

This, of course, has to be visited by all sight-seers. It is only a few years since Christians have been allowed to enter it, and now the number is limited to twenty persons, and a charge of twenty-five francs is made for the party. We are not allowed to wear our shoes within its holy precincts, but must take them off and put on slippers. The mosque stands upon the site where once stood a pagan temple to Rimmon; then a large Christian church was erected on the same ground, and when the Mohammedans conquered this country they became joint occupants in the church; but by some sharp practice they ousted the Christians, and have since occupied it entirely themselves. This is the greatest mosque in Syria, not even surpassed in size by the great mosque of Omar in Jerusalem. It is a long and large edifice, standing in the midst of a spacious quadrangle, nearly three hundred feet in length by nearly half that distance in width, with two rows of plain-looking columns, which were taken from the heathen temple which once stood on the same ground. Thus do the religions succeed one another.

When Arcadius, the son of Theodosius, ascended the throne, he dedicated this old pagan temple to the worship of Christ, changing it from Jupiter to Jesus, and caused this inscription to be placed over one of its principal doors: "Thy kingdom, O Christ, is a kingdom of all time, and thy dominion lasts through all ages." And, strange as it may appear, the Mohammedans have allowed this inscription to remain, though it is not often seen, one having to climb to the top of some of the bazars to see it. Although the temple was thus formerly ascribed to Christ, it seems to have passed entirely from his possession or the custody of his followers. The caliph entered the church with his guards, when it was decided to eject the Christians, and ordered the removal or destruction of every vestige of Christian worship. Standing on the great altar, Walid himself directed the work of spoliation. Seeing his position, one of his followers, more fanatical or more timid than the rest, thus addressed him: "Prince of the Faithful, I tremble for your safety. The power of that image against which you stand may be exerted against you." "Fear not for me," replied the proud Moslem, "for the first spot on which I shall lay my battle-ax will be that image's head." Thus saying, he lifted his weapon and dashed the image in pieces. The Christians raised a cry of horror, but their voices were drowned in the triumphant shout, "Ullahu Akbar." Having thus obtained possession, Walid spared neither time nor expense in decorating the building. He made it the most magnificent mosque in his wide dominions. And even now, dilapidated as it has become, it has few equals in the Mohammedan empire.

The entrance archway is impressive, with its antique workmanship. The interior is spacious, with nave and aisle supported by numerous columns. The lamps suspended from the ceiling, the antique stained windows and mosaic work overhead in the lofty domes and arches, the inscriptions of passages from the Koran in many places, and the various praying-places, furnished with rich carpets, cannot fail to attract attention. In the transept is a "chapel" said to contain the head of John the Baptist, though there is not probably the slightest authority for the claim. Around it several Moslems were muttering their prayers. The pulpit is solid and handsome. The court by the side of the mosque is very spacious, and is paved with marble flagstones, which the feet of the faithful have polished by constant wear. In the center is a fountain where ablutions are performed before entering the mosque. Corridors surround the court, and traces may be seen of the gilding with which they were once beautified. In the western part of the court, standing upon a circular colonnade, is the "Dome of Treasures," said to contain ancient manuscripts of great value, but the contents are never under any circumstances exhibited.

The mosque is supplied with three minarets. One is called the "Minaret of Jesus," from a legend that when Jesus comes to judge the world he will descend first to this minaret. Perhaps he will when he does come. We ascended the "Minaret of the Bride," which is the most ancient. We climbed the one hundred and eighty steps and had a splendid view of the city spread out before us, with its thousands of flat roofs, a fair display of domes, large and small, and some thirty or forty minarets. There are some imposing-looking buildings, but only a limited number. The castle or citadel is a rather fine building, and is one of the prominent objects from a distance. It is a large quadrangular structure, built in 1219, and is surrounded by a moat. The walls, whose appearance of strength is exaggerated by twelve immense towers at the four corners of the building, are supposed to be very ancient. Some curious weapons are preserved there, and also the sacred tent carried in pilgrimages to Mecca. Around the city, particularly off toward the east, is a beautiful growth of green foliage, consisting of orange, myrtle, and pomegranate trees, lovely to behold, and which gives an aspect like paradise to the city. But little of these gardens can be seen, however, in going near them, as they are obscured by high mud walls. There is no pleasure in perambulating the city, the streets all being of the same narrow, dull, and monotonous character, with houses without windows on the streets, or having the blind walls described. Some of the streets are but six feet in width, some eight, some ten, some twelve, and a few as much as twenty. But as narrow as they are, the same space is not allowed all the way up; the second story projects into the street, with braces underneath, so that when the ways are narrow the projections meet, shutting out the light from the streets below, and giving them a dismal, cheerless appearance. And these streets are never straight or regular, but wind and twist around in the most confused manner. You can easily imagine that such streets, with no windows in the lower parts of the houses, must have very little to give variety or interest. These remarks apply to the quarters where dwellings only are, and not to that portion where the bazars are located.

We were taken to a pretty fine Greek Christian church, built since the massacre, and attended a funeral service when two priests read in a chanting voice a long service out of their holy books; but no discourse was given. The coffin was placed near the altar, and many of devout were on their knees, crossing themselves, and going through the formalities of Christian prayer, which to me seem no better than the Mohammedan formula.

We were taken to the house of Judas, or what is said to be the house of Judas, where Paul tarried when in Damascus, and thence to the house of Ananias, who cured Paul of the blindness with which the Lord smote him. This same house has been converted into a small Christian church or chapel. The place is also shown where Paul was let down in a basket when it became desirable for him to leave the city. It is well we were all allowed to believe just as little as we pleased as to the reliability of these claims. It is highly probable that nothing whatever is known as to where these houses stood or where the basket act was performed.

We were likewise guided to two missionary schools, one for girls and one for boys, where the children look bright and intelligent. The girls' school embraces some sixty scholars, and is divided into two classes, according to age, the older scholars studying both Arabic and English. The smaller class are little more than infants five and six years of age, who go to the school to be kept out of mischief, but who, as scholars are by no means easy to be had, are readily taken. They sang to us in both English and Arabic. The boys entertained us by doing some examples in mathematics. The schools are under the control of British missionary societies. A Mr. Phillips, a Presbyterian of the Irish persuasion, is in charge. They are undoubtedly doing some good in learning the young Syrian ideas how to shoot.

We then visited three private mansions, two in the Jew quarter and one in the Christian quarter—for Jews and Christians seem to live in quarters by themselves. These houses are gotten up in oriental magnificence; they are entered by passing through two or three courts, attended by a subordinate, whence visitors are ushered into the main court, neatly paved with finished marble, with a fountain in the center, and with orange and other rare trees growing around. The reception room, some twenty by fifty feet in area, and twenty-five feet in hight, is rich in the extreme. The upper portion, to a distance of some ten feet down, is highly gilded, and below that is sculptured marble from Italy, but carved here in very elaborate style. Half of the room is some twenty inches higher than the other part. The furniture is of Damascus make, and richly inlaid with pearl and upholstered with Damascus silk of the richest pattern. The floor is of fine marble of many colors, and in small pieces, put together in figures like mosaic work. Near the entrance of this room is a beautiful and expensive white marble fountain, cut with elaborate design. On the south side of the court is an open room, and it is a very agreeable place to pass the time in hot weather. This style of court, recess, and divans is common in all the better residences, being considered a sine qua non in this warm climate. We also looked into the garden of the first mansion visited, and saw a fine growth of orange, lemon, fig, and myrtle trees, though it is rather late in the season for flowers and small plants. The owner of the first house visited was not in, or at least did not show himself; but the second one visited was home, and the females of his household received us very kindly and seemed pleased with our call. Through the guide he assured us he was glad to see us, and that he felt great respect for Americans. He had two rocking-chairs of American make, of which he seemed very proud. He pointed to them and said, "America, America." He explained to the guide that as it was their Sabbath he was not at liberty to offer us refreshments, but were it any other day he would take pleasure in offering them. Both the Jews whose houses we visited are bankers, and it is pretty evident that banking here, as well as elsewhere, is remunerative. These mansions cost many thousands of dollars, and bespeak great wealth on the part of the owners. The Christian whose house we visited we did not see, but learned he is a very wealthy merchant in silks, etc. He is a Syrian. His mansion is rather plainer than the other two, but is rich enough, and very beautiful. All these mansions have miserable surroundings, the streets in their vicinity being as mean and dirty as elsewhere. The contrast between the interior and the exterior is very great indeed.

The Hotel Demetri, where we are stopping, is gotten up on the same plan—a large court and a magnificent fountain of water; a rich divan on one side, and the recess room, with lounges, on the other; orange-trees laden with fruit, and myrtle-trees, looking beautiful with their small white buds. It seems like emerging from dull earth to paradise to pass from the street to the court of the hotel.

I have to-day been outside the city walls, climbed upon the hill six or seven hundred feet high, and taken a good view of the city from the very place whence Mohammed is said to have viewed it. The sight is far more lovely than the reality; it looks better at a distance than near by.

Judge Lawson, wife, son, and daughter left this morning at four o'clock, per diligence, for Beyrout, so our company will be lessened by that number. He is obtaining the fine salary of $20,000 a year for sitting in court in Dublin, Cork, etc., with a furlough of two months each year. Verily his condition is much more desirable than that of thousands of his fellow-countrymen.

It would be desirable to visit the ancient site of Palmyra, some six day's travel off in the desert northeast of this place, and view the extensive ruins of ancient temples which are there; but the time and expense necessary to reach it are so great as to preclude the enterprise. The temple of the sun, which was built there, had three hundred and ninety columns, and richness in proportion. Many of these columns are said to be still standing, reminding the beholder of the grandeur of that city in the time of Queen Zenobia. But few, however, have the enterprise and hardihood to make the journey. I shall, at all events, endeavor to be content with what ruins I may be able to find without making a visit to Palmyra.

I will remark, before closing, that extensive camel trains come to this city and depart thence. I am informed that a train of camels is now here, four thousand in number, which leaves on a journey across the desert within a few days.

Now we are about done with Damascus. To-morrow morning we start for the "Holy Land," and will reach it in course of the day. You will be likely to hear from me while there, and now I bid you goodbye. I bear you in daily remembrance, and trust you do not forget me. Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

The Book of Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh.

CHAPTER I.

THE PILGRIMS OF DAMASCUS.

1. And it came to pass in the first year of the reign of James the Fourth in the land of Unclesam, even the year that he was shot by Guiteau, the son of Belial, who also believed much in the "Holy One;"

2. That I, De Robigne Mortimer, the Scribe, son of John, surnamed Bennett, and of the great city which lieth by the sea, aforetime called Manhattan;

3. Being sent by many friends to make a journey to the uttermost parts of the earth, even to the land where the sun riseth, and to make a true and full report of all the wonders of the various lands;

4. Did after many days visit the city of Damascus, which lieth northeast of Mount Hermon, and in the way before you take the desert road to Palmyra and Bagdad, which latter city is forty days' journey from Damascus; and so be it, there is little water on the way for the camels and the travelers to drink withal;

5. And peradventure many have famished with great thirst while crossing this desert, and some camels and some men have perished and laid down and given up the ghost; and when they awoke in the morning they were all dead corpses.

6. Howbeit, the city of Damascus was famous aforetime, and much did her merchants increase their wealth by the goodly profits which they made on the silks, the steel blades, and the wares of copper and of brass which her cunning workmen did make with their hands.

7. Now these be the names of the Pilgrims who did bear company to the Scribe while making the journey of many days in the land of Yahweh;

8. First was De Witt Clinton, son of Charles, surnamed Bridges, the same being from the land of Hoosier, even in the land of Unclesam, in which floweth the river Wabash, and moreover who also accompanieth the Scribe to the uttermost parts of the earth.

9. Next, that man of God, Henry S. Getz, who talketh much with his mouth, and is of the land of Williampenn, even the town of Warren, which lieth among the hills nigh unto the region where the oil oozeth from the ground; also even in the land of Unclesam.

10. Next is another man of God, named A. O. James, of the land of Johnbull, even the city of the plain which is called Northampton, the same which sent Charles Bradlaugh to the House of Parliament, where all the laws are made for the land of Johnbull;

11. Howbeit that body of lawmakers did most unjustly deprive said Charles of the seat to which he was justly entitled, wherewithal they did exhibit much malice and bigotry.

12. And the next is a widow, named Cornelia Moots, whose husband has been nigh twelvemonth in his grave, who in the land of the Wolverines, even in Bay City, did make much gain by selling iron, steel, nails, gimlets, and divers cheap cutting instruments made likewise of hardened steel.

13. The next is a maiden of mature years from the land of Badger; yea, even Prattville, in Grant county, whose name is Mary Brayman, and who hath seen nigh unto forty summers, and hath piety sufficient for six damsels still older than herself.

14. The same hath been and is a teacher, directing young minds how to shoot; and greatly doth it delight her soul to read the Sunday-school papers, and to teach the Bible class.

15. Verily, such faith as this damsel hath is not often found in Israel; she knoweth of a truth that she hath found the true way, and that she hath a through ticket for the Happy Land of Canaan above the clouds.

16. Next cometh Miss Evelyn Rose, a damsel of avoirdupois, from the land of the Ohio and Miami, even the city of Cleveland, which lieth on the lake as you go from Buffalo to Toledo.

17. Her paternal relative hath made much gold in the oil trade, and she doeth well in helping scatter the same.

18. Nextly cometh Master Fred. S. Wetmore, of the land of Williampenn, even the town of Warren, where the man of God Getz dwelleth. Fred hath not seen a great number of years (needing to tarry some time in Jericho till his beard groweth), but he hath much to say of himself, and delighteth greatly to narrate how many schools he hath attended, with the wonderful events which befell him during his long experience.

19. Lastly cometh Monsieur Levebre, of the land of Bullfrogs, from the great city of Paris, which lieth on the river Seine, and who withal parlezvous in Française and not in Anglaise.

20. These be the nine who make the number of pilgrims that journey together through the Land of Yahweh, it being the same number which it taketh to make up a side in the game of baseball.

21. Howbeit E. A. Lawson, who sitteth in judgment in the chief cities of the land of the Hiberna (even where the Mickeys think their troubles are very sore), for which he receiveth each year the goodly sum of four thousand pieces of gold, each piece being the same as twenty pieces of silver of the value of one shilling;

22. Together with the wife of his bosom, his son, who is member of the Royal Civil Engineers, and his fair daughter, who hopeth to catch a husband; and it is time, withal, for verily she must have seen twenty-five summers already;

23. These four, who were with us aforetime, even from Corfu, and Athens, and Constantinople, and Smyrna, and Beyrout, and Baalbec, and Damascus, did leave us at the last named, and by diligence did depart for Beyrout to take ship for Jaffa, and will be with the pilgrims no more.

24. Moreover, be it known that we have acaptain for our band of pilgrims; even Herbert E. Clark, from the land of granite, in the land of Unclesam, who hath journeyed much withal in the Landof Yahweh, and knoweth every foot thereof, even from Dan to Beersheba.

25. He goeth before the pilgrims; he is their cloud by day, and their pillar of fire by night: he doth provide bountifully of bread, and meat, and eggs, and milk, and such things as gladden the heart of the weary pilgrim.

26. He, too, hath men-servants, to the number of half a score and two, to pitch their tents, to serve the pilgrims, and to look after their comfort withal. He hath moreover a cunning cook, Abou Meriam, an Ethiopian, who, with much skill, can make savory dishes for the weary pilgrims, and who doeth much to make them forget their troubles in the Land of Yahweh.

27. It seemeth needful also to Herbert to have many mules and asses to carry the tents, the baggage, the food for man and beast, and all the articles which the pilgrims need on their journey. The number of these mules and asses be a score and three, besides a horse for each of the pilgrims.

28. These be all the band of pilgrims, and the captain, and the men-servants, and the mules, and all that belongeth to the band.

CHAPTER II.

THE PILGRIMS DEPART ON THEIR JOURNEY.

1. And it come to pass on the twenty-first day of the eleventh month, and early in the morning, Captain Herbert saith to all the pilgrims, Go to, know ye not the time cometh when we must leave the wicked city of Damascus?

2. Know ye not that every man and every woman must set their face toward the holy city of Jerusalem, in the land of Yahweh?

3. Let every one gird his loins and strengthen his spirit, for behold the road lieth before us; and let none be afraid, for lo, I will accompany you, and abide with you, and show you the way wherein your feet must walk.

4. Then were all the pilgrims light of heart, for of a truth they did not mourn that the time had come to leave the city of Damascus.

5. At the eighth hour, when all had eaten meat, each one mounted his horse, and the captain, and his men-servants, even those who carried the food for man and beast, led the band straightway out of the gates of the city.

6. And they did pass on the left bank of the river Barada, which supplieth Damascus with water, and maketh her gardens and her orchards green withal.

7. And it came to pass that the captain and the pilgrims did set their faces toward the southwest, even nigh unto Hermon, whose head is hoary with the mists and the snows that fall thereon.

8. And as they came nigh unto the foundations of Hermon, they passed over the stony plains and naked fields which lie round about;

9. And lo, it was so that when the twelfth hour had come, the captain and the pilgrims did halt, and there upon the ground beside the brook Mishpath, which emptieth into the river Pharpar, which floweth from the high mount of Hermon, even to the southern side of Damascus.

10. Here did all the pilgrims stay their stomachs with meat, and bread, and eggs, and did drink of the waters of the brook Mishpath, and were refreshed.

11. When the pilgrims again set their faces toward the Land of Yahweh, lo, the windows of heaven were opened, and the rain fell; and behold, the scribe had no umbrella to shed the rains of heaven from coming to his skin.

12. Neither had he a waterproof to put on withal, he having decided to go even to the ends of the earth without such incumbrances.

13. Then were the hearts of the pilgrims cast down, and even did the captain of the host lift his eyes to the clouds in a beseeching manner.

14. Even the man of God Getz did look sore of heart, and indeed he prayed that the windows of heaven might be closed.

15. Then did the Scribe say to the man of God, Getz, Go to, thou of great faith, for peradventure the windows of heaven may soon be closed, and thy heart may be glad once again.

16. Then did the man of God, Getz, groan and say, Even so may it be.

17. And it came to pass when the pilgrims had journeyed a league and half a league, behold the windows of heaven were closed and no more rain fell on the earth.

18. But the winds blew, and their teeth did chatter, as the fierce gusts came up from the Land of Yahweh, and even from the mountains of Moab, and the land of Bashan.

19. But the pilgrims were not faint of heart, neither did they look back toward Damascus, but each did urge his horse to go quickly.

20. And at the fourth hour, when a spirit of weariness had come upon all, and when they had come unto Kefra Hawway, the white tents of the camp came in view, and the heart of every one was lightened, and they said, This indeed is the hour of gladness, howbeit the man-servants and the mules which carry the tents, and the cook do not stop at the noon-hour, but hasten on to have all things in readiness for the pilgrims when they arrive.

21. Then did every rider hand over his horse to the man-servants, and seek his tent, and even gathered round the fire where the Ethiopian was preparing savory soups and meats, wherewith to make the heart rejoice.

22. And it came to pass that nigh unto the camp, tradition saith, is the tomb of Nimrod, the mighty hunter before the Lord.

23. And then did the pilgrims walk forth to what a son of the desert pointed out to be the tomb of the mighty hunter.

24. And then the Scribe bent over the tomb and essayed to weep on the grave, but nary a weep could he raise.

25. And then did the Scribe speak in a loud voice, and plaintive, O Nimrod, where art thou, and where is thy brother Ramrod? And behold, no answer was vouchsafed by the mighty hunter.

26. Then came forth the captain of the host, and spake words of derision to the pilgrims, saying, Know ye not ye have been deceived? Ye have not been to the tomb of Nimrod; but lo, it lieth here hard by the stable where the asses are fed.

27. Then did half the pilgrims return in disgust to the camp; but the Scribe and three others came to the true tomb of Nimrod, but they shed no tears.

28. And the Scribe said, Peradventure Nimrod is no more here than there, for verily this looketh to be an old temple of the sun.

29. Then did the Ethiopian call all to meat, and every pilgrim was content, and the captain said, We have come a score of miles and half a mile from Damascus.

"Utopia."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. H. L. Green, in the last issue of your paper, givs us and our League a decided "boost." In regard to the Paine celebration Mr. Green refers to, I desire to offer a word of explanation, as well as an apology, to the persons named therein, Parker Pillsbury and Hon. A. B. Bradford. But Mr. Green forgot to mention the "noblest Roman of them all," Mrs. Jane Grey Swisshelm.

We are very sorry to say to Bro. Green, as well as the parties named therein, that we are forced to suspend with the Paine celebration, owing to circumstances over which we hav no control. We had partly engaged Parker Pillsbury, and had already made an engagement with Mrs. Jane Grey Swisshelm; the Hon. A. B. Bradford we claim as one of ourselvs. But still we hope to hav some one to deliver us a lecture on that day, and probably we shall hav a banquet in the evening.

And now, Mr. Green, by the way, is a very nice man, the old lady in Pittsburgh to the contrary notwithstanding. (This is telling tales out of school, but I cannot help it, it is too good to keep.) Mr. Green, while delivering his lecture, "Religion of Humanity," before our League, a la R. G. Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses," and down to the atonement business, kept his audience well under control. But in that assembly were Scotch-Irish covenanters, blue-blooded United Presbyterians, and in their estimation nothing but the "blood of the Lamb" could wash the Pittsburgh smoke, soot, and sins from them. And under the circumstances it was nothing but natural that they should differ from the salvation scheme of Bro. Green's "Religion of Humanity." And one old lady in particular could not stand it any longer, and, with a discernible frown upon her face, arose from her seat and started to wend her way toward the door. But all of a sudden she came to a stand-still, drew back the right foot, pressed the toe of it against the left heel, wheeled about face, took one square look at Bro. Green and one toward the ceiling, shook her clinched fist, and asked God to take Mr. Green back to the "fold." And once more she started to go, but the idea of such a nice man as Mr. Green to be made into kindling wood for hell was too much for the best part of her nature, and once more she turned back to "wrestle with God," as it were. She pawed the air threateningly with her umbrella, and made this last and final appeal, "I hope God will take this man back once more to the fold." And with that she disappeared through the door. "Selah." But lo! that is not all of it, for evidently the affair had become contagious. Just as the old lady had disappeared, her worst half (by odds) arose from his seat with a mingled feeling of pity and contempt, shook his clinched fist at Mr. Green, and delivered himself of a little orthodox material, "A mother's prayer stands between you and hell, sir." Now, it is no wonder that Mr. Green thinks Pittsburgh a good missionary field. He knows how it is himself. Yours, S. F. DeJones.

Universalism and Universalists.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

I hav for a long time had it in mind to write, for some one of the accredited organs of progressiv thought, an article on the right, and a statement of what seems to me to be for our times the necessary and indispensable use of these two words Universalism and Universalists. These great words hav been appropriated by one of the smaller Christian sects, which is characterized by the belief in universal salvation, and this belittling appropriation has been hitherto unthoughtedly acquiesced in by the world at large. A word is urgently needed, however, to denote that far larger and rapidly-increasing class of the community whose distinctiv characteristic is the interest it takes in universal ideas and purposes. The true Universalist is the individual, man or woman, who transcends ordinary, petty, sectarian, and selfish views and aims, and whose life is concerned with the universal affairs and interests of mankind; and true Universalism is that state of mind and range of interests and activities which are correspondingly related. We hav no common term to cover the whole army of progressivs, reformers, and universal aspirationists; and the moment we hav such a word generally adopted we shall appear to be, as we really are rapidly becoming, in fact, the strongest party in the world. All Christian sects hav the common name Christians, and therein, in part, lies their strength. In the want of some striking, common designation, lies, on the other hand, much of the seeming weakness of the great army of progressionists. We are called Infidels, Secularists, Spiritualists, Free Religionists, Humanitarians, Positivists, Pantarchians, Anarchists, Nihilists, Socialists, and by a hundred other names, without the existence of any common attribution which all accept, and by which the world would recognize us.

Probably the one term which is now growing to be most popular and inclusiv is Liberals, which is in some measure replacing the name Reformers, which has also, in some degree, served as a common designation. Neither of them is, however, striking, magnetic, or replete with any great rallying power. They are vaguely descriptiv, and suggest neither organization nor esprit du corps. They describe a mob, and not an army. They suggest an aggregation of disconnected parts, rather than a something which has a centering unity of purpose and movement.

But there is another reason why the terms Universalism and Universalists are needed. They are not quite synonymous, either with Reform and Reformers, or with Liberalism and Liberals. The Universalist, in the true sense of that word, is, as I hav said, the person who interests himself in every subject of human concernment, in ideas, in sentiment, and in effort. An old Latin poet expressed this thought in the words, Homo sum, et nil humanum a me alienum puto; I am a man, and I deem nothing whatsoever human foreign, for me. I concern myself, in other words, with everything which concerns mankind; with all knowledge, with all philanthropy, and with all beneficent enterprise and exertion. There are among reformers unfortunately some, nay, many, who are not entitled to be called Universalists, in this enlarged and comprehensiv sense; and there are among Conservativs some who are so. Reformers are too apt to be mere Specialists in reform, to interest themselvs in the particular twig of the tree upon which they happen to perch. The Infidel, for example, has no other thought for humanity, than to blast the influence of the church, the Bible, and the priesthood; the Spiritualist knows nothing and cares for nothing but to prove the fact that spirits communicate; the temperance man sees all evil distilled into whisky, and all good involved in total abstinence; and so of many others. But all this is far less the case than it was even a few years ago. There is rapid progress being made toward Universalism. The horizon is steadily broadening, in this way, for all within as well as without the churches; within as well as without the older forms of political existence. Reforms are becoming confluent; and conservatism is becoming reformatory. A word is specially needed to express that toward which this uniform drift of human progress is tending. An interest has begun to be established in planetary politics; in the unity of the peoples; in the Republic of the World. A universal administration of the common interests, a universal Religion of Humanity, a universal Language—"all the Unities," in fine, are getting themselvs first realized in thought, in preparation for their realization in fact. Consciously, and still more unconsciously, men's minds are broadening. There is an influx into the souls of men from they know not where. The spirit of the age is the spirit of enlargement. Old superstitions and belittling conditions of thought are hastening to be done away with, and to giv place to universal conceptions, to universal aspirations, and to universal activities. Patriotism is getting to be too narrow an idea, and humanity rules paramount in the thought of the world.

Needs must be, however, that some portions of mankind advance, or, indeed, that one great portion of mankind advances faster, in this career toward universality of development than a remaining portion, which includes, comparativly, the laggards. It is those who are so in advance who need to be distinctified as the Universalists. This term belongs to them of right, and must be recovered for their uses. In the civil law they hav the good old legal technicality, revendication. To revendicate a property is to seize it back, after it has been unjustly or illegally alienated; to bring suit for, get a judgment for, and so re-annex the object claimed to the estate to which it belongs. We must revendicate the terms Universalism and Universalists. Those others, who hav squatted on these rich inheritances of the English language, must be dispossessed, evicted, put to rout, and these indispensable terms seized upon and appropriated by the great rising and swelling hosts of humanity, who cannot be rallied so appropriately under any other banner. Those others must content themselvs with being called Universal Salvationists, or must lose themselvs by merging themselvs in the larger army. They hav done good and gallant work in their day, in enlarging and enfranchising the human mind, and they should hav honorable mention on the surrender of their name to the mightier host of human progress. To allow them to retain it exclusivly, as heretofore, would be as absurd as it would hav been to surrender the American continent to a few scattered tribes of Indians, to the exclusion of all the rest of mankind.

This recovery of a word from a too special or ill-chosen application, for the greater benefit of all, will by no means be an entirely new phenomenon. Precedents and illustrations exist, if they do not abound. Some thirty years ago the word Biology had been taken up and appropriated by certain public lecturers and experimenters in a branch of animal magnetism, who showed the possibility for one human mind to take a sort of absolute control of certain other minds, irrespectiv of rhyme or reason, and by a direct influence quite like that which the magnet effects on the soft iron. This truly wonderful and important phenomenon, which is now again coming up and exciting a new and marked interest in scientific quarters, is still by no means so important as to entitle it to appropriate a term of such wide etymological meaning as Biology, which means science of life.

But the habit of so calling it was already well established, and no other need had been felt for the use of the word, when, a little later, the same word was imported among us from France, where it had been utilized to mean the science of all living things (vegetable and animal)—for which great branch of Universal Science no single name had heretofore existed. We had Botany and Zoology for the sciences of Plants and of Animals, taken separately, but no generalized term to express the science of both, as distinguished from the inorganic or unliving world. The need for such a term was obvious and pressing. No sooner was the word mentioned in that sense than the scientific world recognized its appropriateness for that use. But, unfortunately, here in America, and perhaps in England also, the word had been already seized upon (perhaps invented for that purpose), and applied and popularized in the other and narrower sense, for a branch of animal magnetism, and for the most offensiv branch of that altogether unpopular and offensiv subject, for the prejudiced scientific men of that day. They denounced all mesmerizers and animal magnetizers as quacks, and these biologists as the worst of all quacks. Now, if there is any one word that will frighten a scientist out of his shoes, it is to call him a quack! Here, then, was a dilemma. They must hav the word Biology for the new, and large, and all-important scientific designation of one whole half, and the more important half, of all natural science. They must even call themselvs and be called Biologists. But Biology and Biologists were terms which the world about them understood to mean a thing and a class of people which they themselvs had taken great pains to teach were arrant quackery and quacks. And so timid are they on this subject that they are like Cæsar's wife. To be accused, to be even mentioned in a certain connection, was nearly as bad as to be convicted. What, then, was to be done in this dilemma?

I remember very well how the scientific men squirmed, and dodged, and explained; and how gradually they "ate their leek," and got over the huge difficulty. The words in question were too important to be abandoned to the little and despised horde of lecturers, who, nevertheless, had a hundred to hear them for one that knew anything of the scientists. But the little and despised horde subsided somewhat, soon after; and the scientists hav now completely established their title to the words "biology" and "biologists;" and the other pretenders are driven out of the field. This is one remarkable instance of suit for, and recovery of, words in the court of popular usage.

At present the word "psychology" is extensivly used in an almost identical manner with the earlier and quackish use of "biology," in this country. But right alongside of this use, it is also regularly employed on its old, and, heretofore, well settled sense, as the science of mind, quite at large. This word means, etymologically, soul-science; and inasmuch as soul means either a part, or a special aspect, of mind, it is being replaced, in this latter, but older sense, by the word "mentology," for the total science of mind; and it may prove best to discontinue the suit now being prosecuted by the "regulars" for the recovery of that word; in which case it would quietly be left in the possession of George Francis Train and those others who deal by a direct "psychological" influence with the souls of other men. Other instances of the recovery of lost words press upon my recollection, but time and space forbid their due mention.

It is in this sense that I now propose that we revendicate the words Universalism and Universalists. The firm of John Murray & Co—John Murray was the founder of Universalism and the Universalist church in this country—is now regularly cited to surrender the property in those two words, at the suit of the people, who need and require them for higher uses. Among reformers, or Liberalists at large, there will be, on the other hand, some skittishness with regard to the free use of these words, which they will incline to regard as "damaged literature," no longer fit, from old associations, for their use. They will, as I think, get over that difficulty after a while, as has happened in other cases. The need will be too pressing, if others come to think and feel about the matter as I do, for the indulgence of that fastidiousness. For my own part, if the reformatory world should happen at any time to wish to confer some title of honor upon some great leader in the direction of grand ideas, I don't know that they could do better than to call him The Great Universalist Preacher.

The Truth Seeker.

This able, lively and Liberal paper, published in New York by D. M. Bennett, is now unusually interesting, containing as it does each week a letter from its talented editor, who is now making a trip around the world. His sixteen-column letter in the issue of December 31st, from Constantinople, is intensely interesting. A very large number of the honest, liberal, progressiv subscribers to that paper are giving $5 each as a complimentary fund to defray his expenses for a trip that consumes a year or two. The price of The Truth Seeker is $3 per year, and its editorial correspondence alone is worth five times that sum to any one in want of interesting information. Address D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York city.

The Growth of Freethought.

The San Francisco Chronicle has been figuring up the assets and liabilities of the church in this country, and it finds the liabilities, in the shape of Freethinkers, much heavier than it had supposed. We could hav told our contemporary that the proportion of outspoken Infidels and men of the world who care but little whether the church keeps or not—to paraphrase a well-known expression—formed a very respectable percentage of the fifty millions who call this country home. And in the next half century the proportion will be very much greater. The labors of the Freethought papers and orators, and the quiet, but effectiv, work of individuals in their respectiv neighborhoods, are bearing good fruit. Everywhere there is a growing disposition among the people to investigate, especially among the educated classes. The Roman Catholics, who are kept in ignorance by their priests, do not, of course, get out of the church bonds very fast; it is only now and then we hear of one who, having gone where there is no priest, renounces Catholicism and joins the ranks of the unbelieving multitude. But many of the orthodox Christians, having renounced hell, are getting Liberal enough to extend the walls of heaven so as to take in more, while the Unitarians and Universalists are fast leaving their hybrid religion and joining the Infidels. We rejoice greatly that this is so, and it is a matter for congratulation that the secular press in some parts of the country—albeit they pretend to feel bad about it—can see the true state of the case.

The Chronicle says it is generally conceded, even "by churchmen, that during the last half of the nineteenth century the influence of religion has very seriously declined." And it adds that the decline has been most marked in those countries which has made the greatest progress in education, civilization, and all their concomitants. But while this seems an anomaly to the Chronicle, it really is not. It is but the result of effect following cause. Giv a man a knowledge of even the multiplication table, and he will begin to doubt the trinity. Educate him in the fact that the earth revolves around the sun, and he doubts the biblical story of Joshua. If he sails around the earth he does not find the "four corners," and thus pitches another text overboard. The simplest facts taught in primary schools overthrow some portions of the scriptures; and if some portions are false, why not all? Thus doubts are sown by the children's primers which become settled facts and convictions further on in life. We venture to say that every theological student of average brain has been troubled with doubt, and it is only by losing himself in a labyrinth of theological metaphysics, artfully thrown around him by subtle professors—paid advocates of ignorance, like any lawyers—that he has finally gone into the ministry. Religion demands the blind faith of ignorance. Education and civilization create criticism, and religion cannot stand that, of all things. So it is but natural that in the most civilized and best educated countries—the United States, England, France, and Germany—the influence of religion should decline the fastest.

Among the many points of progress made by these countries the Chronicle speaks of the disestablishment of the English church in Ireland, and adds:

"That the orthodox church of England will go the same way, is regarded by philosophic statesmen as certain. The abrogation of its powers and privileges is but a question of time. When any human institution ceases to be useful to the majority, it is in peril of extirpation; and the orthodox church of England, if it has not already reached that point, is rapidly approaching it."

In France the decline of religious ideas is still more felt. Although nominally Catholic, the church is but little loved by the people, who, judging by past events, know it to be inimical to their best interests. The present government is anticatholic, and many of the highest officials are Atheists. The expulsion of the Jesuits, as a religious order, was an immense stride to take, yet it did not cause a revolution, as it most assuredly would hav done a quarter of a century earlier. France is one of the most prosperous nations of the earth to-day. Her national revenue was over $50,000,000 greater than was estimated. She and her sister republic, the United States, are the two most antichristian nations, and at the same time the most prosperous and powerful. It seems, indeed, that a nation's greatness is in inverse ratio to its piety.

It is notorious that Germany is a nation of Freethinkers. Her universities are Agnostic, if not Atheistic. Her leading men, in the political world as in the scientific, are unbelievers. Her students are growing up rejectors of the Bible and religion. Education is compulsory, and compulsory education is one of the swiftest death-blows ever struck at the church. The intellect of Germany is all tending toward Liberalism, and "as goes the intellect of a country, so, sooner or later, will go the mass of the people."

In England the people already look with contempt upon the aristocracy of the church. They see millions of pounds wrung from them and squandered upon a small body of men who are of no use to any one. While they themselvs lie in squalid wretchedness, ill-paid, ill-fed, and overworked, their spiritual advisers roll in luxury and rank with the lords, and even with majesty itself. The landlords parcel out the land, and the bishops parcel out the people. What the former do not take is given the latter by the government or begged by the clergy. The people begin to see this and reject the pretensions of the church. Religion has been an evil to them, and is gradually going along with other evils.

"In these three great European nations, then," says the Chronicle, "religious influence must be regarded as on the wane. In each of them the power of its orthodox church is disintegrating and being undermined by elements not quite new to this century, but receiving from it a vigor which was probably not anticipated by such philosophers as Rousseau and Voltaire in the eighteenth century. To speak more pointedly, Atheism and Freethinking hav become more potent enemies of religion than the Reformation was of Romanism three centuries and a half ago, when Luther, Calvin, and Henry VIII. disorganized the church of Rome in Europe and in England by interposing a more powerful organization in opposition to it."

In our own country the statistics show that about forty per cent of the population are outside the pale of the church, although unjustly paying taxes to support it. The Chronicle figures it out thus:

"In 1870 the national census showed the existence of twenty-four different religious societies in this country, not including twenty-seven others under the heading 'miscellaneous.' These twenty-four distinct church organizations claimed 72,450 congregations, 63,082 church edifices, and 21,665,062 memberships. The ten leading ones were stated as follows:

	Congregations.	Churches.	Memberships.
Methodists	25,278	21,337	6,528,209
Baptist	14,474	12,857	3,997,116
Presbyterian	6,202	5,683	2,198,900
Catholic	4,127	3,806	1,990,514
Congregational	2,887	2,715	1,117,212
Episcopal	2,835	2,601	991,051
Christian, or Campbellite	3,578	2,882	865,602
Lutheran	3,032	2,776	977,332
German Reformed	1,256	1,145	431,700
United Brethren	1,445	937	265,025
Totals	65,114	56,739	19,362,661

"These 19,362,661 memberships include all the children baptized in the respectiv church denominations or born of parents belonging to them. The above ten denominations are credited with over 90 per cent of all the people of all ages in the United States in 1870 who belonged to any church. The remaining 10 per cent (2,302,401) are credited to the Unitarians, Jews, Friends, Evangelical associations, Moravians, Mormons (87,838), Shakers, Spiritualists (6 970), Universalists, Second Adventists, and a few other sects. As the total population in the United States in 1870 was 38,558,371, and the total of church membership but 21,665,062, it would appear that the number not belonging to any church, or possessing any form of religion, was 16,893,309, or nearly 44 per cent of the whole population."

Upon the above showing, the same authority adds:

"In France and Germany the best intelligence of the people is out of all church organizations, and deeply imbued with the principles advocated by Voltaire and Robert G. Ingersoll. If the same rule of rating applies to the United States, in 1870 the majority of thinking people were probably inclined toward Atheism and total unbelief in the inspiration of the Bible."

Although no intelligent Freethinker is so sanguin as to believe, much less claim, that forty-four per cent of the population of this country are outspoken Freethinkers, yet the showing is very cheerful. There is no doubt that there is a vast latent force of Infidelity scattered through the land, which, could it be gathered together and numbered, would giv the church greater cause for fear that it has yet had. Among business men in large cities there is comparativly little religion. They let their wives and daughters go to church, and they giv liberally to the same institution, yet they themselvs believe scarcely any of the dogmas. They are afraid of what their neighbors would say, and they go on in that way for years, when if they would all come boldly out they would be surprised at their own immense numbers. But each hates to be the first of the community to break the way, and so they go on living in the bondage of hypocrisy.

Revivals, says the Chronicle, are the mere temporary upheavals of the froth of superstition and hypocrisy. Their so-called "converts" do not stay converted, and the revivalists succeed only in making monkey shows, with themselvs as principal characters.

All this is very gratifying to the friends of intellectual freedom. It is good to know that the church, which has done so much harm to the bodies and minds of men, is losing its power over the one and its influence over the other. But its fangs are not all drawn. It still is capable of doing, and does do, incalculable injury. While we can rightly congratulate ourselvs on our advancement in numbers, we must not lose sight of the fact that we hav much work yet to do. Every one of us must be a missionary to yet further spread the glorious cause we all love, and never rest until an Infidel has the same rights as a Christian, and is not forced to pay for the support of a system of religion he denies as untrue, and discards as an enemy to humanity.

Fisher against Ingersoll.

As announced, the February number of the North American Review contained Mr. Fisher's reply to Col. Ingersoll's assault upon Christianity. As it is put forward as the best the church can do, we may revert to it at some future time. At present we hav room only to giv two secular opinions. Under the head of "A Dangerous Defender" the New York Sun says:

"The Rev. George P. Fisher, one of the professors in the Yale Divinity School at New Haven, makes, in the February North American Review, a reply of fifty pages in length to Robert G. Ingersoll's assaults upon Christianity previously printed in the same review, and incompletely answered by the Hon. Jeremiah S. Black. We do not know how his performance impresses other people, but it seems to us to be as far off as Mr. Black's was from silencing the audacious Infidel and dissipating his arguments.

"The ground taken by Prof. Fisher at the commencement is a practical abandonment to his opponent of the vital point in dispute:

"'The question respecting any creed proposed for belief, whether in religion, or philosophy, or science, is whether the reasons for it are stronger than the reasons against it, and whether they are enough stronger to satisfy credence. Christianity asks no more for itself than is conceded to every other system and theory.'

"That is, Christianity is not a divinely revealed system of doctrin, demanding reverential faith, but one concerning which we must weigh probabilities and form an opinion, as we would concerning any other subject. Consequently, Prof. Fisher vindicates it from Mr. Ingersoll's charge of having caused great misery and bloodshed on earth, by saying that human love and human government hav done the same. Mr. Ingersoll asserts that Christianity is a humanly contrived system, and therefore imperfect. It is susceptible of perversion, and has been perverted to the grossest cruelties. Prof. Fisher says the same, and to that extent backs up Ingersoll!

"In regard to the inspiration of the Bible, Prof. Fisher is equally unreserved in his concessions. The Old Testament was merely provisional, and its laws 'fell short of the absolute standard of moral duty.' The gospels, he says, were not written until years after Christianity was complete, and no one holds that they were dictated to the writers by the deity. That they contain no condemnation of slavery is because such a condemnation would hav been injudicious and perilous at that time. 'When all the literary evidence is scanned and all the collateral proofs weighed, the conclusion will be that we hav presented to us in the gospels the story which the apostles told of what they had seen and heard in their intercourse with Jesus!' Yes; but did they observe carefully and tell accurately? Prof. Fisher says Yes! Mr. Ingersoll says No! And, the divine inspiration of the New Testament being admitted by its advocate to amount to nothing, the record becomes insufficient to settle the dispute.

"After these wholesale surrenders to the enemy, Prof. Fisher's eulogium of Christianity, and his picture of the melancholy condition of mankind without religion, are of small moment.

"The difference between Prof. Fisher and Col. Ingersoll appears to be merely a difference in degree."

The following extract from an editorial in last Sunday's Truth shows in what estimation that paper holds Fisher and his work:

"Prof. Fisher's article in the February number of the North American Review, though the third of the series that has appeared in that periodical on 'The Christian Religion,' is in no sense a reply to the article by Colonel Ingersoll, which preceded it.

"It is a remarkable circumstance that Judge Black, who met Ingersoll so valiantly at first, soon left the field in a pet, and that Prof. Fisher declares at the outset that he will not enter into the controversy. It would indicate that the controversial talent which was once so marked a feature of the Christian church disappeared with racks and thumbscrews.

"Professor Fisher's article is not a defense of the Christian religion; it is only a resume of it from a standpoint by Prof. Fisher.

"He claims all the advances of civilization as results of the beneficent influence of Christianity, complacently overlooking the effects of material development, and declaring that all those obstructions which the Christian church has opposed to the moral and intellectual growth of the world were the work of 'undiscerning or interested clergymen and churches.'

"At the outset, almost, Prof. Fisher says that Christians are not all agreed in their opinions, and it is unreasonable to expect them to concur on all points. In illustration of this he takes the example of some Christians who hold that everything that is said in the scriptures is correct and of divine authority, while others hold that, whatever biblical writers knew of the physical world, they accommodated their language to the science of their time; and others, again, hold that in the Bible are positiv errors in science, which, however, do not militate against its authority as a teacher of moral and religious truth. None of these are to be denied the name of Christians. The points are not essential points. From all of which we are led to infer that the Christian religion is based upon the essential points of the Bible, and is not affected by the errors in non-essential points. But what are the essential points? Is each man to judge for himself, or will Prof. Fisher judge for all? Is not the divine origin of the Bible an essential point? Then the question arises, How shall we know it is of divine origin? There are but two ways—first, the assertions of Christians; second, its own intrinsic worth as evidence. The first is of no value, for Prof. Fisher himself concludes that Christians disagree, some asserting its divinity as a whole, and some as to a part only. And if we look for the intrinsic proof we thus first weigh those portions about which we can hav absolute knowledge, and, if we find it erroneous as to science and history, we must certainly reject its claims to a divine origin to that extent; for God would not hav taught mankind false science any more than he would hav taught false morals or false religion. If, again, we look at its moral features, and find it approving of barbarities from which civilized men recoil, we must reject its pretensions to that extent also. And having weighed it in these respects, and found it wanting, shall we yet accept it as an authoritativ teacher of other subjects? If its science is false and its morals are barbarous, are we forthwith to hail it as a revelation of divine religion?

"When Prof. Fisher asks 'What is there bad in religion?' he should specify the religion to which he refers, for there are many religions. At this point, however, he defines it by a quotation from the Old Testament, 'to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly before thy God.' If that was religion there would be nothing bad in it. But that is not the Christian religion. Christianity, according to Prof. Fisher himself, is a belief 'in the supernatural mission of Jesus in his divine sonship, in the authority of his teaching and of the teaching of his apostles, in his spotless excellence, in his miracles, in his death and resurrection.' Prof. Fisher should hav added that it is also a belief that this belief is necessary to salvation from everlasting punishment.

"Perhaps there is nothing inherently bad in the Christian religion thus defined. Neither is there in counting beads, nor in any of the theological gymnastics of the people of Eastern nations whom Prof. Fisher regards as heathen. But it must hav exerted a bad influence upon its followers, nevertheless, or they would not hav been guilty of the atrocities which hav been committed in the name of the Christian religion, and approved by its teachers, from the Inquisition to the Southern slave pen; nor would they hav set themselvs in opposition to nearly all the great moral and intellectual advances of the world which Prof. Fisher now claims as fruits of Christian influence.

"Prof. Fisher's argument in favor of the divine origin of the Bible in one respect is singular. He says that if we recognize its reformatory purpose—that it was not to transform society by a miracle—we shall hav no difficulty in explaining the brutality and immorality of the Old Testament. This sort of logic would make out the case of every reformer who pretends to be inspired. As well assert that all history is inspiration because it is a record of gradnal growth from barbarism to civilization.

"It is very strange, too, if it be true, as Prof. Fisher says, that the direct influence of Christianity abolished modern slavery; that nearly all the Christians were advocates of modern slavery until it was abolished, and nearly all the Infidels abolitionists. It must hav been more the indirect than the direct influence of Christianity that accomplished the great reform.

"Prof. Fisher suggests various reasons for the destruction of the Canaanites, but he omits the most important. He refers to their vileness and impurity, their cruelty, and so on. But he overlooks the fact that the Israelites had a keen eye for Canaanite real estate about that time.

"We hav not the space to follow out Prof. Fisher's sophistry any further. There is no attempt to meet the indictment, no pretense of a logical defence of the claims of Christianity to a divine origin. The paper is a general appropriation by the author of all that is good in the world to the credit of Christianity, and a relegation of what is bad to the imperfection of humanity and the evil influences of other religions.

"All that goes for argument with him is of a kind with what he fondly imagins is an irresistible blow of his intellectual sledge-hammer. At the close he says, 'Are men who are thus advanced in the intellectual scale and in the affections of the heart to be satisfied with a merely mundane existence? Can they content themselvs to liv in this way, with no wider horizon, and then to pass out of being?' The simple answer to which is that they may be or they may not, it matters little which, inasmuch as neither their desires nor their discontent can giv them immortality if they are not already endowed with it, nor take it away if they are."

Mr Bennett finds so much that is new and interesting in the far-away East that he has concluded he cannot get it all in two volumes, and so there will be three. Volume I. will include all up to the Chronicles, and has already appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We shall at once make up the volume and as soon as the illustrations are ready, hav it printed and sent to the subscribers to the fund. In a few weeks all who hav paid the five dollars will receive the first volume, and the remaining two as soon as completed.

The "form" in which the names are printed will be left to the last to giv all who wish a chance to subscribe and hav their names in the first volume. All names accompanied with the five dollars received between now and the 20th of February will appear in the first volume. We hope to see a very much increased list, and shall take pleasure in adding new names.

Liberal News.

MRS. J. V. MANSFIELD is again very ill.

SPIRITUALISM is increasing in the South.

THE Mirror of Progress has stopped for lack of support.

THE Liberals of Flint, Mich., will celebrate Paine's birthday on the 29th.

JUDGE A. SCHELL, late of Albany, lectured at Modesto, Cal., on the 10th.

WILL Mr. John T. Gray be kind enough to send his address to this office?

THE Spiritual Reasoner has suspended, owing to the illness of the editor and proprietor, J. D. McLennan.

EVERY Liberal in the city should attend Mrs. Colby's lectures Sunday evenings at the Harvard Rooms.

A WESTERN paper says a man needn't know much to make a popular minister. The editor must hav had Talmage in his mind.

COL. JOHN R. KELSO has reached Modesto, Cal. The Liberal cause is growing in that place, and the 29th will be duly honored.

HUGH BYRON BROWN will deliver the next lecture before the Society of Humanity, at Science Hall, on the 29th. His subject is "Positiv Principles and Financial Theories."

OUR friend James Bridger, of Newark, N. Y., was married in Rochester on the 1st, the bride being Miss Bertha E. Duncan, of the latter place, and the ceremony was performed in a secular manner by Judge Sill.

THE Board of Revision of taxes of Pennsylvania has decided that parsonages and church property not forming an integral part of a church are subject to taxation, and will be assessed. This is good so far as it goes, but it don't go far enough. Churches should be included.

DR. J. B. TENNEY, of Dunedin, Fla., one of our subscribers, is detained in this city, to see to the completion of his yacht, and will sail thither in the early spring. He will be pleased to giv any information he can to parties seeking that most charming country for either pleasure or permanent settlement. He will be found at the Liberal Club Friday evenings, and communications will reach him at 209 W. 20th st., care of James Bagley, Esq. His plantation is on the sea-shore near Tampa Bay, and he livs part of his time in "The Cottage by the Sea."

The Movement in Favor of Ignorance.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Probably everybody knows that the church is opposed to knowledge. But it may not be so generally known that many of her leading spirits are opposed to it activly as well as passivly—that there is a positiv movement in favor of ignorance. That's my discovery! There is such a movement; and though it seems the end could only occur to a fool, I assure you the means are chosen with all that proverbial caution, sagacity, and firmness which belong to priests as an organized body. The idea of reconciling science and theology is becoming unpopular, and the church is cutting loose from it, and returning to attack the inductiv philosophy with her old weapons of ridicule, misrepresentation, and persecution.

About persecution you know something; but giv me time to point a moral. That vast extension of the laws against obscenity effected, or nearly so, by the efforts of Comstock in the lobby of Congress, and the decisions of a few judges like Clark and Benedict, has virtually made it penal to discuss any physiological questions except within the limits prescribed by the "regular" school of medicin. Surely this was accomplishing a great deal, but it is quite likely even you do not see the profound judgment which dictated this move—not taken, you may be sure, without a great deal of previous discussion among the conspirators. The support of the "regular" practitioners—a most powerful veiled interest—is secured at once. And it is not too much to say that if the laws which imprisoned Bennett and Bradlaugh can be loosely construed, but strictly enforced, for twenty years throughout England and America, this would kill science in those countries. Life can be destroyed by a bandage as well as a wound. Let science become "cabinned, cribbed, confined, to saucy doubts and fears;" let its cultivation be forced to go gingerly, lest they tread on Aunt Priscilla's trail or Brother Bullneck's corns, and, mighty as it now appears, it will be henceforth but a blind Sampson, wearing out his life in prison. In proof of this, I will not cite instances so old as the destruction of the sciences in Egypt or India by their priestly trammels, or in the Roman empire by Christianity. Only some thirty years ago, scientific secularism had made so much progress in Denmark that a large proportion of the tax-supported clergy adopted it, and members of the legislature proposed changing the churches into higher schools. It was then the famous word "neology" originated, signifying the corruption of Christianity by new words, which made it very different from what it seemed. What became of Danish neology? Chambers's Encyclopedia says it died "of its own shallowness." Very probably. It deserved it. The Danish preachers who lectured about agriculture and history, soon found that both Christian and Infidel hearers only judged them "deep" enough for a day's sensation. But suppose they had talked of marriage, heredity, and divorce? I guess there would hav been no complaint of "shallowness" then. That would hav made a row. Perish reform which has not snap enough to make a row!

The minor weapon of ridicule is being vigorously used for the purpose of discouraging knowledge. I do not speak now of that mere foolishness which ignorance, never before disturbed, pours upon Darwin and other revolutionary discoverers. If you will giv a little study (as I hav done) to the Christian Statesman (the God-in-the-Constitution organ of Milwaukee), the Ladies' Repository (a widely-circulated Methodist magazine for women of education), the Advance, the New York Observer, etc., you will find them full of insinuations that the revelations of geology—nay, even the heliocentric theory of the planetary system, are not so certain as the word science implies. You see the effect. When educated, or rather half-educated, people are taught to suspect that science is a good bit of humbug, they will either verify its claims for themselvs, or cease to be interested in it and to desire to hav it taught their children. The first may happen one time in a million. This is part of the God-in-the-Constitution movement.

Absurd as it seems to talk of argument against demonstration, the church, wiser in her own way then we, takes the measure of human minds, and sees that most of them are more accessible to anything else than the strict reasonings of science. Rev. John Jasper is, of course, an ignoramus. But does the church repudiate him as such? No, indeed. The papers above mentioned giv the warmest praise to such men's godliness, dodge their queer notions, or good-naturedly joke about them, or guardedly insinuate that they may turn out right after all. Such men are doing immense service to Christianity. He has not read history aright who thinks that, because they are ignorant, vulgar, and ungrammatical, they can do no harm. When Jasper ousted Copernicus from the negro churches, the godly darkies (who can vote) enjoyed the biggest revival on record. When the people about Bald Mountain, N. C., were alarmed at some noises (which were afterward traced to blasting operations at a great distance), preachers flocked to the place from every quarter, the church got lots of money out of the poor frightened "corn-crackers," and the priests were rewarded in conscience, and also temporally, for not using their knowledge to dispel the delusion, by seeing a great church established in this wild "moonshining" region. Thus ignorance brings preachers money, and preachers use the money to expel every gleam of light from the places they can still control. And how many of such places are there? Do not imagin that they are limited to the habitations of negroes and crackers. The truth is that the knowledge of scientific methods is very little taught to people fairly, or even what is called well, educated. You remember Joe Cook and Wilford Hall? The way in which their absolute nonsense was received, even by college professors, shows how much more science is talked about than studied. And the church, in her new line of operations, is taking care to hav it just as little studied as possible. With ostentatious fairness, she admits the works of Tyndall and other authors, which are bound to be read any way, into libraries where the directors are clergymen; but she takes care to keep out everything of an innovating character which is not yet able to force an entrance. Similarly, she sends out scientific lecturers, but these lecturers dodge evolution, season their discourses with theology, exhibit electricity and chemistry as mere toys, and, above all, steer clear of anything like the inductiv method, and cleave firmly to the dogmatical object-lessons of the Sunday-school.

Thus, by shutting off all science from social matters, excluding it as much as possible from the educational system, giving all the encouragement practicable to Jasper, Moody, and other men who positivly boast of ignorance, and declare they need no library but the Bible; and, above all, teaching that science must be taught superficially, and without giving the students any insight into those processes which make its assertions anything more than dogmas, the leaders of the movement hope to raise a generation disposed to think in dogmas and willing to make Christianity part of the statute law; after which, by the temporary combination of all sects, the progress of science could be effectually stopped, and the railroads and telegraphs of the nineteenth century be bequeathed to a twentieth century too idle and sensual to add anything to them.

I do not believe the scheme can succeed. But, given the combined efforts of Catholic and Protestant Jesuits, the definitness of the aim, the coherence of the means, the immense amount of money, power, and prejudice, all ready at hand, the vast and unexpected success which the enemy has already achieved in the new postal laws, his pertinacious return to the attack whenever temporarily checked, and the awful consequences of his possible triumph, I think it is time to take a stronger position than we hav yet done. We must expose the wickedness, of whose existence few hav any idea; we must insist more vigorously on liberty of the press and the mails, no matter who is scared; we must, above all, make it a point to advance real scientific teaching, which is the heavy artillery of knowledge, and not waste strength in skirmishing, to the neglect of this capital point. Christianity and Infidelity hav been struggling now a long time; the former may or may not be as hopelessly on its last legs as statistics and recent literature seem to indicate; but one thing, at least, is certain: that each has done best when it stood firmest—Infidelity on new truth, Christianity on time-honored absurdity. When Christianity tries to get "reconciled" to science, it falls into deserved contempt. When science spares Christianity, it "dies of its own shallowness"—and ought to die. The recent change of front of the church shows that she has got good leaders. May ours not be found wanting.

C. L. JAMES.

[From the Cloud County Blade.]

The Radical Pulpit.

This book is of more than usual importance just at the present time because of the alleged recantation from his radical position of one of the authors, Mr. Frothingham. Every intelligent person would like to know the extent of the defection from the Liberal ranks of so able and eloquent a man as is Mr. Frothingham. Liberals want to investigate the matter and determin for themselvs whether or not Mr. Frothingham succeeded in getting himself entirely free from the old scow of orthodoxy before he jumped on board again, and the "believers" want to know where he stood and what he said when startling the world with his pulpit eloquence, that they may hav arguments to hurl at "Infidels."

Mr. Frothingham says he has not gone back to any position he had abandoned, and what doctrins, or teachings of theology has he abandoned? This question can be answered by reading this book, which will be found to be exceedingly interesting.

The sermons are on the subjects, "New Song of Christmas," a part of which we gave last week; the "Departed Years," "Life as a Test of Creed," "The Sectarian Spirit," "The American Gentleman," "Language of the Old Testament," "The Dogma of Hell," "Value of the Higher Sentiments," "The American Lady," and "The Consolations of Rationalism."

Professor Felix Adler is one of the foremost thinkers of the day, his lectures the very best, always entertaining, interesting, useful. Among the collection in this book we find, "The Ethics of the Social Question," "Emancipation," "Our Leaders," "Hav We still a Religion?" "Conscience," etc.

We giv below an extract from his lecture on "Conscience:"

"I remember also one of the despised race of the Jews, one not known, as these are known, but who should be known, who deserves to be ranked with the great and good, and whose story I long to tell in closing He was very young; twenty, five summers had passed over him. He was highly connected, highly gifted, learned, and, what was better, loved. He heard that his people were persecuted in a far land, and he set sail to aid and free them. In a certain Portuguese port the vessel was boarded by the officers of Inquisition. He was dragged to Lisbon and thrown into a dungeon of that dark tribunal. The authorities of Inquisition were anxious to save him and win him over to their faith. They promised, they besought, they threatened, they tortured him in vain; they could not shake his resolution. At last they condemned him to die by fire. It was a fine morning late in December in the year 1647. An eager crowd pressed through the streets of Lisbon to the great plaza. It was near the time of the birth of Christ. There was to be a great festival that day—an auto-da-fe—in honor of the god of love, in which martyrs should be burned unto the Lord. A dense multitude were now gathered, the procession moved on, the priests in their long robes, the soldiery, and in their midst the young De Castro; such was his name. He stood still and calm on the place of execution. The fagots were heaped about him. The priest stepped up, showed him the crucifix, and called on him to "repent, recant," even now before it was too late. He answered not a word. Again the cross was shown him, and again he remained silent. Then the burning brand was thrown upon the fagots, they caught fire, flames rose high, the smoke wreathed and curled about its victim. For the third time the priest presented the crucifix and cried, "Repent, repent, and save thy soul!" A great hush fell upon the throng. Then from amid the flames and smoke rang out into the silence, loud and clear, these words, "Hear, Israel! God, our God, is one!" And not an eye remained tearless in that great assembly. The flames sank down and the multitude dispersed and silently went to their homes and whispered one to another those terrible words which sounded like an accusing conscience in their ears, "Hear, Israel!" and so profound was the impression that the officers of the Inquisition issued an edict forbidding, under heavy penalty, that the words "Hear, Israel," should be uttered in the streets of Lisbon."

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 69.

761. Constantine is shown by Gibbon, in his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" (vol. ii, chap. xx), to hold that the fundamental doctrines of Christianity had been earlier made known to the pagans.

762. Arnobias, a prominent Christian teacher of the third century, seems not to have believed Christian morality superior to pagan morality. He said, "If Cicero's works had been read as they ought to have been there would have been no need of Christian writers."

763. Lactantius, another learned and influential Christian Father and teacher of the third century, said, "If there had been any to collect the truth which was scattered among sects and individuals [pagans] into one, and to have reduced it into a system, there would, indeed, have been no difference between him and us" (book ii).

764. St. Augustine, the ablest polemic writer of the Christian Fathers of the fourth century, evidently did not believe that Christianity had much claim to originality. He said: "The same which is now called the Christian religion really was known to the ancients, nor was wanting at any time, even from the beginning of the human race, until the time Christ came in the flesh, from whence the true religion, not as having been wanting in former times, but having in later times received a new name" (Oper. Aust., vol. i, p. 12).

765. This admission of Augustine was confirmed by Faustus, a Christian bishop, who addressed the former thus: "You have substituted your Agapæ for the sacrifices of the pagans; and for their idols your martyrs that you serve with the same honors; you appease the shades of the dead with wine and feasts; you celebrate the solemn festivals of the Gentiles, their calends and their solstices; and as to their manners, those you have retained without any alteration. Nothing distinguishes you from the Gentiles except that you assemble apart from them."

766. Abulmerar evidently did not believe any more than I do in the originality of the Christian virgin and child, but knew the idea was taken from pagans. He said: "We have in the first decades the sign of the virgin, following the most ancient traditions of the Persians, the Chaldeans, the Egyptians, Hermes and Esculapius, a young woman called in the Persian language Seclinidos de Darrama; in the Arabic, Adunedfa—that is to say a chaste, pure, immaculate virgin, suckling an infant, which some nations call Jesus, but which we in Greek call Christ." The representations of Isis, the Egyptian Madonna, and her infant Horus were taken from Egypt to Rome in the first Christian century and were used for the Virgin Mary and Jesus, and served as the models for the millions of Christian Madonnas—virgin and child—that have since been turned out, and with which Christendom has been filled.

767. I do not believe that the doctrine of the Trinity was first a Christian doctrine. It was a thousand years earlier taught by the Hindoos in their Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; by the Persians in their Ormuzd, Astarte, and Mithra; by the Egyptians in their Osiris, Isis, and Horus. In fact, nearly every ancient pagan religion had their trinities and triads.

768. I do not believe that Jesus was the first son of a God, or demi-god believed to have been begotten by a god. Among such characters believed in from 500 to a thousand years before the existence of Christianity are Christna, Rama, and Buddha, of India; Mithra, of Persia; Horus, of Egypt; Thammuz, of Syria; Crete, of Chaldea; Apollo, Mercury, Mars, Prometheus, Hercules, Vulcan, Perseus, Theseus, and many others of Greece; Hesus, of the Druids; Thor and Balder, of the Scandinavians; Quirinus, of Rome, and many others too numerous to mention. These were all divinely begotten.

769. I do not believe that Jesus was the first demi-god believed to have been crucified as an atonement and propitiation to the gods for the sins of the world. Among those who were believed to have been crucified from 500 to 1200 years before the Christian era, and prominent among them, were Christna, Thammuz, Iao, Prometheus, and several others of those just named.

770. Jesus was not the first demi-god at whose birth the stars performed office. The same was claimed for several of the sons of gods before the Christian demi-god.

771. Jesus was not the first demi-god said to have been born in a stable, or in a cave—for it is claimed that he was born both in a stable and in a cave—for the same was much earlier claimed for others of the demi-gods.

772. Jesus was not the first whose birth was announced by angels and shepherds. This was previously claimed for others.

773. Jesus was not the first demi-god believed in to whom wise men, or magi, paid their respects in early infancy. The same was much earlier claimed for Mithra, and others.

774. The 25th of December was not originally the birthday of the Christian demi-god, nor originally a Christian festival. Mithra, or the sun, was believed by the ancient Persians to have been born at that time, when the sun, after sinking to the lowest point in the winter solstice, begins to rise from night, or death, and may be said to be born anew. The 25th of December on this account was a great festival day, or holiday, not only among the Persians, but among several other nations, particularly the Druids, the ancient Romans, and several others. It was celebrated with great pomp, ceremony, and rejoicing, and was very popular with the people. For this reason the early Christian Fathers chose it for a Christian festival, and fixed the birth of Jesus upon that day. There is the greatest diversity of opinion among early Christian authorities as to the time when Jesus was born, nearly every month of the year being claimed as the month he was born in. If he was born at all, probably it was not on the 25th of December.

775. Jesus was not the first to have such titles as these applied to him: The Most High, The Lord of Life, Son of God, Holy Living God, Mediator, Savior, Redeemer, Redeemer of the World, the Lamb of God, the Ram of God, the Holy Lamb, the True Light, the Sun of Righteousness, Light of Men, Guide to the Erring, Advocate with the Father, etc. These and many similar terms were applied to pagan demi-gods long before they were to Jesus.

776. The claim that a child was saved from destruction when all the other infants were killed, was not first made in his case. This was specially made in the case of Christna, about a thousand years earlier, who was also born among the shepherds, as well as similar stories with regard to other sons of gods.

777. The retirement in the wilderness for a forty-days' fast, and the subsequent temptation by thedevil, were reported of others long before Jesus.

778. Jesus was not the only demi-god who was believed to perform miracles. This claim has been stoutly made for every son of god which men have believed in.

779. Jesus was not the only savior or divine teacher who had a band of disciples to follow him about and listen to him. This was claimed for Christna, Buddha, and many others of those characters.

780. Jesus was not the first to teach multitudes in villages, on the highways, in the fields, and in the wilderness. The same was claimed for Christna, Buddha, Confucius, and many others.

781. It was not first claimed for Jesus that at his crucifixion he sun was darkened, and that an earthquake took place. This was before claimed at the death of others of god's sons. Matthew is the only evangelist who says anything about such a circumstance having taken place at the death of Jesus, and it is thought the writer of that gospel adapted the story from the older legends.

782. It was not first reported of Jesus that he descended into hell after his death. This was before claimed for others.

783. Jesus was not the first to have it claimed for him that he arose from the dead, and appeared again among his followers. Similar claims were earlier made for others.

784. Jesus was not the first crucified savior for whom it was claimed that he ascended up to heaven. The same claim was earlier made for other oriental saviors.

785. The belief in a Holy Ghost is not original in Christianity. The same idea was much earlier entertained in some of he eastern countries.

786. The belief in a future life was not first taught by Jesus, nor believed in by Christians. It is as old as religious belief, and was pointedly believed in by the Hindoos, the Persians, the Egyptians, the Grecians, the Romans, the Scandinavians, and many other nations.

787. Jesus was not the first to teach about the existence of a devil and evil spirits. A belief in demons and devils is one of the oldest among mankind. The Hindoos taught it, and so did the Persians, the Egyptians, and nearly all other nations. The Hindoos had their Ravenna and Rakshasas, the Persians their Ahriman, and devs and arch-devs; the Egyptians their Typhon, the Greeks their Pluto, and Scandinavians their Loke, and nearly every other nation their prime devils and lesser devils.

788. The Christians were not the first to believe in hell. Every nation named had their place of unhappiness for the wicked; but the Christian zealots, in their intensity of cruelty, made their hell more monstrous and horrible than the hell of any other nation. But the idea was a borrowed one.

789. In the same way angels and good spirits were not first believed in by Christians, nor was Jesus the first to teach them. They were believed in more than a thousand years sooner by pagan nations.

790. Heaven, or a place of happiness, was not first taught by Jesus, nor believed in by his followers. The belief was entertained by pagan nations for more than a thousand years before Christianity existed.

791. The cross, as a religious symbol, was not first used by Christians. It was in use in India, Thibet, Egypt, and other countries long, long before the Christian era. It is believed to have originated in sex-worship far more than a thousand years before Christianity.

792. The personalized idea of "the word," or "Logos," was not a Christian expression. It is of pagan origin. John is the only gospel writer who has anything to say of it, and there are strong grounds for believing he borrowed the thought and the language from Plato, who existed five hundred years earlier.

793. Baptism by water was not first practiced by Christians. It is an old pagan ceremony, and for more than five hundred years earlier than Christianity baptizing and purifying by water was followed in the Ganges and in the Nile.

794. The belief that the Holy Ghost descended in the form of a dove is not Christian in origin. It is an old pagan legend.

Liberty, Science, and Humanity.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

THE SCIENTIFIC CONCEPTION OF GOD.

Under the subjective order we are compelled at the first step to ask to what end, and how, human life and effort should be directed and conducted. This brings up the next question, Whither? That is, what should be, and must be, the grand central object, the GOD, or unity, to which, by which, and in relation to which, all human affairs must be solved?

To this question, as the highest of human existence, all ages and religions have given only such answers as their knowledge permitted. But as to the necessity of a new answer, if Man is to be more than an animal—if he is to sustain his higher and civilized life as MAN—there has been, and is now, no serious question among scientists and sociologists.

What is the object and destiny of Man on earth? That is the main question which Science, too, has come to ask, and this general concurrence in asking it makes it our second Harmony under the subjective order, viz:

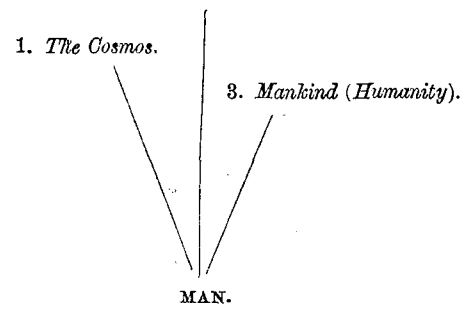
II.—THE DISCOVERY AND APPRECIATION OF THE REAL GOD OR UNITY OF THE HUMAN RACE MUST PRECEDE ALL SUCCESSFUL EFFORTS AT THE SOLUTION OF HUMAN LIFE—COLLECTIVE OR INDIVIDUAL.

The NEW FAITH, as did every form of religion or practical Philosophy of the old faiths, must begin with positing, its summum bonum, its highest object, God, and central attraction, or it can never hold the social world together, much less control and direct its future progress through the depths of time. It is from this main source and motive of human life that all of its relations are deduced and legislated upon.

Even the extent and nature of our thoughts and knowledge of the objective world, to a far greater extent than is commonly supposed, depend upon this central subjective nature and point of view. Our God is our center, from whence our world is solved. It is the only point of view from whence we look upon it. It can never be too often repeated that the world as we know it is at bottom only our subjective synthesis. It is the world only as it appears to us even in its most objective aspect. The external objective world is only our objective, assumed as such by us. Man regards his involuntary sensations as matter and forces foreign to him and separate from him, and therefore as a world independent of and objective to him.

How necessary, important, and practical a new discovery of God must be is well pointed out by the great Descartes (1596–1650), the founder of modern Philosophy. In founding modern thought he began with his sanction of "universal doubt," and his great maxim, "I think, therefore I am." After he had taken these two steps, he found they led to the third, the discovery of the true God, as the inevitable foundation of any Philosophy of life. His words, wonderful from their grasp and weight, are as true now as then, and give the question which Science in its advance must re-solve, if it would gain the solution of our perplexing world and life. His fundamental words are these:

"And thus I very clearly see that the certitude and truth of all science depend on the knowledge alone of the true God; insomuch that, before I knew Him, I could have no perfect knowledge of any other thing. And now that I know Him, I possess the means of acquiring a perfect knowledge respecting innumerable matters, as well relative to God himself, and other intellectual objects, as to corporeal nature" (Descartes' "Meditations," section 5).



That "the times are out of joint," means that the old conception of God, even the modified conception that seemed so sufficient to Descartes, is found to be untrue to the intellect, and inconsistent with moral and social progress.

There is no alternative for scientific men but to reverently review this fundamental conception, and indicate the direction in which changes and modifications are compelled to take place by the advance of science. There can be no order, nor hope, nor inspiration in the human or moral world until science indicates the real true center, or God, upon which that world truly scientifically depends, and under which its order and progress must be secured. This was the third step of Descartes, and it must be our third step also

What, then, is the verdict and harmony of science upon this vital issue? It is, in substance this:

III.—THAT THE OLD AND SIMPLE, BUT FALSE, CONCEPTION OF GOD, LIKE EVERYTHING ELSE UNDER THE PROGRESS AND ANALYSIS OF SCIENCE, HAS UNDERGONE DISINTEGRATION AND DIFFERENTIATION.

The old idea of God, in fact, has fallen into three factors. Man has in turn deified three great objects, viz: As Man looks out upon the world, the farthest from him lies the Infinite Space (the Grand Miliew), then the Cosmos, and next to him the Human Race. Each of these are immensely beyond and above him. To each of these he had trusted as his God, and he will ever look up to each of them with wonder, fear, awe, reverence, and, if possible, with love. He will ever stand in this position before this inevitable Trinity upon which depend his fate and destiny.

As man looks up he sees:

1. At first he attempted to interpret the Cosmic world so as to guide human life by that. The emphasis was first placed upon the material world above man, and with what result? Fetichism, Animism, Naturism, Cosmism, Materialism, were successively the consequences of this view of the world.

If man attempts to regulate life according to and by the imagined wills, or real properties, or laws, of the Material World, such will be the conclusions forced upon him.

2. But, finally, he will conclude that one will, or God, dominates all of the subordinate wills, or gods, who control this external world. He will pass from Fetichism to Polytheism, and Monotheism. That one God must (as shown in the last lecture) be imagined outside of the "universe," and his designs, wishes, and commands must be the only true knowledge or guide of life, if they can be known at all. Theology, which is this supposed knowledge, is the result and completion of Fetichism, and has its center in a supposed personality of the Infinite.

3. But suppose that the emphasis in explaining the world is placed upon the third factor—Man—the human race as a whole, past, present, and future, i. e., Humanity, what kind of religion must arise? Evidently a new one in many important respects. It must be a new faith; and if science indicates that the emphasis is now rightly placed there, it must be the New Faith.

That such is the fact; that science is really in harmony in regard to each of these God factors; that it gives the true value to each; and that it founds, and is compelled to found, the Religion of Humanity, MAN as its center and unity, we shall next proceed to show.

FRIEND MACDONALD: I see by the tab on my paper that my ticket on board your ship has expired. Inclosed you will five dollars, and I want a ticket that will carry me on board your ship as long as that will pay for. I want THE TRUTH SEEKER to prosper, spreading the light of reason until the last vestige of superstition is wiped out and man steps forth free from its poisonous breath. Long may you wave!

Yours truly, A. D. CORNWELL.

MR. EDITOR: Toldoth Jeshu received. I consider it the most valuable contribution to Freethought literature and am glad to see this third edition issued. It will always sell, and it is almost a total eclips of the Christian's gospel. B.

SOUTH DARTMOUTH, MASS., Jan. 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In my article of Dec. 25th, which appears in THE TRUTH SEEKER of this week, the name of one of the advocates of Freethought at the village of Russell's Mills, in this town, should hav been printed Oliver H. Seabury, instead of Oliver H. Seaburg, as it appears in the paper. Very likely, in writing the article, I hurriedly penned the name in such a manner as to convey the impression that Seaburg was the correct method of spelling it. Further on please read "Baptist church" instead of "Baptist village," which is one of the trio-churches in this village of South Dartmouth, as it is sometimes called "Padanaran," and has been shut up for a long term of years. Please insert this brief communication. Very truly, EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

STATE COLLEGE, PA., Jan. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Indeed I cannot explain how sad I feel for not getting THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 24th. As I said, I hav been long in Eastern countries, and you can imagin how pleasant it is to read about those places, the sayings and remarks of our very wise and singular D. M. Bennett; therefore I ask you to be kind enough to giv me a few lines in your worthy paper through which to represent to your friends and readers my very deep sadness; and I hope that one out of the many Liberals and good-hearted friends will please loan me for a short time THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 24th, wherein commences the description of Constantinople. I will return it.

Yours truly, P. F. NSHIKAN.

EDEN MILLS, VT., Jan. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $2.45 for the "Apocryphal New Testament," "Trial of D. M. Bennett," "When Were the Gospels Written?" by Bradlaugh, and "The Crimes of Preachers." I believe there are no class of men in existence, or ever has been, that hav been the cause of so much ignorance, superstition, and bloodshed as the sheiks, priests, or clergy. I am inclined to hope they are losing their power for mischief; but they are losing it quite too slowly. Parents that hav got the films somewhat from their eyes, and the shackles from their limbs, are too slow and heedless in regard to the right cultivation of their children. Too willingly their children go with the tide if it is popular (if it should lead them to an orthodox hell), thinking that when their children become older they will select the good from the bad. That I consider quite wrong; for, when the wrong or bad is instilled into their young minds, it is hard for them, when they become older, to eradicate their early impressions, though they may be quite dogmatic and unreasonable. It should not be expected that the stream will be purer than the fountain-head unless the stream is purified by some artificial process.

Now the fountain-head to all Protestantism is the Bible, a book lined with traditions. It teaches and upholds all kinds of sin and iniquity. Slavery, polygamy, slaying men, women, and children; licentiousness, and obscenity. Such teaching engenders wickedness. The clergyman at the head, the members at his feet. Point the priest to the absurdities of the Bible and he will turn his eyes upward, and say, "O my son you are so unregenerate!" Point the contradictions to the members of the church, they will say and affirm, and state under oath, if need be, there are no contradictions in the Bible; it was inspired by God, and every word is holy. Every idea presented in it is clear as noonday to the converted, who press the book to their bosoms in apparent ecstasy of joy. That is the way the children, after they become older, select the good from the bad by thinking there is no bad in the scriptures. There is a true saying that "as the twig is bent the tree's inclined;" and when the young and tender minds are bent to believe the dogmas taught in the Bible and promulgated by the priests, and made to believe the book holy, sacred, and divine, written by God Almighty himself, it is hard, very hard, to eradicate the early impressions. They may not, perhaps, join the church in their early days, for they hav been taught there is an eleventh-hour system, and they may as well wait until then, provided they subscribe liberally for the priests' support. They go to church every Sunday for various reasons; some to sing, some to see the opposit sex, or show their new dress, but hav no a thought of criticising anything the minister should say, even if it were very ridiculous, but gobble it all down as good gospel; and they hav been taught to believe that if they criticise or doubt a word of the priest's explanation of the scriptures, they are on the broad road to hell; therefore they are brought up to believe it is their Christian duty to stifle all thought or reason that may arise.

Now when we take the fountain-head, the Bible, and its teachings into consideration, it is no wonder to my mind there is so much iniquity in the churches, so little love for humanity outside their church, so much lying, fraud, stealing, and seducing the ewe lambs of their flock by the priests. They make free to slander and say things in their pulpit they would not say in the street.

One priest, not far from here, gave his hearers a feast on Bennettism last Sunday. He told them what an awful man Bennett was; dealt in obscene literature; made that his business so much that the authorities had him arrested, tried, condemned, and sent to prison. Oh, a very wicked man! He said that Anthony, if he came direct from heaven, could not be as pure as he is now, and also that that wicked Ingersoll went to Toronto, Can., to promulgate his Atheism, but the good Christians of Toronto forbad his lecturing, and told him they had a God there. If I learn Ingersoll saw their God, I shall write him for a full description.

I was glad to notice in the New Year's editorial your courage in the Liberal cause. It gave me courage, but I am of the opinion still that there are but few compared with the many that know there is such a paper printed as THE TRUTH SEEKER, or such a man living as D. M. Bennett; and many there are who do know it by the way of such stories as were detailed to them last Sunday, not far from here, in which the man who told them strove to create as bad an impression in the minds of his hearers as he could, leaving the wicked editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER in prison. It is on the same plan the priests deal with Thomas Paine's arguments. They put him on his death-bed, set him to cursing, swearing, and blaspheming God, and repenting that he ever wrote the "Age of Reason," and there they leave him to go into God's heaven No. 2, prepared for the ungodly, all for Christ's sake. Yours as ever in the cause of truth,

C. A. WHITE.

CHENEY, WASH. TER., Jan. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I send a $5 bill for renewal of the paper to George Plumb, Cheney, W. T., and the following books: "Bennett-Mair Discussion," "Ecce Diabolus," and "The Godly Women of the Bible." I hav been waiting patiently to see if these latter excellent articles would be published in book form, that I might lend it to Christian ladies for them to learn something from its clever argument. I want to take a few shares yearly in the Liberal Orphan Home. George Plumb, a Liberal here, will giv $1.00 yearly. I hav often thought how necessary such an institution is that Liberals' children may be free from the poisonous bias of Christianity on their young minds. In case I die and leave my little fatherless girl, I shall now feel easier in mind about her fate. I hope kind-hearted persons, fond of children, will be chosen for the charge, who will govern by kindness alone.

Yours truly, ANNIE EVEREST.

SUPERIOR, NEB., Jan. 14, 1882.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Since the proposition for a Liberal orphan asylum was made by Mr. Butts, only three Liberals hav responded. Is it possible that such an enterprise finds so little interest? The reason must be that a good many think it is not earnestly meant by those who made the proposition.

Now, let me tell you, for my own part, that I am in earnest. My farm which I hav offered for that cause is worth $5,000, and I hav earned it by hard work. Last year it brought $300 rent; this year I will get a third of the crop. I am a single man, and am sixty-two years of age. I would like to do something for the good of Liberalism, but I would like to be independent while I liv, at the same time; therefore, I propose to deed or to giv a bond for a deed on my farm to the Liberal League, if I am insured $200 per annum and allowed two rooms in the big house to liv in the balance of my life; the said asylum to be built on the premises. It is near the center of the United States.

It seems to me that it would be very easy to raise the necessary funds to build whatever the Liberals wish to erect.

Giv a start, my friends. I am sure there are many generous hearts among Liberals, and if every one will do what he can, we will soon hav a good thing of it.

If I hear nothing of my proposition being accepted, I will sell the farm; if I sell, I promise $1,000 for this cause. Now, friends, reflect, and answer for the good of humanity, Yours truly, A. MINSKI.

DETROIT, MICH., Jan. 1, 1882.

FRIEND MCDONALD: Inclosed please find $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER from Nov. 30th. I hav let it run longer than I ought, or intended. I do not like to read other people's papers; I like to own them before I read them. I am sorry that you are obliged to send out bills to your friends. I cannot see any reason why we should not hav United States full legal-tender paper money enough in circulation to pay all debts, and hav no more debts. If it is wrong for a man to be in debt, it must be wrong for fifty millions of people to be in debt. You have an item in the last issue of your paper as a joke, that silver dollars with holes in them are unpleasantly numerous, but that holes without any silver dollars are still more painfully abundant. I think that if you would adopt the matter at the head of one column of the Irish World, that the use of money as usury is theft, you would set many thinkers to thinking. For many years past the head-line to one column of the Irish World has read, "Usury is Theft." This is plain sense, to my mind, and the only way to stop interest, or usury, is for the government to pay its own debt and supply its people with a full legal-tender money in sufficient amount to pay all debts at once, and hav no necesssity to borrow. If this were so, there would not be so many men in this country claiming more wealth than many millions of their fellow-men. There are many corporations in this country who employ four, five, or six hundred men and women, and pay them on the 10th or 15th of the second month; thus holding the year round many thousand dollars of the money belonging to those who are barely able to liv. This is wrong. I know a corporation that thus holds money enough to do a very large business. They declare large dividends among themselvs from the profits thus made on the use of the money that belongs to poor men and women. The government that will not supply its people with money of its own creation, made a full legal tender, in sufficient amount to pay all debts and save all interest, is unworthy of support from the laborers, or respect from any one. Our prisons, jails, and work-houses are getting crowded with those who would be at work if there was money enough.. Our cities are vast monopolies, where honest men become thieves, liars, tramps, and murderers in a struggle to obtain a little of the tool that buys or pays for victuals and clothes. Money is made scarce on purpose, that bankers, pawnbrokers, and sharpers may get rich on interest of debts. Wall street would soon be vacant if there was money enough for the people's use. All the surplus of people in our cities would go out and find homes, and health, and happiness in other places, if there was plenty of legal-tender money in circulation. How long shall we poor liv for the sole purpose of supporting an aristocracy?

Yours truly, J. H. WOOD.

CARROLLTON, ILL., Jan. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: My tab tells me that my time is up; and as I don't wish to get behind, I will here inclose the amount ($3) for my passage in your good old ship another year. As I intend to go with Bennett Round-the-World, I wish to start with the commencement of the year. I am well pleased with

Mr. Bennett's letters; they are very lengthy, but I never fail to read them; they are very pleasant reading. Mr. Bennett is certainly the easiest writer to read I ever knew, and I venture to say that he can get more information in the same length of time than any writer that can be produced; he can just move right along, seemingly, without an effort. It is really a disgrace to the nation that such a noble man should hav been sent to prison. Who could blame him for the stand he took something over a year ago in regard to the party in power? But still he made a blunder when he introduced politics in THE TRUTH SEEKER; he lost several subscribers by it. We must remember that neither Comstock, Benedict, nor Hayes is the Republican party. I don't think we hav any reason to expect any more from the Democratic party than from the Republican. True, they both made a bid for our vote last year, although a very modest one. I firmly believe it would be an up-hill business to try to force the Liberals to join either party; but let that be as it may, I believe we elected the best man we could have elected, and one that would hav done the Liberals and Freethought generally more good than any president we hav had for many years, if we could hav kept him; but that Guiteau—that shameful Guiteau! What a terrible blunder he made in killing such a noble man! But mean as he is, and crazy as he is, I cannot giv my consent to hav him hung. I think it will be a blunder if the government hangs him, and still a greater one if the mob destroys him, although I look upon him as a perfect nuisance.

Yours truly, WM. BLACK.

CAMPBELLTON, TEX., Jan. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been receiving your paper since October last, and cannot refrain from expressing to you my great appreciation of the paper and the able, bold, and fearless way in which it is edited. I like the way in which you score it to the old Christian moss-backs. I was born and raised a Quaker in eastern Ohio, but some ten years ago I happened to be prowling around among the old books that had been tossed away in the loft of the house of an uncle with whom I was living, and I there found Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." I brushed the dust off it and put off to my room to peruse it, taking care to turn the key of the door. That was the entering wedge to Atheism for me. After that I read Ingersoll's "Gods and Other Lectures." I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER for December 24th an article by J. Allen Noe, entitled "God or No God." He says that he is no half-way man, but a full-blooded Atheist. I count myself in the same row. We hav no need or use for a God, particularly a Christian God. In fact I would rather there were no God. It is the most consoling thought to me to think that there is no hereafter, particularly no orthodox hereafter. As to hell, I hav no use for it, and can see no good or fun in going to heaven and howling around the throne of God. Yours truly, HENRY BUNDY.

WEST BELLEVILLE, ILL., Jan. 17, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav tried many a time around here to get a few trial subscribers to the noble TRUTH SEEKER, but so far hav failed. The hard times and lack of brains in the town make it pretty hard to get the paper introduced. The leading features of this town are beer saloons and churches, both a curse to the human race; both hav always placed man in a fettered and disgraced condition. One fills his body with poisonous corruption, clothes him in rags, and causes him to act like a fiend, and ill-treat those he should protect and love; the other teaches him to submit to tyrant kings, to be a slave; it tells him if he had his just dues he would be cast into an eternal hell, but through the blood of Christ he can commit any sin and yet be saved. A great many men around here are not free, but rather coward slaves who bend beneath the lash of ignorance and idiotic churchism. All drunkards I hav seen believe in a God, and will abuse you if you attempt to deny the reality and divinity of Christ. Yet we hav some Liberal fellows here who are men in every sense of the word, who despise wrong and love right, and who, if able, would gladly help such papers as yours. The Methodist church in this town is having revival meetings, where they tell God what to do, and stir up the devil besides; and the way the "spirit of the Lord" causes them to act is astonishing. You can hear them howl for blocks, and the way they shriek is fearful; they moan, groan, growl, and squeal in a manner that beats all that will be heard in hell when the wicked wail. Among the leaders of this revival are two women who go about working and helping "Almighty God." No doubt they hav never studied the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th verses of the second chapter of 1 Timothy, and other places in the holy word of God. They sing songs about a fountain filled with blood, and a person plunging into this flood of blood and coming out without a stain—in fact, white as snow. Think of a man bloody up to the ears, and white as show. Think of a man being forgiven all the dirty acts he may hav committed, through the blood of a murdered man. Think of the coal-bosses around here, some of whom belong to this church, and who steal, steal, everlastingly steal from the poor miner who works for them, who can hardly clothe his children, or get them decent food after working hard and by strict economy. These same church coal-bosses charge the people who consume the coal outrageous prices, and would rather see them perish by winter's freezing cold than giv them coal at a reasonable price. This country is governed by a greedy, grasping, heartless monopoly. Who are the monopolists? They are believers in God, and lovers of Christ. If God loves such thieving, praying curs as some of those who belong to this church, and hates such men as Bennett, Underwood, and Ingersoll, he is an unjust God, and ought to let the devil run things for a term or two. In this church the preacher delivers what are called sermons. There is neither sense, eloquence, nor anything but lies in them. He has lied about Paine, a man who is as far above him as a mountain is above a grain of sand. He frightens little children with his infamous screams about "hell-fire;" he states that everything done is permitted by God, and in many instances he uses men as his agents—for instance Guiteau and the builders of the Holy Inquisition; he also says God made everything. When asked if he made hell, he said "No." Did he make the devil? "No, the devil is self-created." O ye heathen readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, know ye that God did not make hell and the devil, yet he made everything. Bully for God! This preacher claims that the credit for the enlightenment of this century and age is due to Christianity. This is too much for an Infidel friend of this town, who sent the preacher a challenge to discuss in public the following proposition: "That the influence of Christianity upon the world has been injurious." He has received no answer as yet, although it is too soon to expect one, and the chances are he never will. The name of the Infidel is Ed. Moody, and the preacher, if he meets him, will get beaten, as sure as Talmage is a fool. Preachers don't like to bother with Infidels, as the Infidels get the better of them every time. If you will send me some posters showing THE TRUTH SEEKER's worth, I will put them where they will be seen and read, and try and get some of the woodenheads to subscribe, for I know if they will read THE TRUTH SEEKER they will soon be men. Hoping your paper will be extensivly circulated in this vicinity before long, I remain

Yours truly, W. T. BECK.

BERLIN, N. J., Jan. 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading the letter of S. P. Andrews in a late number of your paper, and agree with him that not only Guiteau, but the Bible and all the systems of religion founded on it, hav been on trial at Washington all these weeks; and not only in that court, but throughout this nation and all other nations that hav read the trial.

Prayer for the life of the late president has already been tried in the balance and found wanting; people must now believe either that God does not hear prayer or that all the Christian nations hav not "faith equal to a grain of mustard seed." Inspiration, too, is on trial, for there is just as much proof that Guiteau was inspired to kill the president as there is that the freebooter Moses was inspired to slay whole tribes, not even sparing innocent women and harmless children. Moses said he was inspired to do so, and Guiteau says he was inspired, and that is all the proof we hav in either case; and the word of Guiteau is quite as good as that of Moses, for, judging by their acts, Guiteau is a saint compared with the old thief, liar, and wholesale murderer and plunderer held up by the Bible as a man of God.

President Arthur says it pleased God, in his inscrutable providence, to remove the president, and scores of clergymen say his death was a mysterious dispensation of divine providence for the good of the people, and that is just what Guiteau says; and if so, the assassin was a chosen instrument to do the divine will, and why do they try him for murder?

Many divines say God was willing to save the president, but the wound was mortal from the first, and it was impossible to save him; but this is denying the Bible. If God could create a world out of nothing in six days, make a live man out of dust in a moment, take a rib from that man before surgical instruments, or so much as a butcher-knife, had been invented, and of that rib make a full-grown woman, he could hav turned the bullet from the sufferer or hav made him an entire new spine if necessary.

It is evident to me that if Guiteau had never read the Bible he never would hav thought of committing that crime. The Old Testament is a record of blood and carnage imparted from an imaginary God that was always hankering for blood. If he got ever so angry, the smell of blood or the burning flesh of a bullock or an old ram would make him as mild and "gentle as a sucking dove." That Old Testament has been the cause of more bloodshed and misery than all other book ever printed, and I would suggest, if Guiteau is hung, that the Old Testament and an effigy of the imaginary God that inspired it—if an effigy of such a bloody and hateful monster can be invented—be tied to his heels, and all go down in shame and disgrace together. Then cranks, or crack-brained fanatics, can no longer claim divine authority for their bloody deeds.

In making this suggestion I feel that I am vindicating the character of the true God, if there is such a being; for one worthy the name of God never did nor ever will inspire man to slay his brother.

Yours truly, J. HACKER.

MODESTO, CAL., Dec. 23, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 for one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I would like, with your permission, to say a few words to your readers which might be of interest to them. First, Freethought in Modesto has been, as it were, at a standstill ever since Dr. York left us last year. We hav a large class of respectable citizens who are conscious of the waning power of the church, men who treat the claims of the church with ridicule; who say that its believers hav a childlike credulity, and say that they are aware that science has demonstrated the falsity of the claims put forward by the church and her various creeds. Yet these men assist pecuniarily and by their presence the various preachers of this town. Yes, they appear to drink from them all the spiritual humbug these small guns are firing at us as law and gospel of love; and we hav a couple of them who do this with so peculiar a sang froid that the old woman holding up the old hulk of the sinking "ship of Zion" exultingly exclaims, "How can an Infidel continue to assault the church and its religion?" Their imbecil tirades seem to satisfy that class who ought by their intelligence to be in the ranks of Liberals. Why are they not? Simply because it is popular to be on the church's side and their business might suffer.

Second, some of these secured men hav had that problem brought to be faced by themselvs in a way which was unexpected. "Sunday law" cries were raised from end to end of California. Temperance organizations and church orthodoxy joined hand in hand. Arrests are made by them, and those who keep open are brought to trial. Their main blow is against saloons, because public opinion is in favor of temperance. To defend themselvs in Modesto they were obliged to form themselvs into a branch League of Freedom. Who do you suppose came to their rescue? A few brave members of the Liberal League—the League which had laid dormant since Dr. York's visit last, Thomas Paine's birthday; yes, myself, Dr. Wilkild, Captain James, etc., who are temperate and advocate temperance principles, allied with men who deal with spirituous liquors simply to fight for a principle which may be summarized as follows—the advocacy, support, and defense of the rights of the few against the many, and the encroachment on our principles by the orthodox church. It is trying to hold on to a power which is passing away. It has brought about a terrible rupture with a class, the large majority of which were the church's strongest supporters. This warfare, and the church too, brought about this question, "Is it right to legislate in favor of a special religion in the United States?" This question has now to be met, and the League of Freedom comes to the front to battle with the Liberal League and secure victory if possible. And since it has come, and the church being our common enemy, is it too much to ask Liberals of all shades of opinion to come to the front and, with them, giv the Christians a hard fight? The League of Freedom here has forty members, about twenty being saloon-keepers and six or seven members of the Modesto Liberal League. Our Liberal League numbers about fifty members. We expect lectures from A. Schell, of Knight's Ferry, a big gun in the Liberal ranks, on the 10th of January and for five days following, to be followed by that friend of progress, Dr. York, of San Jose, Cal., who delivers the oration on Paine's birthday.

KENT, O., Jan. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The murder of President Garfield by a Christian fanatic has occasioned a great deal of prayer and talk about prayer, which brings to my mind some conversation that took place between three citizens of our place, which I wish you would giv to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. A man by the name of Hall, a Presbyterian deacon, and an Infidel by the name of Quier, were having a discussion on prayer, and a good, honest German by the name of Warner was present listening to the conversation. Mr. Hall was telling what wonders could be accomplished by prayer. Mr. Quier listened to him for a while, but finally, becoming disgusted, he spoke up in his abrupt manner and said he did not believe in any such damned nonsense, but if anybody else did he had no objections to their indulging in it. Mr. Warner spoke up and said. "Well, for my part, I can't say whether prayer does good or not; but, Mr. Quier, I yoost want to dell you one ding—if it don't do any good it looks a little better, anyhow." B. F. CONAWAY.

JOLIET, WIS., Jan. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please put my name on your book as a regular subscriber. This month I will be seventy-two years old, and don't expect to liv many years more, but hav lived to be converted. Mr. D. M. Bennett is my godfather, and Mr. T. B. Wakeman, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, and a host of other Liberals the bishops that confirmed me. THE TRUTH SEEKER is my Bible and text-book. I hav long been seeking for truth, and now can exclaim Eureka.

Mr. E. H. Spinning, a firm Liberalist, died in this city on Dec. 20th. He retained his senses to the end and his last words were, "I am satisfied; all is well.' I hav inclosed stamps for a paper published by the National Liberal League. Yours truly, Mental Slavery.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

They are but slaves who fear the gods—
But slaves who dare not use their brains.
Obsequious, fawning worshipers
Forge their own intellectual chains.
Worship inthralls the worshipers
In servil bonds on every hand,
Makes the worshiped thing a tyrant
Who their worshiping slaves command.
Those who put on the yoke of Christ
And never kick outside the trace
Put themselvs on a level with
The poor bestraddled donkey race.
Like asses they are bought and sold
Who swallow dogmas down on trust.
Men who believe at priests' command
But stamp their manhood in the dust.
Liberty livs by vigilance,
Is lost by selling it to knaves.
Usurpers, kings, lords, priests, and popes,
Are made by voluntary slaves.

Moral Cosmetics.

Ye who would save your features florid,
Lithe limbs, bright eyes, unwrinkled forehead,
From age's devastation horrid,
Adopt this plan;
'Twill make, in climates cold or torrid.
A hale old man.

Avoid in your youth luxurious diet,
Restrain the passions' lawless riot;
Devoted to domestic quiet,
Be wisely gay;
So shall ye, spite of age's flat
Resist decay.

Seek not in mammon-worship pleasure,
But find your richest, dearest treasure
In books, friends, music, polished leisure.
The mind, not sense,
Made the scale by which ye measure
Your opulence.

This is the solace, this the science,
Life's purest, sweetest, best appliance
That disappoints man's reliance,
Whate'er his state;
But challenges with a calm defiance
Time, fortune, fate.

A Ballad of Reason.

BY ALHAZA.

A ballad—a ballad of reason;
For Thomas the Rhymer stood
Where from the veins of martyred men
There rolled a crimson flood.
And if God speaks out loud to man,
What reason can there be,
Why bloody faith rules every town
And every fair countrie?

'Neath Egypt's dim, sepulchral sky,
Where crypt and dark recess
Were filled with fragrant manuscripts—
Bright sons in ancient dress—
Did reason light the precious mass,
And burn the brain's full sheaves,
While the first Bible filled the air
With scorching, perishing leaves.

And reason where, when Constantine
Pursued his murderous way;
And Charlemagne had been baptized
To end each bloody fray;
And cardinals made slaves of kings,
And human beasts displayed
Their hellish lust for blood and power,
And innocence betrayed?

With reason, does the narrow Christ
Our every thought engage,
While soldiers of the cross hav poured
Dark streams o'er history's page;
Laws trampled out, the poor crushed down,
And this with fiendish glee;
While devils ruled the bleeding world
For many a century?

And now, because sweet reason's light
Beams out on history's page,
Are bigots ruled by common sense
Who burn with pious rage?
While sounds upon the sleeping air
With fearful lightnings wake,
As superstitition's ships were rent
By the guns of Francis Drake.

Liberal League Notes from Illinois.

FRIENDS: After a long silence I am happy to speak to you once more through our beloved TRUTH SEEKER. Since leaving my rig at Pratt Station I hav been doing some good work for our cause. I started a new Liberal League at New Boston, Dec. 25th, and another new League here in Bloomington last week. I am now beginning to make arrangements for the next annual state League convention, which I expect to convene here in Bloomington on June 3d and 4th, and if I receive the co-operation of the Liberals of Illinois, which I should and hope to receive, we will make the next meeting of the Liberal League one of the most interesting gatherings of Liberals ever convened in the northwest. Between this and the time for holding the state League convention I expect to make a trip into the northeastern part of the state, going as far south as Paris, the birthplace of THE TRUTH SEEKER; and I hope to organize some new Leagues on my route there and back.

I shall expect to be back here in time to complete arrangements for the state League convention.

Friends wishing to help me in the work can do so by writing me at Bloomington, Ill.

I would like to remind the Liberals of the country of the great importance of trying to increase the circulation of our Liberal papers. Wherever I find a TRUTH SEEKER reader I find a live Liberal, and one who is awake to the great interests of progressiv Liberalism.

Now, friends, please let me hear from you. One dollar makes any man or woman a life member of the state Liberal League of Illinois. Please send me as many names as you can for memberships to the state League.

F. F. FOLLET,
Secretary State Liberal League, Illinois.
Bloomington, Ill., Jan. 11, 1882.

Church Taxation in Michigan.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The publication by you of my note and the address of the Equal Taxation Committee is bearing fruit. I am receiving requests by almost every mail for copies of petition and circulars. Hiram Olmstead, of Saranac, wrote me some time ago that he had the names of three-fourths of the business men of his place already on the petition. Warren Hutchins, of Remus, Mecosta county, has undertaken the appointment of agents in that section of the state with good success. S. D. Moore, of Adrian, proposes to see to his county (Lenawee). Mr. P. Thurston, of Burr Oak, does the same for St. Joseph county. We want a thorough agent of this sort for each county.

Our state legislature will be called together as soon as Congress acts upon the new congressional appointment; and when they meet, the revision of the tax laws will be their special work. We must pour in petitions by the thousand in favor of equal taxation. Never before hav the Liberals of Michigan had an opportunity to make themselvs heard in a form so eminently practical.

A conference of a few friends was held in this city Thursday, Jan. 12, at which a committee, consisting of Edward Chope, E. W. Medaugh, and C. Schulenburg, was appointed to agitate the subject of church taxation locally in Detroit. The committee will enter upon their work with earnestness and zeal. They hav authority to add to their number.

I expect in a few days to start on a tour through the state, primarily in furtherance of the church taxation work, but will also lecture on Liberal topics generally. My absence will not interfere with correspondence, which will reach me and be attended to on the route.

The following contributions hav been received since the list heretofore published by you was printed:

Wm. A. Bruce, Nunica	$1 00
E. G. B., Maple Rapids	1 00
J. Francis Ruggles, Bronson	1 00
D. E. Barlow, Flushing	1 00
Geo. Engle, Colon	1 00
Cash, Burr Oak	1 00
M. P. Thurston, Burr Oak	1 00
A. E. Nugent, Lansing	1 00
H. C. Hann, Lansing	1 00
G. K. Edgerton, Dansville	1 00
Warren Hutchins, Remus	1 00
Adrian Liberal League, by S. D. Moore	1 00

The total contributions thus far are about $50, which is but a drop in the bucket in view of the work to be done. I will be glad to forward circulars and blank forms for petition to any one who can use them, on application, and those who can do so should add something to the expense fund. Address,

S. B. MCCRACKEN, Prov. Sec.,

Prof. Robbins's Dream.

As I was plowing in the field one day in the month of May the rays of the sun beat down upon me and my team so hard I was obliged to rest; and as I slept I dreamt a dream; and behold, I soared up into an imaginary heaven, in the presence of the orthodox God. There he sits upon a throne of nothing. He was about three feet thick and nine feet high. He had a crown of gold upon his head, and was robed in a white garment, with a black book and a white book, taking down the deeds of men. My vision grew keen, and I looked; and lo! thousands of angels floating to and fro promiscuously. Every one was like unto a beautiful younng irl, with eagle's wings on the back of its shoulders. I did not see a wrinkled-faced old woman among them, neither did I see any with whiskers. I think there was only one kind there.

And as I looked, lo! there was a street of solid gold. Thinks I to myself, this is the street of the new Jerusalem; I will take a walk along it. And as I traveled along the street I soon came to the big cow pasture, where thousands of cows were being milked by perpetual motion, and the milk was flowing down a golden gutter. After looking for awhile I crossed over the way. I looked, and lo! there were thousands of beehives. The bees were gathering honey from the never-withering flowers in those extensiv fields of living green, and the honey was flowing down another golden gutter. Thinks I to myself, I must hav passed through death, for I hav awoke in a land where milk and honey flow. I rejoiced to think that I was so fortunate as to dwell in the presence of angels, and liv on such rich food forever. It is neither hot nor cold, never any sickness enters here, nor do thieves break through and steal. I will go back to my seat, for I do not want to return to the earth again. And as I sat down I cast my eyes toward earth, and was about to say, "Farewell, vain earth, with all thy sickness and sorrow, hypocrisy and superstition!" when I was struck with surprise by observing a large funnel bottom side up. It was about six inches in diameter at the top, and it grew so large when it reached the earth that it covered the whole globe. Thinks I to myself again, What is this funnel for? And, being a little inquisitiv, I inquired of the Lord, and he answered and said: "This is for the prayers of all nations of the earth to come through. If it were not for that funnel they would spread out over the other planets so we could not hear them, for this is my seat. Now, Robbins, put your ear down and listen to it." This excited my curiosity, and I put my ear to the mouth of the funnel. You may imagin my surprise when I heard the voice of man praying to God to make it rain, while others were praying for dry weather. Thinks I to myself another time, Which prayers will God answer? But I had no time to reflect, for I heard all the ministers of the North and northwestern states praying to God during the rebellion to assist us in the bloody work, calling aloud, "O Lord, assist us in this great undertaking, that the victory may be ours, and the praise thine, both now and forever. Amen!" But I had no time to reflect, for I heard all the ministers of the Southern states and the chaplains of the Southern army tell God that the Yankees were stealing away their property and burning their dwellings; "and we pray thee, O Lord, to let justice prevail in our nation. Stretch forth thy mighty arm and assist us in our great undertaking, that the victory may be ours and the praise shall be thine, both now and forever. Amen!" Boom! boom! goes the cannon. I hear the beating of drums and the playing of bands of music. I hear the cracking of thousands of muskets, and the whistling of minie balls, and oh, what a chill of horror seized my frame when I heard the dying moan of my fellow-man! Oh, how I felt for the wickedness of man when I heard one army charging the other, with flaming eyes, and vengeance in their countenances, calling upon God to damn their enemies' souls to hell, while the ministers in the background pleaded with God to take their side. I heard all the ministers of France and of Germany offering up the same kind of prayers during their bloody war. I heard all the ministers of Turkey and Russia doing the same. I heard thousands of Arabs worshiping God through Mohammed. I heard such a pandemonium that my pen fails to describe it. Thought I, I would not be God for the world. If I had five hundred children, and they got into a quarrel over their little property, and, being divided, both parties called upon me, their father, to assist them in their bloody work, I would say: "Children, behave yourselvs. It is your love of money and your wickedness. Not I will assist in your bloody murders. You are all my children." But what are five hundred compared with millions upon millions that are daily calling upon him in a similar manner? I raised my head from the funnel in disgust and looked up. And the Lord said, "Robbins, what do you think about it?" "O Lord," said I, "I do not understand it." "Well," said the Lord, "did you hear that old grave-faced Deacon Jones asking my blessing on his dinner just now?" "Yes, Lord, I did," said I. "Well," said he, "I hav known him ever since he was a little boy, and nearly all the property he has he got by illegitimate means—by cutting cord wood three feet and nine inches in length and selling it for four feet; by putting the tailings of wheat in the middle of the sack and selling it for good wheat, and by putting rotten corn in the bottom of the wagon and the good on top. Robbins," he continued, "I hav heard him tell his wife to put lots of salt in the butter, for salt was worth one cent and butter twenty-five. I hav seen him go to the railroad and get two or three rides on one ticket. Now, Robbins, the man that will rob the railroad company will plunder the stores at the midnight hour if it were not for the law. Take away the law, and Deacon Jones is a thief. Then he loans money at unlawful interest, although I gave instructions through Jesus Christ, my son, that he should not take usury money. The laws of the nation say he shall take but ten per cent, but he dodges the law by drawing a note for one hundred dollars and giving his neighbor only ninety dollars at ten per cent; and he goes to church and tries to work it off every Sunday in long prayers and hypocritical groans." This so excited my nervous system that I awoke out of my dream.

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:
His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

The oldest reform journal in the United States, is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.,

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum: single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories, of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. 3m53

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

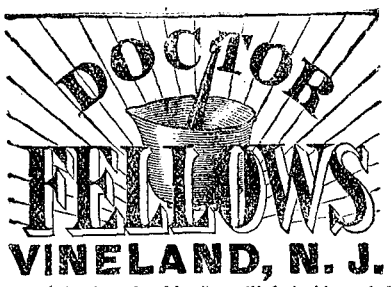
3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founde d upon the doctrin and authorit of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progres and improvement.



8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which man kind are capable of receiving.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an which is the Doctor's latest and greatest discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful taint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—many in the Insane asylums, many had Failing Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become sick and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials added by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT is proof to one brought up in a belief and indoctrinated in it from every possible source is no proof at all to another who has tried and tested the authorities, and learned to doubt their very existence. It is a well-known fact that men may study and pore over the wildest visions and weave about them realities, beautics, and truths—preach, write, and argue till they at last not only themselvs believe, but bring others to the views they cherish. Just think of the millions of miracles that are said to hav been wrought through the prayers of poor, ignorant, faithful believers in the holy mother of God, animals tamed, life restored to the dead, sight to the blind, poisons rendered innoxious, lameness cured, lakes dried up, rivers divided, and so on, by petitions to little six-inch images of the virgin mother!—Elmina D. Slenker.

INSTILLING opinions without the evidence, and at an age when the parties into whom the opinions are instilled are incapable of understanding the evidence, is a practice which necessarily engenders habits of complicated misconduct toward evidence. It engenders the habit of neglecting evidence and the holding of opinions without regard to their evidence—a habit which is the foundation of all intellectual and moral depravity.—Westminster Review.

No error is fully confuted till we hav seen not only that it is an error, but how it became one; till, finding that it clashes with the principle of truth established in our own mind, we find also in what way it had seemed to harmonize with the principles of truth, established in that other mind, perhaps so unspeakably superior to ours.—Carlyle.

THE first duty of a wise advocate is to convince his opponents that he understands their arguments and sympathizes with their just feelings.—Coleridge.

WE cannot hav conclusiv reason for believing that the human faculties were incompetent to find out moral doctrins of which the moral faculties can perceive and recognize the excellence.—J. S. Mill.

THE materialism of irrational science is not the only real materialism. Nor is it the worst. The church has its sacramental materialism, fancying a magical influence in the waters of baptism or the eucharistic bread and wine or the oil of extreme unction. It has its dogmatic materialism, fancying that an abnormal physical event can recommend a sacred teacher or an ethical system. From such materialism, equally with that of pseudo science, rational religion affords us a complete deliverance.—J. W. Chadwick.

Wo to the unlucky man who as a child is taught, even as a portion of his creed, what he must forswear. Faith endures no barking of the surface; it is a fair, delicate plant transported out of paradise into an alien garden, where surest care alone can foster it. But wound the tenderest shrub—but break away one single flower, and though it linger on for years, feeding upon stimulants and struggling through a languishing vitality, it has had its death-blow; the blighted juices fly trembling back into the heart, never to venture out again.—J. A. Froude.

Is there nothing in that faith which seeks for happiness out of self in the happiness of others and in the glories of nature? Content that in death the sense of personality shall pass away and that you shall be as you were before you were—in a sleep for ever more?—H. G. Atkinson.

WHAT an emancipation it is to hav escaped from the little inclosure of dogma and to stand—far, indeed, from being wise, but free to learn! How I wonder at myself now for having held (and very confidently held forth upon it, I am ashamed to say) that at all events it was safe to believe dogma: that, for instance, whether there was a future state or not, it was safe and comfortable to believe it; that even if there was no God, serving as a model to man—the original of the image—it was safe and tranquilizing to take for granted that there was. The enormity of this mistake was not fully apparent till afterward.—Harriet Martineau.

THAT the love of a special subject is a great spur to industry needs no proof, and it has never yet been shown that the mind is less exercised when it is exercised with pleasure. Every experienced student knows that the great secret of study is to read with appetite.—Goldwin Smith.

To business that we love we rise betime
And go to it with delight. —Shakspere.

IT is an old remark that, as men are, such they paint their gods; and as in themselvs the passionate, or demoniac nature, long preponderated, so the gods they worshiped were demons like themselvs, jealous, capricious, exacting, revengeful—the figures which fill the old mythologies and appear partly in the Old Testament.—Froude's Nemesis.

As to the fallacy of all arguments for a conscious existence after death, I agree with you entirely. I think that not only is the desire taken for evidence, but the desire itself is a factitious thing; that many (and this I know) do not desire at all, and that others never would if it were not forced upon them from the hour of the awakening of the understanding. The argument of compensation by means of a future life appears to me as pueril and unphilosophical as the design argument in the account in regard to creation.—Harriet Martineau.

WHAT is it to die?
To leave all disappointment, care, and sorrow,
To leave all falsehood, treachery, and unkindness,
All ignominy, suffering, and despair,
And be at rest forever! O dull heart,
Be of good cheer! When thou shalt cease to beat
Then shalt thou cease to suffer and complain.
—Longfellow.

How sick one is of all sermons such as they are! Why will men go on thrashing over and over again the old withered straw that was thrashed out centuries ago, when every field is waving with fresh, quite other crops, craving for their hand?—Froude's Nemesis.

Odds and Ends.

THE Oneida Community, according to Guiteau, were amalga-mated.

"I'LL be up to take a look at you in the morning," said the declining sun to the dusky landscape.

SOME one remarked that D.V. means the same as providence permitting. Then said the old man, "Let's hav some eau D.V."

"CAUGHT on a belt," is what the factory girl cried when her father burst into the parlor and saw her fellow's arm around her belted waist.

O FISHERMAN true, on the waters blue,
Why sing you so jolly while you are so wet?
I sing when I'm blue of my lady-love true,
Keeping time as I sing with my old cast-a-net.

EMERSON once thought that he would do as other men do. He went into a saloon, and, sitting for awhile, finally asked for a whisky skin. The barkeeper looked at him for a moment and said, "I guess what you want is ginger pop."

"WHY," said Mrs. Jones, the esthete, to Oscar, as they were getting into a hoss car, "how poetical the papers are getting. They must be speaking of little male calves out West, when they say that there are plenty of cow-boys." This was an Irish boveline translation.

ÆSOPS FABLES.—REVISED VERSION.

Bret Harte has produced in London a new book of fables from which we make the following selections:

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

A certain man went from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves, who beat him and stripped him and left him for dead. A good Samaritan, seeing this, clapped spurs to his horse and galloped away, lest he should be sent to the house of detention as a witness while the robbers were released on bail.

Moral—The perceiver is worse than the thief.

THE KIND-HEARTED SHE-ELEPHANT.

A kind hearted she-elephant, while walking through the jungle where the spicy breezes blow soft o'er Ceylon's isle, heedlessly set foot upon a partridge, which she crushed to death within a few inches of the nest containing its callow brood. "Poor little things," said the generous mammoth, "I hav been a mother myself, and my affection shall atone for the fatal consequences of my neglect." So saying, she sat down upon the orphaned birds.

Moral—The above teaches us what home is without a mother; also that it is not every person who should be entrusted with the care of an orphan asylum.

THE PHILOSOPHER AND THE SIMPLETON.

A simpleton having had occasion to seat himself sat down upon a pin, whereupon he made an outcry unto Jupiter. A philosopher who happened to be holding up a hitching-post in the vicinity, rebuked him, saying, "I can tell you how to avoid hurting yourself by sitting down on pins, and will if you will set them up." The simpleton, eagerly accepting, the philosopher swallowed four fingers of the rum which perisheth, and replied, "Never sit down." He subsequently acquired a vast fortune by advertising for agents, to whom he guaranteed $15 a week for light and easy employment at their homes.

Moral—The wise man saith, "There is a nigger in the fence," but the fool sendeth on twenty stamps for sample and is taken in.

THE PRUDENT TIGER.

A prudent tiger having observed a procession bearing away the remains of a sainted Brahman to the tomb, communicated the intelligence to his wife, who said, "My dear, we are almost out of meat, and though the deceased, from the austerities of his pious life, was in poor condition, I make no doubt that among his surviving friends we may encounter others more succulent." "Miserable tigress," exclaimed her lord, "cannot you see that if we permit the deceased to be canonized, pilgrimages will be instituted to his tomb, and the producer and consumer will be brought together in accordance with the true principles of political economy? Rather let us offer a chromo for each new pilgrim." This prudent advice being followed, the tiger enjoyed a free breakfast table to the end of his days.

Moral—Beware of breaking the egg that hatches the golden goose.

Some of the fables in the book seem almost to hav been written with an eye to passing events. Take, for instance, the following, and read it in connection with the extraordinary incidents in the trial of Guiteau:

THE WOLF AND THE LAMB.

A wolf one day, drinking from a running stream, observed a lamb also drinking from the same stream at some distance from him.

"I hav yet to learn," said the wolf, addressing the lamb with dignified severity, "what right you hav to muddy the stream from which I am drinking."

"Your premises are incorrect," replied the lamb with bland politeness, "for if you will take the trouble to examin the current critically you will observe that it flows from you to me, and any disturbance of sediment here would be, as far as you are concerned, entirely local."

"Possibly you are right," returned the wolf, "but, if I am not mistaken, you are the person who, two years ago, used some influence against me in the university."

"Impossible!" replied the lamb; "two years ago I was not born."

"Ah, well," added the wolf, composedly, "I am wrong again; but it must convince every intelligent person who has listened to this conversation that I am altogether insane, and consequently not responsible for my actions."

With this remark, he at once dispatched the lamb and was triumphantly acquitted.

Moral—This fable teaches us how erroneous may be the popular impression in regard to the distribution of alluvium and the formation of the river deltas.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Notes and Clippings.

A PROFESSOR in a Connecticut college declares that out of 16,500 Baptist ministers only 150 are thoroughly educated.

A NEPHEW of the poet Burns—an old man-of-war's man named Gilbert R. Regg, eighty years of age—is now living in a charitable institution at Glasgow.

GAMBETTA'S New Revision bill proposes to abolish the article of the French Constitution which provides that the clergy shall pray God to bless the deliberations of the two chambers.

IF colored theologians of the Rev. John Jasper stripe do not look to their laurels the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage will beat them all as the champion biblical astronomer.—Sun.

FRANCE and Italy hav hitherto produced sugar only from the beet root. The sugar cane has lately been introduced in both countries, and its rapid growth threatens the beet industry.

ABOUT a thousand million dollars of our national debt hav been paid since the war ended. France has now nearly treble our debt, and Great Britain more than double. Even Spain has a bigger debt than that which remains of ours.

CHARLES H. FOSTER, the noted Spiritualist medium, is declared incurably insane. He is in the asylum at Danvers, Mass. His mediumship does not seem to hav enriched him permanently, though at times he made money rapidly, and an appeal for charity is made in his behalf.

IT is feared that a famin is imminent in Tunis. A very large portion of the agricultural land has been, in consequence of the recent troubles, left unsown; and it is estimated by those capable of judging that when the scarcity of food begins to be felt in the interior of the country another and probably a fiercer insurrection of the population is likely to break out.

THE Roman Catholic priests of the Pittsburgh diocese hav begun to carry out the policy of their church in the matter of secret societies, against the Knights of Labor, a trades organization of rapid growth and great numerical strength. In a conference on the subject, the clergy agreed to refuse absolution to all members of the order, and formal notice of this action has been given in sixty congregations.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Sun asks this question: Why should Talmage charge Ingersoll with "tremendous ignorance" in not knowing that in Gen. ii, 21, 22, the Hebrew word translated rib means side, when in all the translations it is rib? What a reflection he casts upon the learned translators of King James's and the Douay Bible, to say nothing of the Septuagint, two thousand years old, which also has rib.

TRUE believers are greatly agitated over the expected coming of the Mehdi or Mohammedan messiah. The prophet himself foresaw this event, and prophesied that he would be an Arab and descendant of his own house. El Mehdi is expected to unite the faithful, restore Islam, and rule over the Mohammedans throughout the world. According to a prophecy that has for several years been carefully circulated among the Moorish Mussulmans, he will make his appearance on the first day of the month Moharram in the year 1300 (Nov. 12, 1882). He will be forty years of age and of noble appearance, and one of his arms will be longer than the other. A religious devotee of great sanctity in North Africa is already known as El Mehdi—literally, the teacher—and in personal appearance corresponds exactly with the description in the prophecy. He will probably attempt to play the part of the Messiah, and, aided by a fanatical following, may seriously threaten European influence in India, Egypt, and Algeria.

IT is interesting to note that the Dutch are at present engaged in reclaiming half a million acres from the Zuyder Zee. Between 1840 and 1852 45,000 acres were rescued from the sea at Haarlem. When such a process is attempted in Britain it generally results in some landlord proclaiming a right to the foreshore, which precludes further operations. In Scotland, especially of late years, private enterprise has been effectually balked in this way, and on the Friths of Forth and Clyde valuable acquisitions to the state hav been lost by the stupid opposition of riparian proprietors, who would not themselvs spend a penny to reclaim the land, but were prepared to prevent others doing so at any cost.

IT was recently announced that the Rev. George C. Miln, of Chicago, had become so heterodox in his theology that he was no longer at home in the Unitarian church, and that he consequently felt the necessity of reaching out into some religious fellowship where he would be free to adopt and preach any new theories which might present themselvs to his mind. With this view he was about to give up his church. But he has now taken a new view of the situation, and has concluded to remain where he is. His people hav urged him to withdraw his resignation, and he has consented, they giving him the largest liberty to preach from their pulpit such doctrins as may seem good to him.

THOS. MYERS, a negro living at Rantowles, S. C., conceived that it was his duty to offer up a human sacrifice to God. Nobody could reason the idea out of his head, though on other subjects he was rational. He chose his son, aged thirteen, as the victim. The boy followed him into the woods unsuspectingly when ordered to do so, and was killed by a shot. Myers glories in the deed, and believes that it makes his salvation sure. The negro lives a little too late. Had he lived two thousand years ago, and been called Abraham, he might hav sailed down the ages as a glorious example of pious faith. As it is he may hav a dance upon nothing, unless he can employ doctors to convince a jury of the insanity of following biblical example.

A LUMBERMAN broke his leg in the Wisconsin woods, and desired to go to his home at Sorel, Canada, where he could receive good treatment. But Sorel was a thousand miles away, and he had but a few dollars. In this dilemma he resolved to travel cheaply as freight. He made a box six feet long, two feet wide, and sixteen inches high, marked it "This side up with great care," and had himself nailed in and shipped. Some cracks gave him air, and he took along a supply of food and water. He got along very well, though not without discomforts, until he arrived at Montreal, where the box was set up on end, and the inmate left standing on his head. He was forced to make an outcry. He had been three days on the journey, which the railroad officials enabled him to complete as a regular passenger.

A LAWSUIT has been instituted against the Roman Catholic archbishop of Boston and the Rev. Father Fleming to recover some intrinsically valueless figures of Cupids, which were originally cut from a valentine. Two years ago a young girl named Lizzie M. Gannon had a violent attack of hysteria, and declared that she had visions of heaven. She described while entranced persons who had long been dead, and thoroughly convinced those around her that her clairvoyance was genuin. Father Fleming found her gazing reverently at the paper figures mentioned, and she assured him that they had been miraculously delivered to her. She regarded them not as Cupids, but angels. The priest took them away from her, tore one up, and carried the rest away, charging her to disabuse her mind of such folly. This shock threw the girl into convulsions, and she has since had consciousness only at intervals, when she begs piteously for the images. But the priest destroyed them, acting under the order of the archbishop. The suit is for damages, and eminent counsel are engaged on each side.

HARRISON, "the Boy Evangelist," worked up a great religious revival in Indianapolis last spring, and the numerous converts swelled the membership of the Roberts Park church beyond that of any other Methodist body in the city. Harrison has now returned and begun similar services. The Methodist clergy discussed him in their Monday meeting, and the weight of sentiment was strongly against him. One minister accused him of insincerity, on the ground that, while professing an entire devotion to revivalism, he always demanded high wages, and went where the greatest pecuniary inducement was offered. Harrison replies that his detractors are simply jealous on account of his success in saving souls, and prays for them in an emphatic manner.

THE Rev. C. A. Johnson, the Canadian colored advocate of the theory that "the sun do move," has been lecturing in Troy. In addition to a sun revolving around the earth, he described a square, flat earth. "I hav no reason to doubt," he said, "we are dwelling on a four-cornered earth. John, the relevator, speaks of angels standing at the four corners of the earth. How do scientific men hav better knowledge than the scriptures? When men became too inquiring they discovered the earth was round. My friends, this is all a mistake—a grand mistake. It is said that while it is night with us it is day with people opposit us on the earth. If that be so and the earth is round, at night people must be standing on their heads. I don't believe we are standing on our heads. I believe the earth is a great plain surrounded by water. The assertion of scientific men should not be blindly received, but the scriptures can giv us authority." Some of the preacher's hearers put questions to him, indicating that his arguments were not convincing, but for all he had the same reply: "I am not here to answer questions. You may ask them if you choose. But if the sun didn't move, how did Joshua make it stand still, as the scriptures prove he did?"

WM. ALGER, of Alton, Ont, writes to the National Reformer his opinion of Col. Ingersoll. He says: "In the National Reformer of December 4th I see a statement that there is an increased demand for Ingersoll literature in Canada. The statement is correct, and the demand is due to the following reasons: In the first place, he has been extensivly advertised in the pulpit of nearly every Christian church in Canada, thereby awakening a spirit of inquiry which bodes no good to orthodoxy. About two years ago the Colonel delivered lectures in some of our leading cities, and produced a very favorable impression on all who had the good fortune to hear him. As an orator he stands without a peer on this continent, and he has the power of holding his audience as it were spellbound, one moment melting them to tears in sympathy with his expressions, and in another moment eliciting from them ringing cheers or shouts of laughter. His personal appearance is greatly in his favor. A giant, physically and mentally, tall and robust, with a massiv head above his square, broad shoulders, and on his clean-shaven face the physiognomist can see depicted the prominent traits of his character. Good-natured, fearless, frank, open-hearted and open-handed, he is the jolliest, sunniest specimen of humanity that the writer has ever come in contact with. His private life and character are unimpeachable. A faithful husband, an indulgent and loving father, a kind friend, a generous opponent, and a good citizen of the great republic. He practices at home what he preaches abroad, and commands the respect of those who differ from him. His charity is a household word in Washington (where he resides). Should he visit England in the capacity of a lecturer, I trust that your readers will avail themselvs of the opportunity to hear the great apostle of liberty, love, and law."

A Truth Seeker Around the World

The Book of the Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh.—Continued.

CHAPTER III.

A VISIT FROM ONE OF OLDEN TIME.

1. Yet a little while, after all had partaken of soup and bread and chicken, the pilgrims did recount the sore trials through which they had passed on their journey toward the Land of Yahweh; and when the ninth hour had come did each pilgrim seek his tent to repose in the arms of Morpheus.

2. So be it the Scribe soon remembered his troubles no more, and was soon in the land of dreams and visions.

3. When he thus lay on his cot, and all was dark and quiet, then did a venerable man and a grave cast aside the door of the tent, and straightway walk to the bed of the Scribe, and in solemn tones thus did he speak:

4. Thou chosen Scribe from the land of Unclesam, I have come to utter a few words unto thee. Behold, I have knowledge of the journey thou hast undertaken, even of the many truth seekers who have sent thee so far from thy home and thy land, and I moreover know all the trouble thou hast seen.

5. I come with words of peace unto thee, and know of a truth I will do thee naught but good, for I never have done harm to any one.

6. Lo and behold, the Scribe was not afraid, and he made answer in these words:

7. Venerable Visitor, I thank thee for coming to see me, and that thou speaketh words of peace unto thy servant. And now may I ask thy name and the purpose of thy visit?

8. Then did the venerable visitor reply in this wise: Behold, I am Melchisedec, who in the ancient times was called King of Salem and Prince of Peace. I have come to tell thee many things, and to bear thee company through the land of Yahweh; for know thee of a verity I feel friendly to thee, I am mindful of what thou hast passed through, and I would do thee good.

9. Then did the Scribe open his mouth and say, Good Melchisedec, art thou then what is called a spirit, and am I to regard thee as one who once lived in the flesh?

10. Then did the visitor make answer: Nay, little one, I am not a spirit, neither am I a ghost; but I may say I am the genius or the memory of him who hath been called Melchizedek. My other and better name is Commonsense, and in that capacity and office only could I be the priest of the Most High God, in that form only could I be without beginning of days or end of life.

11. To which the Scribe answered: Honored friend, thou doest me great honor, and thou dost raise a great interest in my mind. Pray tell me, wert thou a high priest of Yahweh who once ruled over the land to which we are journeying? To this the visitor replied:

12. Nay, nay, in no wise: know ye of a truth I was not a priest of Yahweh; else I could not have been a priest of the Most High God; for, mark my words, Yahweh was not the Most High God in the times past, nor is he to-day. Then again did the Scribe venture to speak:

13. Indeed, ancient friend, thou almost startlest me with thy words: but I pray thee go on: then may I ask, who and what was Yahweh? Then the visitor responded:

14. My words are truth: Yahweh was simply the god of the Jews, the same as Brahma was the god of the Hindoos, Ormuzd the god of the Persians, Baal the god of the Phœnicians, Osiris the god of the Egyptians, Jupiter the god of the Greeks and Romans, Odin the god of the Scandinavians, and many more which I will not stop to name, and many which thou already knowest of.

15. None of these gods, be it known to thee, were creators of the world and all the worlds: none of them, Yahweh included, ever created anything: in fact, not one of them ever had any existence save in the imaginations of superstitious and mistaken men.

16. Be it also known to thee that Yahweh is not the greatest of the gods which men have made: but in truth he is the least. He ruled over a smaller extent of country than any I have mentioned.

17. He excelled, however, in some respects; he was more fickle than any of them, he was more addicted to anger, he was more bloodthirsty, he was more malicious, more vindictive, more murderous, and caused more men to be put to death for the most slight offenses, and on the most trivial pretexts, of any god who ever had a fancied existence.

18. The cause of this is to be found in the character of the people who created him; the traits most conspicuous with them were imparted to their god. This was the case with all the gods which have been worshiped in the world.

19. If there was no other way of judging the character of a god, thou wouldst only need to study the character of the people who created him, or devised him, or worshiped him.

20. If they were warlike, their god would be warlike; if they were peaceful, their god would be peaceful; if they were malicious, their god would delight in deeds of malice; if they were morose, their god would be taciturn and severe; if they were amorous, then their gods would be noted for their amorous pleasures and excesses; if the makers were black, their gods would be black; if they were white, their gods would be the same; and so every quality which the people possessed would be reflected in their gods.

21. The only reason why the character of Yahweh has improved since the time when he was worshiped in the land to which thou art journeying, is because the people who have adopted him are more advanced in civilization, the works of art, and all that elevates conduct. Yahweh has been much improved by his present worshipers; and do not forget that the cause of all this is to be found in the fact that his present worshipers occupy a higher plane in civilization and morals than did his original creators and worshipers.

22. Of a truth it would seem to the casual observer that the Yahweh who is now worshiped in Europe and America can hardly be the same god that used to be worshiped among those hills, but a day's ride from where thou now art; but they are the same, save the natural evolution through which he has passed by time and the change in worshipers.

23. Had the people of Europe and America selected one of the gods of the Hindoos, the Persians, the Egyptians, the Grecians, the Romans, or the Scandinavians, they would have had nearly the same reverence for the god thus selected as they now have for Yahweh, and with equally good cause.

24. Truth also urges me to say their morals would have been quite as good, for not one of the gods alluded to is credited with so immoral a character as that given to the God of the Jews.

25. The Scribe listened to these words with great interest, when he ventured to open his mouth and speak in this wise: Indeed, Venerable Friend, thy speech causeth me to marvel not a little, though the views thou hast advanced are in nowise new to me, for I have for many days been of a similar mind.

26. What thou hast said seemeth very reasonable to thy servant, who hath hearkened to thy words with deep interest; and though thou seemest a little severe on the gods of olden time, thy servant in nowise can say thou hast not spoken truly.

27. But may I ask thee which of the gods thou hast named was the god in whose service thou wast a high priest? or, if it was not one of these, wilt thou tell thy servant which god it was?

28. Then again did the visitor thus speak: As thou art a truth seeker, I am glad that thou inquirest thus of me, for of a truth I wish to tell thee many things, and I would hold nothing back which thou and thy readers should know.

29. Know then that I was not high priest unto any of the gods I have named, nor unto any of the gods which men have devised. But thou must remember that I was a priest of the Most High God, of the true God, who ruleth forever and ever, and who held supreme rule over all the domain of the universe, even long before man had existence.

30. Yea, remember I was priest to the Most High God; that is, the God of Reason, Truth, and Endless Duration—the God who existeth eternally in the universe, or, in other words, in all things that have ever existed.

31. The Most High God is that which dwells in all existences, which are parts of itself; which was never created by men, which never made something from nothing, but which ever has lived, and ever must live, in everything which has existed or which now exists.

32. Let me say to thee that each of the gods which I have named—and it is the same with scores of others not named—was claimed to be the creator of the world and of all worlds; that he was the origin of all things; or, in other words, that he created everything from nothing.

33. Such a thing is an utter impossibility. No god that man hath ever devised, or ever can devise, could convert nothing into something. One of the great men hath said, Nothing is a very poor material of which to make something, or to make worlds.

34. No god, no number of gods, could by any possibility make a particle of something out of nothing. Nothing cannot be converted into something; and it is only those who do not give due thought to the subject who think such a thing possible.

35. Existences, or rather the material which constitute existences, are eternal. Not one of them was ever created; not one of them was ever brought into existence. Nothing can be brought into existence save it be an individual plant or animal, which seems only to have a new life because a new combination is formed of the material and the atoms, which have an eternal existence.

36. In the entire domain of the universe, which, howbeit, is more wide and extended than the mind of man is capable of conceiving, there are various forms of existence termed matter, which combine in forming all suns, all worlds, all existences.

37. These, in the aggregate, constitute the universe; these are the sources of all life, all organizations, as well as all force or power. There is no power disconnected from them, and for this reason matter and force are justly considered as twin eternal existences, outside of or apart from which no existence is possible.

38. These elementary forms of matter, as I have already declared, constitute the sum and substance of all existences; and inseparably connected with them is all the power or force that has existence, and apart from the material substances alluded to can no power or force be found.

39. Thus matter and force constitute the universe; thus matter and force are the Most High; matter and force are the all in all, and it is those who are poorly informed, and who reason imperfectly, that can accept the possibility of any god, or any individuality separate from these.

40. This Most High is the god to whom I was priest, and I am proud to say that I am still priest to the same god. For he alone is the true god, and beside him all others are false. This, I pray thee, remember and declare to the world.

41. The Scribe did again open his mouth, and uttered these words: Most Venerable Friend, thy words seem good and true to thy grateful servant, and they are a confirmation of the belief he hath maintained for a long time;

42. But may thy servant inquire of thee whether the gods which the nations have worshiped in the times long past were not crude recognitions on their part of the powers and forces of nature, and to that extent were they not worshipers of the Most High? To which the Venerable Visitor made answer:

43. Thou hast spoken wisely. All the principal gods which men have worshiped were originally imperfect conceptions on their part of the eternal matter and force in the universe already alluded to.

44. The sun, the center of your system of planetary worlds for thousands of years, has been regarded as the principal or supreme power, and has been looked up to as the source of life and of being.

45. It is not strange, then, that the sun has been the principal object of worship with many nations, and, in fact, directly or indirectly, by all nations. Of a truth, nearly all the gods I have named to thee, as well as many more that may be named, were crude personifications of the sun and the active forces of nature.

46. The same remark will apply with equal truth to Yahweh. He was originally the sun, or its representative, fire; and as with other gods which were worshiped long before him, he degenerated into a personal monster deplorable to contemplate.

47. That Yahweh was primarily a conception of this kind, several passages from the Hebrew Bible will amply demonstrate. I will name some of them:

48. There is none like unto the god of Jeshurun, who rideth upon the heaven in thy help, and his excellency on the sky (Deut. xxxiii, 26).

49. Extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name Jah, and rejoice before him (Ps. lxviii, 4).

50. To him that rideth upon the heavens of heavens which were of old; lo, he doth send out his voice, and that a mighty voice (Ps. lxviii, 33).

51. Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters: who maketh the clouds his chariots: who walketh upon the wings of the wind (Ps. civ, 3).

52. His going forth is from the end of the heavens, and his circuit unto the ends of it, and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof (Ps. xix, 6).

53. Yea, he sent out his arrows and scattered them, and he shot out lightnings and discomfited them (Ps. xviii, 14).

54. These, in the poetic language of ancient times, clearly mean the sun, and cannot sensibly be applied to anything else. It must be remembered that fire is also referred to as the sun, and spoken of in connection with the several gods of the sun. Here are other passages referring to the Hebrew God in this light:

55. And there came a fire from the Lord and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense (Num. xvi, 35).

56. Get you up from among this congregation, that I may consume them as in a moment (Num. xvi, 45).

57. For I will not go up in the midst of thee; for thou art a stiff-necked people, lest I consume thee in the way (Ex. xxxiii, 3).

58. I will come up into the midst of thee in a moment, and consume thee (Ex. xxxviii, 5).

59. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended on it in fire (Ex. xix, 18).

60. And the sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire (Ex. xxiv, 17).

61. And there came out a fire from before the Lord, and consumed upon the altar the burnt-offering and the fat (Lev. ix, 24).

62. The mountains melted from before the Lord, even that Sinai, from before the Lord God of Israel (Judges v, 5).

63. For our God is a consuming fire (Heb. xii, 20; and Deut. iv, 24).

64. His throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire (Dan. ix, 10).

65. His body was like the beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightnings, and his eyes as lamps of fire (Dan. x, 6).

66. God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran. Selah. His glory covereth the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise. And his brightness was as the light (Hab. iii, 3).

67. Other passages tending the same way can easily be quoted, but these will suffice to show that the qualities of the sun, light and heat, were clearly meant.

68. Now if I have found favor in thy sight let me depart in peace. I will prolong my stay no further at this my first visit, but I will come and see thee every night after thou hast retired to rest, even so long as thou sojournest in the Land of Yahweh.

69. I will be pleased to say much to thee, and to answer such inquiries as thou seest fit to make. In return I have a single request to make, and that is, that what thou writest, while in the Land of Yahweh, be done somewhat in the style of the ancient residents of the country to which thou goest. This I ask of thee out of respect for the manner of olden times. I bid thee good-night.

70. The Scribe returned his grateful thanks, and promised compliance with the request; and when he looked the Venerable Visitor had departed. And in the morning the Scribe felt as though he had had a dream.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SECOND DAY'S JOURNEY.

1. And it came to pass when the morrow had come, and all had taken meat, each of the pilgrims did say to the men-servants who had the horses and the mules and the donkeys in charge, saying, Saddle me the ass [horse], and they saddled him.

2. Then did the captain of the host lead the way along to the southward and to the westward, hard by Mount Hermon, and all the pilgrims did follow, and moreover the dog.

3. And when the pilgrims lifted their eyes to the top of the mountain, lo and behold, its head was as white as wool because of the dew and the rain and the snow which had fallen upon it.

4. Many times did the pilgrims cast their eyes upon Mount Hermon; and often did they lift their eyes in the opposite direction, even toward the Hills of Bashan, which are also hills of renown.

5. And it came to pass as the pilgrims journeyed on their way, that the way became exceeding stony, and all the land over which they passed was covered with stones, like the sands of the sea for multitude.

6. They also went up steep hills and down steep hills, so rocky, so covered with stones, as to be unfit for men or devils to travel over.

7. But the hearts of the pilgrims were stout, and they fainted not.

8. About the tenth hour the pilgrims came unto a Mohammedan village, of low, flat-roofed huts, fit stables for sheep, but with which human beings should not be content withal.

8. And the name of the place is Beit-Jenn, and it standeth at the mouth of two valleys, and up on the hillside. Of a truth no man of good sense would wish to live in such a place: howbeit, the name of the place means "the house of paradise."

9. Then did the Scribe lift his voice and say, Verily, if this is paradise, then, as my soul liveth, I will look farther for some other place.

10. At the twelfth hour, after passing over much more bad and rocky road, which was so steep that the horses could hardly climb or the riders stay on, they descended into the pleasant valley of Merj-el-Hadi, where they did dismount and partake of meat and boiled eggs, when all forgot their sorrows.

11. Howbeit on this day two riders were thrown from their horses. One was the man of God James, of the land of Johnbull, and the other the Frenchman from the land of Bullfrogs; but their heads were not broken nor the skin of their bodies cut.

12. More hills, more rocks, more stones were what the pilgrims saw after the midday meal; and when the fourth hour had nearly come, they came nigh unto the castle of Subeibeh, which standeth upon a high hill, and the ascent to it causes great weariness of body.

13. The road to this was so rough with rocks and so steep withal that the Scribe was sore afraid his clumsy horse would fall and that he would break his neck.

14. Then did the Scribe dismount and lead the horse, but both did climb with exceeding great difficulty. Then did the Scribe sweat like rain, and he puffed like an old man who hath no wind.

15. Then did he make fast the horse and proceed again, and at last reached the summit. Whereat he was exceeding glad, and said, This is worse than climbing Mount Vesuvius.

16. But when the hight was reached much compensation was felt. The old ruins are massive and grand, and the view of all the surrounding country is the finest in Syria.

17. The hill on which standeth the old castle is 2,500 feet in hight above the sea-level, and, as it is disconnected with other hills, it is an object of interest.

18. It is thought a castle has long existed on this hill, and the places in the rocks worn by the horses' feet which climbed here in the long-ago are plainly to be seen.

19. A castle was built here by the ancient Phœnicians, but whether they are the first which thus used it no man knoweth; and, later on, the Romans and the Crusaders added to it and strengthened it.

20. The old edifice is nine hundred feet in length and three hundred in width at each end. The stones are beveled, and the masonry is massive.

21. Inscriptions and ornamentation are to be seen in many places. Much of the wall has fallen down the precipice.

22. There are deep vaults and cisterns for water, which required great labor to build.

23. The view of the surrounding country is most beautiful to behold. The southern end of Mount Hermon comes close to the castle hill, and on the left, as you look toward the south, lie stretched along for a great distance the noted Hills of Bashan.

24. Next comes the Plain of Huleh, or the upper part of the valley of Jordan, with Lake Huleh, or the waters of Merom, a small lake in the valley. Beyond that comes the Mountains of Naphtali, which are a continuation of the hills of Anti-Lebanon.

25. Still farther away toward the southwest Mount Tabor rears its head, and looks majestic and isolated to some extent.

26. At the foot of the castle hill lies Banias, aforetime called Cesarea Philippi, and earlier by the Greeks called Paneas, because their sylvan god Pan had a cave-temple there.

27. The town was once adorned by Herod the Great, who erected a temple there over the source of the Jordan in honor of Augustus Cæsar.

28. Herod's son, Philip the Tetrarch, enlarged the borders of the town and called it Cesarea, in honor of Tiberius Cæsar; and as another Cesarea was on the coast, he added Philippi to this to distinguish it.

29. Hard by the borders of this now miserable town the pilgrims' tents were pitched for the night, in the northeast corner of the Land of Yahweh, which the pilgrims had sought, lo these many days.

30. Glad were all the pilgrims to meet the white tents of peace on this occasion, for all were weary with the fatigues of the day.

31. And the distance traveled this day is one score of miles and two miles; and a more wearisome road no man need to wish to see.

CHAPTER V.

SECOND VISIT FROM MELCHISEDEC.

1. And it came to pass when the Venerable Visitor of olden time made his entrance into the tent bearing the Stars and Stripes, he approached the cot of the Scribe, when he lifted up his voice and spake these words:

2. Hail, Truth Seeker! I perceive thou art weary with the fatigues of the day, and I will not tarry very long at this time, but suffer thee to take thy repose in peace. Has thou any inquiries to propound?

3. To this the Scribe did thus make answer: Venerable Friend, I am not so weary but that thy visit is a welcome one, and I gladly express the deep reverence which I feel toward thee. I have a few inquiries I would make.

4. In giving some description of the Most High God in whose service thou wert and still art a priest, although thou didst represent that he did not create the universe, thou didst not say whether he possessed intelligence, or whether his will and commands are always reasonable and just? Wilt thou give a few words on this matter?

5. Cheerfully will I reply to thy questions. Truly did I say that the Most High did not create the universe, because the universe never was created. It has passed through countless changes in keeping with its inherent nature, but it ever existed in its substance and its force the same as the Most High himself hath ever existed.

6. To the second part of thy inquiry I have to say that the Most High contains within himself all the qualities, elements, and possibilities possessed by the universe, including intellectuality, mind, and thought.

7. But the power of thinking is the product of individual organization, and can only exist in connection with the organization adapted to its production. All forms of animal life possess this quality in some degree, and in varying quantities, but always in keeping with their organizations. Man surpasses other animals in the quality of intellectuality simply because his organization is capable of producing a more perfect quality. Man has greatly improved in this respect; he is now much more intellectual than he was one hundred thousand years ago.

8. The Most High, who is above all and who contains all, is not an organized being; consequently he has not the apparatus which produces mentality. He does not plan, he does not think, he does not change his mind, he does not repent. I repeat, he contains all the elements which produce the functions peculiar to human beings, but he is not a human being; he does nought that human beings do.

9. Then did the Scribe make this inquiry, Thou speakest of the Most High being above all, including the entire universe; wilt thou please explain wherein he differs from the universe?

10. Then again, said Melchisedec, He does not differ from the universe, because he is the universe. The universe is the Most High. It contains all that exists, or that is possible to have existence. There is nothing above it; there is nothing without it. When men imagine gods, and claim that they are superior to the universe, and that they made the universe, they err greatly. There is no power superior to the universe, and there is no power that could ever create it.

11. It may sound strange to some for me to say that the Most High does not think, but it is nevertheless true. Thinking is only done by a brain, as seeing is done by an eye, and hearing by the ear. The Most High has no brain, no eye, no ear; hence he does not think, does not see, does not hear, though he gives the capabilities for each of these.

12. Thou mightest ask how, if the Most High doth not plan, doth not devise, doth not adopt, how the world and all things in it move so harmoniously, and exhibit such perfect adaptation. To this I make answer: Every result that has ever taken place is in obedience to a potential law which cannot be evaded nor set aside.

13. Everything is just as it is because, according to the unchangeable and ever-existing laws of the universe, it cannot be any other way. Two halves are equal to the whole; not because some being has planned it to be so, but because it could not be any other way. Everything that takes place is as it is because, under all the circumstances governing the case, it could not be any other way. Ten times ten are a hundred, not by design, but because it could not be any other number.

14. So it is with everything in the domain of events; it is just as it is, not pursuant to some grand design, but because the eternal laws of the universe compel it to be just as it is.

15. Were not the universe equal to this, it could not be a perfect universe. But it is so perfect that it is superior to the design of any being or any god which beings have devised. It is immensely superior to any beings and all beings who have to plan, to fit, and try, and change their tactics. The universe is superior to all men combined, including all the gods men have devised.

16. The conception of gods, and the seeming necessity for them to account for the perfection of things as they exist, have arisen from the imperfect state of knowledge to which men have attained. The more ignorant and superstitious men are, the more they imagine the necessity for gods; and the more enlightened they become with true and perfect knowledge, the less use they will have for gods, and the more completely will they discard them.

17. The time is approaching when men will no longer create gods, nor imagine them. They will perceive in the universe the cause of all results, yea, the cause of all causes, and they will have no need to look beyond the universe to account for any of the phases of existence they see.

18. That will be a happy time for men on the earth—a time which will far transcend any period which men up to this time have experienced. In the past men have not only lost much time in devising and creating gods, and in striving to placate them and to appease their anger, but it has cost the world an incomputable amount of treasure in getting up these gods, and in supporting the countless retinue of priests which these gods have been thought to require, to study and reveal their will, and by powers of persuasion to induce them to change their course, and to cease from doing various kinds of mischief which they would otherwise perpetrate.

19. If the labor and treasure which have been expended in the manufacture of gods, in the erection of temples and houses for them to be worshiped in, and to pay the millions of priests who in the aggregate have been supported in idleness and luxury for pretending to interpret and reveal the will of the gods, had been employed in benefiting the world, and improving the human race, every swamp upon the face of the earth could have been drained, every country in the world could have been furnished with good carriage roads and railroads; every square mile of the earth's surface could have been supplied with a good, durable school-house, a teacher, and a good library.

20. If the wealth that has been paid to priests for proclaiming fables and fictions and falsehoods about gods and the will of gods could have been employed in increasing the knowledge and usefulness of the human race, the world to-day would occupy a position immensely in advance of that which it now occupies.

21. If the time that has been employed in working for priests, and in listening to their fables and fabrications, could have been used in studying the laws of the universe—the only governing principle in existence—the world would be vastly more advanced in the pursuit of truth, virtue, and happiness.

22. There never has been a class of men who pretended to know so much as priests; there never has been a class of men who claimed to know what they did not know so much as priests; there never has been a class of men who have taught so many lies as priests; there never has been a class of men who have increased darkness and superstition so much as priests; there never has been a class of men who have been such a fearful damage to their fellow-men as priests; there never has been a class of men whom to exterminate and to no longer tolerate would so benefit the remainder of the human race as priests.

23. Thanks to growing and ever-brilliant truth and science, thanks to increasing knowledge of the laws of the universe, and the principles of eternal justice and humanity, the priests are losing their power and influence, and are destined to pass away even as the belief in genii, gorgons, gnomes, fairies, witches, and all that retinue of impossible monsters are passing away. Let tnem go; the sooner they are gone, the better it will be for humanity.

24. Then did the Scribe open his mouth thus: I thank thee, Venerable Friend, for the words thou hast spoken, and I feel that they have been prompted by the principle of eternal truth; and I am pleased to say they confirm the opinions I have for some time maintained. Now, while thou art upon the subject of the gods, may I call attention to a remark thou madest yesternight with reference to the character of Yahweh, touching his being fickle, vindictive, jealous, cruel, and bloodthirsty? Wilt thou be so good as to say a few words on these points?

25. Then did Melchisedec again speak these words: To show that Yahweh was fickle-minded, and often repented of what he had attempted, I have only to call thy attention to a few portions of what is called his word. Not long after he is said to have made the world and placed man upon it did he bewail what he had done, and said, It repented him that he had made man on the earth, and grieved him at his heart (Gen. vi, 6). He repented of the evil he thought to do his people (Ex. xxxii, 14). He repented that he made Saul king (1 Sam. xv, 35).

26. A marked instance of his change of plan and of his repenting of what he had undertaken, is told in the story of the land toward which thou hast turned thy face. He early set it aside for his chosen people, and, with much show of magnanimity, several times over gave it to Abraham and his seed as a perpetual possession, and promised that the seed of Abraham should become as numerous as the sands of the sea.

27. Again, some three hundred years later, he led the descendants of Abraham a wearisome journey through the desert, and formally gave them possession of the land before given to Abraham, renewing the promise that they should possess it forever; but they had to obtain the country by putting to the sword in the most cruel manner the people who long had had it in quiet possession.

28. He, however, seems to have changed his mind, so far as the perpetual possession is concerned; for after an unsteady and precarious possession—the country being taken from them several times, and they carried away into captivity on several occasions—they were finally utterly defeated, and deprived of the land so repeatedly promised them as a perpetual possession, showing that he had changed his mind in the premises, or was unable to fulfill his promises. For eighteen centuries the seed of Abraham—never made a thousandth part as numerous as promised—have been deprived of that land as a home and possession.

29. That he possessed an irascible temper and yielded to anger on the slightest occasion, there are an abundance of facts to prove. Such expressions as these are common in his accorded word: His anger, His fierce anger, His anger was kindled, it waxed hot, his wrath waxing hot, and many others of a similar character.

30. His hatred is as often alluded to. He says, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated. He will not slack to him that hateth him. He will repay to his face. The Lord hateth us. Then I hated them, I will love them no more. He visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the third and fourth generations.

31. His jealousy is frequently mentioned; I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God. They provoked him to jealousy with strange gods. He is a jealous God. I will give thee blood in fury and jealousy; and much like unto this.

32. His vengeance is often referred to. He often says: I will take vengeance. Vengeance is mine. The day of vengeance is in my heart; with others of the same tenor.

33. Of his cruelty and murderous disposition there is no end of proof. On one occasion, when he met his own man Moses at an inn he sought to kill him. In his own word he is represented as a destroyer of man and beast. According to Isaiah xxxiv, 2–8, he is represented as a slave-dealer. In Joel iii, 8, he says, I will send your sons and your daughters into the hands of the children of Judah, and they shall sell them unto the Sabeans, to a people far off, for the Lord hath spoken it. In Jer. xiii, 14, he says: I will dash them one against another, even the fathers and sons together, saith the Lord. I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy them. In 1 Sam. xxiv, 1, he is described as an inciter of evil.

34. A few specimens of his laws will portray his true character: When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight against it, then proclaim peace unto it. And it shall be if it make thee answer of peace, and open unto thee, that all found therein shall be tributaries to thee, and they shall serve thee. And if it make no peace with thee, but will make war against thee, then thou shalt besiege it. And when the Lord thy God hath delivered it unto thy hands thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword. But the women and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, shalt thou take unto thyself, and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies which the Lord thy God hath given thee. Thus shalt thou do unto the cities which are very far off from thee, which are not of the cities of these nations. But of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save nothing alive that breatheth (Deut. xx, 10–16).

35. Here is another of his commands: Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor (Ex. xxxii, 27).

36. That he carried his malice for a long time this passage will stand as proof: Thus saith the Lord of hosts: I remember that which Amalek did to Israel [four hundred years before]. Now he laid wait for him., etc. Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all they have; slay man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass (1 Sam. xv, 2, 3). There is much more in the same line, but I have quoted enough.

37. Of his fondness for bloodshed, I have only to call your attention to the fact that for hundreds of years he required a steady flow of blood from bullocks, rams, and he-goats for his special pleasure. At the time of the introduction of the ark into the temple sheep and oxen were sacrificed in such quantities that they could not be told nor numbered for multitude. At the dedication of the temple twenty-two thousand oxen and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep were slaughtered.

38. But the most cruel of all was he when he demanded the blood of his only beloved son to answer the demands of his justice, and to make it possible for him to look with any mercy upon his own offspring.

39. His disregard for human life is most marked all along through his word, from the time when he sent a flood to drown all the inhabitants of the earth, including the innocent animals; from the time when he caused the death of the first-born of every family in Egypt, and drowned a million or two Egyptians in the Red Sea, to the destruction of fifteen thousand children of Israel in the desert by plague; and the slaughter of the Midianites, when he not only ordered all the males, including the little babes, put to death in cold blood, but even every woman who had ever lain with man, while the young maidens, the girls, and the little female infants were kept for the use of the soldiers.

40. The campaign of Joshua in the land of Canaan, when he moved by direct command of Yahweh, was one of the most bloody and disastrous to human life on record. Massacres, slaughters, and carnage were kept up for years. Numerous cities were destroyed, and often all the men, women, and children exterminated by the edge of the sword.

41. On one occasion Yahweh smote with sudden death fifty thousand and seventy men because one man had ventured to lift the lid of a box in which the person of Yahweh was said to have taken up its abode.

42. On another occasion he smote with death seventy thousand of his own people because his servant David had numbered the people, when he had himself moved David to the act, and the people who were smitten with death had nought to do with it.

43. The wars of the children of Israel, in which Yahweh was on one or both sides, and caused great destruction of life, were often extremely bloody. When he assisted Abijah against Jeroboam five hundred thousand Israelites were slain in a single day. On another occasion he changed sides, and helped Pekah of Israel to put to death one hundred and twenty thousand of the army of Judah. Thus he alternated from one side to the other, but left a balance against Israel of three hundred and eighty thousand.

44. He was especially found of slaying the men of the adjoining nations who engaged in war with his special people. At one time one hundred thousand Syrians under Benhadad were slain, and twenty-seven thousand more of the same army killed by a wall falling upon them. At another time one hundred and eighty-five thousand Assyrians were slain by Yahweh in a single night.

45. But the subject is an unpleasant one to dwell upon, and though I have mentioned but a small part of the instances of his taking life on a large scale, it will suffice. There can be no doubt that Yahweh was a cruel, blood-thirsty, fickle, and revengeful god. I will now bid thee good-night, and take my departure.

46. The Scribe thanked the Venerable Visitor and bade him good-night. That night he slept long and soundly.

CHAPTER VI.

THE THIRD DAY'S TRAVEL.

1. When the morning meal had been partaken of the captain of the host led the pilgrims on foot up the stream to the foot of Hermon, where is one of the fountains of the Jordan. Up near the rocks in a small basin the clear waters gush up amid the stones, and were the place cleaned out and a dam built across the lower part a fine pond could be made withal.

2. Water enough flows from this spring, if utilized and the fall taken advantage of, to run a score of mills; but here there is nothing for mills to do, and few people to give them work.

3. The Scribe did take a seat upon a stone beside the stream, and with his right hand did dip up the water of the river Jordan near its source, and drink thereof. If he has not now eternal life he would like to know the reason why thereof.

4. Under the rocks is a cave once sacred to the worship of the god Pan, and in the solid rock niches and shrines have been carefully cut, with inscriptions to the sylvan god. Here are also ruins of a temple, said to have been erected by Herod; while on the summit of Hermon are the ruins of a very ancient temple to the sun.

5. The south gate of the old city was next visited, where Roman inscriptions were seen. A wall once inclosed the town round about, but long since it fell into ruins. The bridge, said to be older than the time of Herod, still stands—a relic of ancient times.

6. The present town consists of some two score of miserable low stone huts, with no windows or chimneys, and the streets are even too muddy and filthy for hogs to wallow in withal. Thus has the glory of ancient Cesarea Philippi sadly departed.

7. A due portion of the gospel story is connected with Philippi. Jesus visited this place with his disciples; and here, after asking his followers whom men said he was, he asked Peter whom he considered him to be.

8. In response, Peter made a flattering little speech, by saying, Thou art Christ, the son of the living God. Whereupon Jesus returned the compliment by saying, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whomsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whomsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.

9. This little address has been made great use of by the Romish church, and from it they have taken the authority of their popes based upon the succession of Peter; and from these words they have drawn the authority to persecute unto death thousands upon thousands who have dared to doubt, even in a small degree.

10. It is a matter of considerable doubt whether these words were spoken as they come down to us, but, at all events, they have been rife with ill to the human race.

11. Near this very place is the termination of Mount Hermon, an eminence which is said to be the self-same place where Jesus was transfigured. True, there is some dispute among authorities whether it was on this mount or on Mount Tabor, south of Lake Tiberius, or the Sea of Galilee.

12. But fortunately the pilgrims are not compelled to accept either to the disadvantage of the other. This is one of those cases where those who pay their money can take their choice.

13. There is also a slight difficulty in this transfiguration story. It was a remarkable circumstance, if it really took place; but Matthew, who describes the event, says John was one who was present on that momentous occasion; but John, in his story, has not a word to say about it. The probabilities are very strong that no such event ever occurred.

14. When the Scribe lifted up his eyes to the bare rocky mass before him, where a shrub cannot grow large enough for an ox-goad withal, and where one probably never did grow, he opened his mouth and said:

15. As my soul liveth, if I were to be transfigured, and have a good time with Moses and Elias, and I could not find a more pleasant place for it than this naked, cheerless hill of rock, I would pass, and let the next one make it—in short, I would not be transfigured at all.

16. After the pilgrims had mounted their steeds for another day's ride, they moved on to the site of the ancient city of Dan, the northernmost city of the Land of Yahweh; the same being not an hour's ride from Cesarea Philippi.

17. The city could not at any time have been an exceeding large city, for the mound, two score and ten feet high, upon which it was builded, is two hundred paces across, and is nearly round; and not a house, not a hut, now stands there.

18. It was near this city of Dan that Lot was taken prisoner and carried off, whereupon Abraham armed his household and secured his relatives, and pursued his enemies even unto Dan. So reads the word; but that account could not have been written by Moses, for during his lifetime there was no such city as Dan.

19. After the children of Israel entered the Land of Canaan, the descendants of Dan made a foray against the people of Laish, and smote them with the edge of the sword, and burned the city with fire; and they built a city and dwelt therein, and called the name of the city Dan, after the name of Dan, their father (Judges xviii, 27).

20. Close by the side of the low mound upon which Dan once stood is another of the sources of the Jordan. Here is another very large spring—larger than the one before described—and one can see the crystal fountain as it bubbles up continually. This spring, with the one at Cesarea Philippi, make the principal sources of the river Jordan.

21. These two springs make one stream, and after a few miles they empty into Lake Huleh, or the waters of Merom, a little body of shallow water, two or three miles in length, and half a score of miles farther down the plain of Huleh, or the upper valley of the Jordan.

22. For the whole day the journey of the pilgrims lay along this plain of Huleh, the northeastern portion of the Land of Yahweh. For many miles it is exceedingly rocky, not one acre in a score being possible to plow. The rocks vary in size from those a man can lift up to some of a thousand pounds, and they are so thick together that a man could walk miles upon them and not touch his foot to the ground.

23. Then did the Scribe inquire in this wise, Why did Yahweh in getting up a country after his own heart, and just to please himself, take the trouble to make so many rocks for it? No answer was received.

24. In riding down the plain the hills of Naphtali, the same being the continuation of the mountains of Lebanon, were on our right, and the hills of Bashan were on our left. The valley between, called the plain of Huleh, is five miles in width.

25. When the rocky portion was passed, sections of better land were reached along the border, while in the center it is very swampy, and nothing but flags, or papyrus plant, and flat grass can grow there.

26. For the noonday meal the pilgrims halted at a place which the Scribe called Mill-race, because there a stone race had been builded to conduct a small stream of water to a mill.

27. No other habitations are here, save several tents of the Bedouins, who abound in these parts. They gather the papyrus plant, which is a tall flag, and they weave it into a coarse matting, of which they make their tents by stretching it over slight poles. For the roof they use coarse black woolen blankets.

28. They are a dark, wild-looking people, seeming to be cut out for pirates and brigands. They dwell upon high lands in the summer and come down in the valleys for the winter.

29. They gathered around us when we eat, and the women and children repeatedly ask for backsheesh, which, being interpreted, means a gift. The Scribe had many small Turkish coins, and he gave one each to a score of them. But some thought the sum too small.

30. Villages composed of these Bedouin tents were passed in this day's travel. The men mostly carry a long flint-lock musket, and the women stain or tattoo their faces, especially their under lip, which does not improve their natural uncomeliness. They would not draw the hearts of men astray.

31. As the sun settled in the west the white tents of the pilgrims were pitched at Ain Mellahah, a comely place, hard by a rich fountain, ample enough to turn a mill—the same being over against the waters of Merom, not much more than a mile distant.

32. Right by our side is a high hill of rock, claimed to be the site on which the ancient city of Hazor stood, whose king, Jabin, aroused all the sheiks and chiefs in the neighborhood to join him in giving battle to Joshua when he made a victorious conquest of the Land of Yahweh.

33. It was at this spot between our camp and the waters of Merom where the deadly battle is said to have been fought, and where Joshua whipped out all his adversaries.

34. Howbeit, there is some disagreement of opinion as to whether this hill of rock by us is where Hazor stood. Dr. Robinson says yes, others say no. All again are left free to make their own choice.

35. As the king of Hazor had a great number of chariots, with which he came down to fight Joshua, it would seem most unlikely this mount could have been the place, for the Scribe is sure no chariot ever went up or down that mass of rock.

36. There can be no mistake about the waters of Merom being the battle scene where Yahweh said to his General Joshua, Be not afraid because of them; for to-morrow about this time will I deliver them all slain before Israel; thou shalt hough their horses, and burn their chariots with fire. So Joshua (as the story runs) came, and all the people of war with him, against them by the waters of Merom suddenly: and they fell upon them. And the Lord delivered them into the hand of Israel (Josh. xi, 4–8). The mercy of the Lord endureth forever. Praise his name, all ye people. Selah.

37. Then it was by the waters of Merom, where the blood of thousands had been spilt, and close by the hill on which had been built the city of Hazor, did the Scribe lift his voice and say: Of a truth this is the land of Yahweh; this is the land he gave unto his chosen people as an everlasting possession; this is the Holy Land which I have heard of thousands of times from the days of my childhood. I am surrounded even now by this Holy Land.

38. Then did the Scribe take up a handful of this holy soil, and did look at it closely: he even looked at it through his spectacles; he smelt of it; he even put some in his mouth, and did taste it withal; he took it from the north side of the camp, and from the south side of the camp, and he did examine it with exceeding great care that he might discover the holiness, if any there were in it.

39. Then when he had made an end of his search and found nought out of the common course of things did he speak in this wise: As my soul liveth, I see and smell and taste no more holiness in this soil that I do in the soil of America and in the soil of Europe. If there was ever any extra amount of holiness in it, it is not there now.

40. Peradventure, when Yahweh did relinquish his experiment, and abandoned the land and the people which he had chosen, and betook himself to the crowded cities of Europe and to the wilds of America, he extracted from this soil all the holiness he had put in it and reserved it for the possessions he might next select.

41. Or, peradventure, when he no longer dwelt in this land, his holiness was dried up by the sun and blown away by the winds, and thus was cast upon the desert air where it could be of no use.

42. Verily Yahweh's ways are not as man's ways; for if a prudent man had taken unto himself a goodly country, and had placed therein a people which he had selected from all the nations of the earth, he would not quickly abandon the enterprise and give it up in disgust, because a few discouragements arose; but he would rather use extra exertion, especially if he possessed the power to execute his will; and he would not own himself vanquished until he had exhausted all his ability.

43. But Yahweh doeth not so; he either undertook more than he was able to accomplish, or he had not the prescience to foresee what the nature of his experiment would be; or he is too fickle-minded to hold to one purpose generation after generation. Great is Yahweh! Let his great name and his praises be sounded through all lands, save in his own land!

44. Then did the Scribe cast his eyes about him, and looked upon the miles of rocks which stretched themselves before him and which were over the hills of Naphtali, and then did he ask questions in this wise:

45. Go to now, are all these rocks more holy than all the other rocks in the earth? And if holiness was once in them, is it still in them now? And would it take more fuel to roast them into lime than as though no holiness was in them? Or, from the long absence of Yahweh in distant parts of the earth, has the holiness evaporated out of these rocks also, even as water evaporateth out of a sponge?

46. Then did the Scribe shake his head in dismay, and cast his eyes toward the earth; and even did he speak words like unto these: As my soul liveth, I understand not the mystery of holiness; I understand not how, if Yahweh once filled this soil and these rocks with holiness, why is it not here now? I understand not, if holiness be not now in these hills and plains, how it was ever therein. I understand not, if Yahweh placed holiness here, who should presume to take it away, or what was done with it withal.

47. Again did the Scribe shake his head in great doubt; again did he look restlessly about him, his trouble of mind waxing great and his doubts increasing within him.

48. Then did he retire into the tent which beareth the Stars and Stripes, and say unto himself, I will lay me down to rest; I will not longer weary myself about holiness of which man knoweth but little; I will seek sweet sleep and gather strength for to-morrow's journey. Howbeit this day the pilgrims had journeyed about a score of miles.

E. A. Stevens, of Chicago, writes us: "In answer to several personal inquiries as to the non-appearance of the Liberal League (in issuing which I was associated with Mr. Magie), allow me to say: shortly after the appearance of the first number, and when I had prepared the larger portion of the second, a change of employment necessitated my giving my time either to the paper or to business. After consulting with Mr. Magie, who owned the material and was willing to continue its publication, I withdrew. All correspondence, subscriptions, etc., as they hav arrived at my address, hav been turned over to that gentleman. Hereafter all matters pertaining to the Liberal League (paper) should be addressed to Jas. K. Magie, 939 W. Madison St., Chicago.

Liberal News.

The Liberals of Mauston, Wis., celebrated the birthday of Paine with a lecture by W. F. Jamieson at their Opera Hall.

The Great West makes copious extracts from Mr. Bennett's letters. Brick Pomeroy knows a good thing when he sees it.

Prof. Adler has gone West for two weeks to fulfil lecture engagements. He has lectures at Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis.

E. H. Heywood, of Princeton, Mass., is in danger of losing his home through financial difficulties, and appeals to his friends to help him.

The lecture before the Society of Humanity next Sunday evening will be by W. H. Harris, on "Humanity as a Religious Conception."

On February 7th Mr. Bradlaugh expects to present a petition to Parliament, containing 100,000 names, requesting that he be allowed to take his seat.

H. L. Green should be addressed until further notice in care of Willie E. Green, Otsego, Mich. He spoke at Elysia last Sunday, and will speak on the 16th speaks at Hart, Mich.

Mr. Crew, of Henry county, Iowa, was recently elected to the legislature of that state. Being a Liberal, he refused to take the oath, and was allowed to affirm. Iowa politicians are growing.

Joseph Hart, an aged shoemaker of Wilmington, Del., an avowed disciple of Thomas Paine, who regularly decorated his shop with American flags upon the anniversary of Paine's birthday, died on January 29th, the day he loved to celebrate.

Dr. J. W. Draper leaves five children. Each of his three sons has made an enviable reputation in the walks of science—Daniel Draper as a meteorologist, John Christopher Draper as a chemist and physiologist, and Henry Draper as an astronomer.

Gambetta is a Freethinker. He has publicly professed himself a disciple of Voltaire, and stated that in his opinion Comte was the greatest thinker of this century. He presided, three months ago, at Paul Bert's Atheistical lectures, and led the applause.

Geo. B. Clark is the latest Unitarian minister who has given up his orthodoxy and taken to preaching the gospel of common sense and truth. He is desirous of engagements to lecture, and any society or person desiring his services may address him at 51 Fort Avenue (Roxbury), Boston, Mass.

Mesdames Colby and Smith hav removed their lectures from Harvard Rooms to Frobisher Hall, Fourteenth street, between Broadway and Fifth ave. Hereafter the services will be in the morning at 10:30, and evening at 8. The lectures are well attended and proving a great success. Mrs. Colby is one of the best lecturers in the field.

The change of owners of Man, and change from a weekly to a monthly, made a new registration as second-class matter necessary. The application was referred from the New York post-office to the department at Washington. There they had to sit on it seventeen days before they could come to a decision. Then they didn't decide, but could only issue a "temporary permit" to mail the paper at pound rates. So Man is registered as a kind of "ticket-of-leave Man." This slowness of the postal authorities has delayed the February number. It will be out about the 10th.

Germania Assembly Hall was filled in honor of the Author-Hero of the Revolution on the evening of the 29th ult. Prof. Robinson furnished some brilliant piano solos, and Mr. George Warr and Miss Bell Warr sang and Mr. Brown played on his violincello. Mr. Wilson, an old-time veteran, presided, and gave an account of the career of Thomas Paine. Mr. Warr read testimonials from George Washington, Mme. Roland, and others, vindicating the good name of Thomas Paine. Samuel P. Putnam delivered an address showing the grand ideas and principles for which Paine stood—liberty, humanity, science, democracy, and intellectual clearness and thoroughgoing honesty of opinion. The meeting was in every sense a success. The music was of a high order, and showed what can be done to stir the hearts of the people when this noble instrumentality is used for the expression of Liberal ideas.

Frank. M. Pixley, editor of the San Francisco Argonaut, writing home to his paper from this city says: "Yesterday I spent half an hour with Colonel Ingersoll, and it took him all that time to tell me, in his enthusiastic and hearty manner, what a superlativly splendid fellow General Arthur is, what a supremely excellent president he will make, how incomparably superior he is to any president we hav ever had or are ever likely to hav, and how grateful we ought to be for the accident that has given him to us. He lauded him to the heavens for his intellect, his genius, his generosity, his justice. He possesses the finest qualities of head and heart, and will adorn his exalted position. He will shed luster on the Republican throne. In a word, if Colonel Robert had himself believed in the existence of God, he would hav convinced me that the presidency of General Arthur was a special providence for the good of the country and the good of the Republican party."

CHAPTER XXIV.

CONCERNING IRENÆUS.

Irenæus in truth knew nothing of science, philosophy, and eloquence; he always limited himself to repeating that which Justin, Tertullian, and others said. He believed with them that the soul is a light and aerial body; and he thought that the reign of a thousand years in the New Jerusalem would come upon the earth. We find out in his fifth book, chapter xxxiii, how much corn one grain produces, and how many hogsheads of wine a vintage in that beautiful city will yield.* He predicted the Antichrist at the end of a thousand years, and explained the mystery of the numbers 666, which were to be the mark of the beast. We cannot see wherein all this differs from what the other fathers of the church said.

But there is one thing more important, which is not to be brushed aside. That is where he assures us that Jesus died in his fiftieth year, and not at thirty-one or thirty-three, as we infer from the evangelists.

Irenæus† takes the evangelists as proof of what he says. He uses the testimony of the old man who lived with John and the other apostles; and declares most positivly that there were some who came too late to know the apostles, and it is those who are of a contrary opinion. He himself adds, contrary to his usual custom, as proof of his conclusiv reasoning: "The evangelist John said to Jesus, 'Your father Abraham has been exalted that he might see my days: he has seen them and is greatly rejoiced.' And the Jews respond: 'Art thou a fool? Thou hast not lived fifty years, and yet thou boastest to hav seen our father Abraham.'"

Irenæus concludes that Jesus was very nearly fifty years old when the Jews spake thus. In fact, if Jesus had been thirty-one or more years old at that time he would not hav spoken of fifty years. Finally, since Irenæus calls upon the evangelists for proof, and upon all the old men who had written anything, it proves that the evangelists of that period were not the same as those which we hav to-day. Their books hav been altered just as other books hav been. But because they change, that should not render them any the less reasonable.

CHAPTER XXV.

CONCERNING ORIGEN AND THE TRINITY.

Clement of Alexandria was the first philosopher among the Christians. Origen was the first reasoner. But such philosophy as they had in those times! He was celebrated as a child, and taught at a very opportune hour in that great city of Alexandria, where the Christians had a public school. They had none in Rome. Among those who assumed the title of the bishop of Rome we do not know of a single man of ability, and, what is more remarkable, this church, which in the end became so powerful and so proud, derived all from the Egyptians and Greeks.

There is, without doubt, a great deal of folly in the philosophy of Origen, which is evident in his advice about emasculation. Epiphanius wrote that a prefect of Alexandria gave him the alternativ either to serve as Ganymede to an Ethiopian, or be sacrificed to the gods, and that he was sacrificed for not ministering to the passions of an Ethiopian (Epiphan. Haeres 64, ch. ii).

If this is the reason which caused him to make himself a eunuch, or if there was another reason, I leave it to the savants who make a specialty of the history of eunuchs; I limit myself to the history of the follies of the human mind.

Clement was the first one who popularized that nonsense about the Trinity that has been forgotten since the time of Justin. A few among the Christians at that time began to regard the son of Mary as a god, as an offspring of the Father, as the first dawn, as an identical being in some way with the Father; but they had not yet deified the sacred spirit. They never thought of the falsification, therefore I do not know in which letter attributed to John they inserted the following ridiculous words, "There are three who hav testified in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Sacred Spirit." Should we dare to speak of the three substances, or divine beings, which, taken together, make up the substance of the divine creator of the world? Did they say that they would giv proof? There are other examples still more ridiculous, "There are three who testify in matter, in spirit, and in blood, and the three are one."* Some hav added, "and these three are in Jesus." These various passages, each one different from the other, are not found in the old manuscripts; none of the fathers of the first century hav cited them; besides, what good could they receive from those admitting the falsification? How could they say that the spirit, water, and blood form the Trinity and then are not one? Is it because it was said that Jesus had sweat blood and water, and then turned into the spirit? What relation is there between these three things and a god in three personal substances?

The trinity of Plato was another kind; it was not well known; we can find such in his Timæus. The eternal demiurge is the first cause of all that exists; his archetypal idea is the second cause; the universal soul, which is his work, is the third. There is some sense in this idea of Plato. God conceives the idea of the world; God makes it, he animates it; but never has Plato been foolish enough to say that there were three individuals in one God. Origen was a Platonist; he took what he could from Plato, and made a trinity in his own fashion. This system remained so obscure during the early centuries that Lactantius, in the time of the Emperor Constantine, called by name all the Christians in explaining the origin of the church, but did not say one word concerning the Trinity; upon the contrary, he says, in chapter xxix, book iv, of his "Institutes:" "Perhaps some one will ask why we adore a single god. When we assure them there are two, a father and son, we do not make any distinction, because the father could not exist without his son nor the son without his father."

The sacred spirit was completely forgotten by Lactantius, and some years afterward a slight notice was taken of it by the Council of Nice; for after having made a declaration, as solemn as unintelligible, concerning the doctrin of his book, that the son is of the same substance as the father, the council was content with simply saying, "We believe also in the sacred spirit."†

We can say that Origen was the first to lay down that metaphysical chimera which has been a source of great discord, and which has been absolutely useless. It is evident that a man may be very honest or wise or moderate with one personality or with three, but these theological niceties hav nothing in common with our duties. Origen attributed a subtil body to God, the angels, and to all souls; and he said that God the father and God the son are two different substances; that the father is greater than the son, the son is greater than the sacred spirit, and the sacred spirit is greater than the angels. He said that the father is good in essence, but that the son is not good in himself; that the son is not a truth in comparison with his father, but only the image of the father; that it is alone to the father we should address our prayers; and that the son carried to heaven the flesh with which he was clothed by his mother, and in mounting to heaven he left his body in the sun.‡

He declared that the Virgin Mary, in giving birth to the son of God, delivered herself of an after-birth like others, and that she was compelled to purify herself in the Jewish temple, because they think that nothing is so impure as an after-birth. The coarse and petulant Jerome reproached him bitterly about one hundred and fifty years after his death, and many of his opinions were similar to those of Jerome; for since the primitiv Christians were concerned in having dogmas, they published to the world that they were injured persons, and proclaimed far and wide civil war which should, for the sake of argument, desolate the world.

We should not forget that Origen is noted more than all others in translating the facts of the scripture into allegories; and it is well to add that these allegories are extremely pleasant. The fat in the sacrifices is the soul of Jesus Christ; the tail of the animal which is offered upon the altar signifies the perseverance of good works. If it is said in Exodus xxiii that God took Moses in the cleft of a rock, and that Moses saw the buttocks and not the face of God, that cleft in the rock is meant to be Jesus Christ, through which one could see the rear of God the father.*

I think, now, enough concerning the fathers is made known to clearly see upon what foundation they hav built an ill-omened edifice, which has already demoralized the reason. Reason has always declared that religion should be clear, simple, universal, within the reach of every soul, because it is intended for all; its morals should not be disguised by dogmas; nothing absurd should disfigure it. Reason has in vain dictated this, but fanaticism has overreached reason; and what worse evils has fanaticism not produced?

*Each vine produces ten thousand clusters, each cluster ten thousand grapes, and each grape ten thousand measures [1771].

†Irenæus, book 2, chap. xxii, edit de Paris 1710.

*Many are troubled to know if these words are John's or not. Two of the Christ-lovers who hav rejected them attest an ancient manuscript in the Vatican in which these words are not found. Those who believe they are John's words show this by more recent manuscripts. But without entering into a useless discussion, either the words are John's or they are not. If they are, it would hav been necessary to confine John in the Bedlam of his time, if they had one; if they are not his, they are forgeries of a very foolish and impudent kind. It is necessary to state that nothing was more common among the first followers of Christ than such unblushing suppositions. They did not discover their forgeries because such works were rare, and this growing faction only permitted those who were initiated in their mysteries to see them!

We hav already mentioned that the crime more heinous than all others in the eyes of this sect was to show the gentiles what they called their sacred books. What strange inconsistency among these unfortunates! They say, "We shall preach Christianity all over the earth, and we shall not show any one the books in which that Christianity is explained." What would we say to that crowd of beggars who come into the hall of Westminster to reclaim the goods of a man who died in France, and who refused to show the will or testament of their dead friend? [1771.]

†What an unfortunate mistake was the sacred spirit, that agion pneuma of which the followers of Christ hav made a third god! That word signifies breath. The following can be found in the gospel attributed to John (chap. xx, 22), "When he says these things, he blows upon them and says, Receive the sacred spirit." Remember this was an ancient ceremony of the magicians. They blew in the mouth of those they wished to enchant. Here, then, is the origin of the third god of those fools. There is nothing more blasphemous or more impious. Hav not the mussulmans good reason for regarding such as wicked idolatry? [1771].

‡"You hav made a God of Jesus," said Celsus. "We do not build," answered Origen, "statues or temples to Jesus, who has exhorted us not to adore anything material or human; who wishes us to adore God alone. We do not adore Jesus; we admire him."

Mr. Noe's Psycho-Atomic Theory Examined.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of Dec. 31st J. Allen Noe takes me up on the question whether there is anything that may be called "God" or not, and argues that there is no one first cause, but that the universe is made up of atoms, out of whose mutually limiting forces development proceeds, and therefore there is no place for a God. He also says that these atoms contain immortal souls, thus adopting the theories of Liebnitz rather than of Epicurus.

Well, I admit that the theory of a world made up of living atoms, which, when organized into living bodies, supply from their own life the consciousness which these bodies exhibit, may do for a hypothesis. It is certainly an improvement on the old-fashioned Materialism, with its impassable gulf between unconscious and conscious matter. But as an attempt to explain everything, it does not seem to me to be any more of a success than the ten thousand other metaphysical systems which aim at the same impracticable result.

Where did the atoms come from in the first place? If they hav already existed forever, how much longer than forever will they hav existed to-morrow? How can the life-principles of millions of indivisible atoms be fused into one, as it is in my own conscious life? To these and millions of equally natural questions no answer is possible. Plainly, then, the "monadology" of Liebnitz, which Mr. Noe has adopted, does not explain the universe. Moreover, nothing can explain it. To explain is to class, to exhibit what appeared to be an exception as a case of some general rule. This is possible only with something finite. But the universe is infinit, or at least indefinit in extent; and not only this, but without any natural lines of division. When we take up any class of phenomena, as Liebnitz does, even in his theory, we make an arbitrary beginning. Behind that beginning lies an unexplained, indefinit mystery. "Mystery of godliness," Mr. Noe says, sarcastically; but it is the boundless depth of being in which our little sight surrounds us with so very small a radius of knowledge, worthy to be mentioned with contempt?

I hope I am the last man to disparage the glorious results of science, or the severe exactness of the scientific method. I wish to all the gods it were more generally and thoroughly understood, especially by Freethinkers. But even when it has made "earth paradise and hell a fable," we shall still, I say, know far less of the universe than one animalcule knows about the sea. Imagin an animalcule proclaiming that he knows all there is to know about the ocean; has a theory which explains its existence and all its properties, and in particular refutes entirely those animalcules who, though not superstitious enough to believe that it was made by the Gulf-stream or the trade winds, are not "entirely free" from the [illegible] sion that there may be in it some "intelligence [illegible] and beyond" that of an animalcule. How [illegible] more worthy of imitation the example of New[illegible] who said of his great generalization which flatterers said explained all nature, "I feel myself like a child picking up shells upon the sea-shore. The great ocean of truth lies unexplored before me."

It lies just as much unexplored before us; though already we hav advanced far enough beyond Newton for the dullest scholar to see that his modesty was in no way excessiv. I do not envy the state of mind which sees in the boundless, inaccessible truth nothing but a subject for either ridicule or defiance. The Agnostic is neither forced to the belief in a personal God who made the universe out of nothing, nor can he declare his independence of the "unknown and unknowable." The more he breaks away from every form of worship which claims to represent the great Supreme, the more he finds that there is such a mysterious power, and that he does "lean upon" it, and cannot even imagin himself existing without it. One reason why modern Freethought does not spread faster is that the absence of cordial recognition for the religious instinct repels the masses who are conscious of such a feeling in themselvs. This is an inevitable inconvenience, doubtless, but a very great one. Spiritualism spreads faster than pure Agnosticism, because Spiritualism givs room for the exercise of the religious faculty. Preferring Agnosticism, because it asserts nothing but what can be proved true, I must yet regret that it presents no immediate adequate satisfaction for the minds of those who not only agree with me in admiring to enthusiasm that in which we liv, and move, and hav our being, but cannot be content, as I can, without a theory and a form to match their instinct of devotion. I must, therefore, very strongly press its claims against anything which assumes to go still further, and assures us that there is nothing to admire, nothing to reverence, nothing to sympathize with, except man, whom perhaps (though willing to help him) we hav not found very admirable, reverend, or sympathetic; but, on the contrary, a good deal of a dunce, very much of a rogue, and at his best an ignoramus. Mr. Noe proposes that we "increase the divine within." I should like to know how, except by getting into rapport with the divine in nature. But why follow up an opponent who yields the point? If he admits a "divine" either within or without, Mr. Noe is clearly not an Atheist "in the full sense of the word." C. L. JAMES.

Several Things.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Geo. Chainey, in his "Liberal Press" lecture, says: "Cover a fault with silence rather than bring it to the light of publicity. I hold in measureless scorn the practice of hunting down and blazoning to the world all the crimes of the clergy." To this may be added the adage, "He who stops to kick a barking cur but delays his own progress." But so long as the Christian world seeks every available opportunity to injure, belie, and misrepresent the Liberal cause, it seems necessary to resort to their own mode of warfare in the contest. A wise man, when asked with what to reward unkindness, replied, "Reward kindness with kindness, but unkindness with equity." To conceal our opponents' faults, to silently submit to vituperations, slanderous detractions, and defamations is not an equitable reward. Had we only to deal with the cultured, the thoughtful, the fair-minded, instead of the class who hav ever contended it is right to deceive and falsify for Christ's sake and the orthodox cause, we would need only to address ourselvs to the reason, the intellect. Alas! humanity, as found to exist, has not yet evoluted from animal traits sufficiently to appreciate or reciprocate the return of good for evil. Consider the unfairness of even the jurist, Judge Black! If such unfairnesss comes from the best minds of the opposing faction, what are we to expect from the worst? Pistol balls in lieu of fagots! Judge Black saw himself powerless to answer Col. Ingersoll's masterly arguments, hence he sought retreat through detraction of his antagonist's abilities —"his mental peculiarities, his habits of shallow thinking, and rash talking," etc. First, he "excoriates the great Infidel!" Greatness, shallowness, and rashness are not usually associates. Not only Col. Ingersoll, but his compeers, Geo. Chainey and B. F. Underwood—whose eloquent and telling discourses are barbed with keen truth, and carry conviction to every thoughtful mind—are called "wild, loose, senseless, illogical, blasphemous," by the clergy and their Christian followers, who thus confess their inability to meet them by fair argument. Hence we may be compelled to resort to our opponents' tactics; expose their faults and immoralities; prove that they are in all things human; not exempt from crime, wantonness, and passion ungoverned; that they are deceitful; that they resort to any subterfuge to carry their point, to sustain their creed, and to uphold their superstitions! Yes, there is still need to pause to kick these barking curs. One feels better for having formed his duty, however disagreeable it may hav Me this duty and its discharge were never better hi d than in the life of D. M. Bennett. For f he was compelled to parry with these brig, but now he has left them like so many slain wolves along his triumphant course. Abroad he is received with distinguished honors, and his pen glowingly depicts foreign scenes and life, as around the world he goes.

Ah, what humiliation, what a rankling thorn in the great, proud, and tyrannical church's side, is this triumph of Liberalism! Our valiant leader, high up on fame's ladder, commands an outlook of the world.

I like Mr. Chainey's idea of cartooning Bible scenes of a miraculous nature, as well as some not so miraculous. This is a fine keynote; let it be sounded. Who shall be the Nast to immortalize his crayon?

Mr. Allen Noe's article on "God or No God?" is apropos. The quotation from Humboldt seems a truism—"Natural law, or the inherent forces of nature, brought us here, holds us here, and will take us hence; we must all succumb to the inherent forces of nature." We are not only here, from no willing of our own, but mentally and physically are predestined, antenatal conditions having molded us inexorably, or, as Lizzie Doten has beautifully and poetically voiced it:

> "Out of earth's elements mingled with flame,
> Out of life's compound of glory and shame,
> Fashioned and shaped by no will of their own,
> And helplessly into life's history thrown;
> Born by the law that compels men to be,
> Born to conditions they could not foresee,
> Born by one law, through all nature the same—
> What made them to differ, and who is to blame?"

Parenthetically I would say, Let us extend the warm hand of fellowship to the Institute of Heredity. To the article of Samuel P. Putnam, on Heredity, in your issue of Dec. 24th, I say "Amen!" The question of heredity is one of paramount importance. We must begin at the fountain-head of life to purify and call forth living streams.

One word about the God idea. Under "Gems of Thought" we see "Deity," "the being who directs," "God requires not men," etc., quotations given as gems. In one of these Paley "saw deity more clearly in the pleasures of a young child than in anything else in the world." Had he sought out the watchful mother, the source of the child's happiness and pleasures, his God would hav been lost in her. A neglected, sorrowing, hungry, filthy child is a fair representation of a God in the skies. His "finger of a God and the disposition which directs it" in the child's happiness, is all found to proceed from the loving, true mother.

In the Investigator I see a notice that H. L. Green is campaigning for the New York State Freethinkers' Convention of August next. Let us each now decide to be in attendance—work for that end—going not alone, but having our twelve disciples with us, each bearing his mite of interest to aid in giving life, zest, and enthusiasm to the convention. When I told friends what a soul-refreshing, joyous, jolly time we had last year, they said, "I should hav gone, but supposed it would be lonely, not knowing any one there." This idea must be put to flight; the social feature must become prominent if you would hav these conventions a success. The social and intellectual must be blended; the one stimulates and calls into action the other. The more grandly human, the greater our love, our sympathy. To be esteemed by the estimable is a most excellent standard to which to aspire. To these conventions come our leaders and best lay members. Let us come together to know each other, and to win respect, honor, and love. Let us go prepared to add something of interest—some item, a poem, or a greeting to a distant laborer who has come up to share in the baptism. Our cause is that of humanity, fraternity is our bond of union; enfranchisement from creeds, ostracisms, and imprisonments the incentiv to our labors; to oppose wrong and uphold right is my life dedicated.

Some Inquiries by Mr. King.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I should like to ask Mr. Wakeman a few questions. In his lecture on Biology he asserts that the chemists and Materialists are off the track in attempting to find life in the properties of matter. He says: "Life is a property of protoplasm as a mass, and only after it is formed, and not at all of its chemical or physical components, before they combine and extinguish each other in making this wonderful substance. Much less is there proof that life exists in any other of the sixty-seven or more chemical elements which make up the material world, and which are not even protoplasm at all."

Now, I shall not deny that this organic germ (if there is such a thing—and I don't dispute that either) is the beginning of vital organic life and intelligence. But how does Mr. Wakeman know this? Has he witnessed the hatching of a living organized creature from one of these wonderful germs, like the hatching of a bird from an egg? And how does he know that the sixty-seven elements do not generate living vital organisms under favorable conditions? It does not seem any more wonderful that these elements should generate a living organic structure, than that they should generate this wonderful germ called protoplasm, provided the elements do generate it. If these six elements—namely, nitrogen, carbon, oxygen, hydrogen, phosphorus, and sulphur—unite chemically, in certain proportions, to form this protoplasm, is not that virtually the same as spontaneous generation?

Mr. Wakeman says that "the bridge between the two worlds—the world of inorganic matter, and the world of vital organisms, so exceedingly different—is protoplasm, which is the physical basis of life, and the one peculiar substance of which all living things are formed." But he fails to make it clear how this substance is formed. He condemns the Materialistic view in toto, for he says, "Prof. Tyndall's expression about finding the promis and potency of life in atoms of matter other than protoplasm is entirely misleading. Life is not in matter," he says; "it is the action and reaction of protoplasmic bodies, and in them only is it found." If life is not in matter, it certainly is not out of it, for where there is no matter there is no life. Life itself, of course, is not matter, any more than sound; but wherever life is, there is an organized structure of matter. We might as well say strength is not in the horse or ox, as to say life is not in matter. Some scientists contend that all matter is alive; and no fact is more evident than that where life is manifested there is always a material organization of the elements. To assert that life is not in matter, is worthy of a genuin orthodox Christian, dyed in the wool. If life is not in the organisms of matter, it must be hovering around them, like iron-filings around the point a magnet.

Mr. Wakeman leaves us in the dark with regard to the origin of protoplasm. He seems decidedly to reject the views of Materialists, that all life and intelligence is the effect of the action of chemical forces and combinations of the atoms of matter. Now, do the action and reaction of the atoms of matter form protoplasm, or any other living organisms? Materialism says, Yes.

Now protoplasm is either formed this way, or is not. If not, how, then, is it formed? Is it eternal, coequal with matter, or is it created by an infinit, unbounded power by special acts? These questions are the real point in dispute. Mr. Wakeman says the Materialists are off the track. They will probably return the compliment by telling him that it is he himself who is off; at least, with only one foot on, and the other neither off nor on.

The Materialists are doubtless often mistaken in their views and opinions with regard to the unknowable and unprovable, for they are but men and women, and as such are fallible.

Mr. Wakeman should be a little cautious how he throws out his dogmatic opinions and speculations, with such a confidential air, as if they were demonstrated facts; for he should remember that it is a mighty easy matter to be mistaken. Mr. Wakeman is undoubtedly a deep, logical reasoner, and a splendid debater; and, being a young man, I believe, will improve with age.

I shall ever remember gratefully the able and noble manner in which he maintained his ground against the giant intellect of Col. Ingersoll in that memorable encounter at the Liberal League convention. J. M. KING.

Another of Talmage's Lies Nailed.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In a late remark by Mr. Talmage upon "Impure Literature," after accusing Col. Ingersoll of a desire to break down every barrier to its circulation, he says: "No wonder the mayor of Toronto, when Col. Ingersoll applied to him for the use of a hall, replied 'No, sir; you may hav no God in the United States, but we hav one in Canada, and you cannot stand up here and defame him.'" During the summer of 1880 Mr. Anthony Comstock gave a lecture in this place, in the course of which, after making the usual accusations against Mr. Ingersoll, he told the same story of the colonel and the mayor of Toronto.

Wishing to know the truth of the matter, I wrote to his honor the mayor, asking if there was any truth in the statement. The following is a copy of his reply:

MAYOR'S OFFICE, TORONTO, ONT., Aug. 30, 1880.

Your letter received as to the question about Col. Ingersoll's application for a hall in this city to lecture in, and my reply thereto. As no application was ever made, to my knowledge, I could not hav given any answer. At all events, I never made the answer mentioned in your letter of the 26th of August.

Yours truly, JAMES BEATY, JR.

This, I think, spoils that little story.

THE Sydney (Australia) Bulletin says:

"There can be no doubt that the two most notable visitors to the colonies during the past year are Mr. Proctor and Prof. Denton. What we owe to the one in the matter of astronomical science, we are indebted to the other in respect of geological science. The two men hav, by their capable and lucid treatment of hard facts, given an incentiv to study in the direction indicated that was certainly never previously experienced here, and never expected. The popular style in which Prof. givs in his "Story of the Earth," the revelations of geological research, has had the effect of awakening inquiry as to the natural history of our own continent. In Victoria and in this colony his lectures hav been largely attended, and it is satisfactory to find that from a financial, as well as a scientific point of view, the professor's visit to Australia is not without good results."

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1882.

Col. Ingersoll and the Rev. Mr. Talmage.

Col. Ingersoll is continually besought by ministers throughout the country to engage in a controversy with them upon the subject of the Christian religion. Col. Ingersoll has never refused to enter into a controversy where the person desiring to so engage is of sufficient importance to make him worth answering. Recently Mr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, announced that he would begin a series of sermons directed especially against the doctrin of Freethought taught by Col. Ingersoll. This sermon has been widely circulated. The Times correspondent, yesterday, called upon Col. Ingersoll and asked him if he would reply to Mr. Talmage through the Times. This he consented to do. His reply as made has been carefully revised, and, as written, represents one of the best of the later productions of the colonel. It is one of his most extended efforts since his last appearance in the North American Review, which excited so much attention. As he has practically left the lecture platform for some time, on account of large business interests in other fields, what he has to say will be read with special interest on account of the rarity of his utterances to the public. He was first asked:

Question: Hav you read the sermon of Mr. Talmage, in which he exposes your misrepresentations? Answer: I hav read such reports as appeared in some of the New York papers.

Q. What do you think of what he has to say? A. Some time ago I gave it as my opinion of Mr. Talmage that, while he was a man of most excellent judgment, he was somewhat deficient in imagination. I find that he has the disease that seems to afflict most theologians, and that is a kind of intellectual toadyism that uses the names of supposed great men instead of arguments. It is perfectly astonishing to the average preacher that any one should hav the temerity to differ, on the subject of theology, from Andrew Jackson, Daniel Webster, and other gentlemen eminent for piety during their lives, but who, as a rule, expressed their theological opinions a few minutes before dissolution. These ministers are perfectly delighted to hav some great politician, some judge, soldier, or president certify to the truth of the Bible and to the moral character of Jesus Christ.

Mr. Talmage insists that if a witness is false in one particular, his entire testimony must be thrown away. Daniel Webster was in favor of the fugitiv slave law, and thought it the duty of the North to capture the poor slave mother. He was willing to stand between a human being and his freedom. He was willing to assist in compelling persons to work without any pay except such marks of the lash as they might receive. Yet this man is brought forward as a witness for the truth of the gospel. If he was false in his testimony as to liberty, what is his affidavit worth as to the value of Christianity? Andrew Jackson was a brave man, a good general, a patriot second to none, an excellent judge of horses, and a brave duelist. I admit that in his old age he relied considerably upon the atonement. I think Jackson was really a very great man, and probably no president impressed himself more deeply upon the American people than the hero of New Orleans; but as a theologian he was, in my judgment, a most decided failure, and his opinion as to the authenticity of the scriptures is of no earthly value. It was a subject upon which he knew probably as little as Mr. Talmage does about modern Infidelity. Thousands of people will quote Jackson in favor of religion, about which he knew nothing, and yet hav no confidence in his political opinions, although he devoted the best part of his life to politics.

No man should quote the words of another in place of an argument, unless he is willing to accept all the opinions of that man. Lord Bacon denied the Copernican system of astronomy, and, according to Mr. Talmage, having made that mistake, his opinions upon other subjects are utterly worthless. Mr. Wesley believed in ghosts, witches, and personal devils, yet upon many subjects I hav no doubt his opinions were correct. The truth is that nearly everybody is right about some things, and wrong about most things; and if a man's testimony is not to be taken until he is right on every subject, witnesses will be extremely scarce.

Personally, I care nothing about names. It makes no difference to me what the supposed great men of the past hav said, except as what they hav said contains an argument, and that argument is worth to me the force it naturally has upon my mind. Christians forget that in the realm of reason there are no serfs and no monarchs. When you submit to an argument, you do not submit to the man who made it. Christianity demands a certain obedience, a certain blind, unreasoning faith, and parades before the eyes of the ignorant with great pomp and pride the names of kings, soldiers, and statesmen who hav admitted the truth of the Bible. Mr. Talmage introduces as a witness the Rev. Theodore Parker. This same Theodore Parker denounced the Presbyterian creed as the most infamous of all creeds, and said that the worst heathen god, wearing a necklace of live snakes, was a representation of mercy when compared with the God of John Calvin. Now, if this witness is false in any particular, of course he cannot be believed, according to Mr. Talmage, upon any subject, and yet Mr. Talmage introduces him upon the stand as a good witness.

Although I care but little for names, still I will suggest that, in all probability, Humboldt knew more upon this subject than all the pastors in the world. I certainly would hav as much confidence in the opinion of Goethe as in that of William H. Seward, and as between Seward and Lincoln, I should take Lincoln; and when you come to presidents, for my part, if I were compelled to pin my faith on the sleeve of anybody, I should take Jefferson's coat in preference to Jackson's. I believe that Haeckel is, to say the least, the equal of any theologian we hav in this country, and the late John W. Draper certainly knew as much upon these great questions as the average parson. I believe that Darwin has investigated some of these things, that Tyndall and Huxley hav turned their minds somewhat in the same direction, that Helmholtz has a few opinions, and that, in fact, thousands of able, intelligent, and honest men differ almost entirely from Webster and Jackson.

So far as I am concerned, I think more of reasons than of reputations, more of principles than of persons, more of nature than of names, more of facts than of faiths.

It is the same with books as with persons. Probably there is not a book in the world entirely destitute of truth, and one not entirely exempt from error. The Bible is like other books. There are mistakes in it, side by side with truths—passages inculcating murder and mercy—laws devilish and tyrannical, and others filled with wisdom and justice. It is foolish to say that if you accept a part you must accept the whole. You must accept that which commends itself to your heart and brain. There never was a doctrin that a witness or a book should be thrown entirely away because false in one particular. If in any particular the book or the man tells the truth, to that extent the book should be accepted.

Truth is made no worse by the one who tells it, and a lie gets no real benefit from the reputation of its author.

Q. What do you think of the statement that the general belief in your teachings would fill all the penitentiaries, and that in twenty years there would be a hell in this world worse than the one expected in the other? A. My creed is this:

1. Happiness is the only good.

2. The way to be happy is to make others happy. Other things being equal, that man is happiest who is nearest just—who is truthful, merciful, and intelligent—in other words, the one who livs in accordance with the conditions of life.

3. The time to be happy is now, and the place to be happy is here.

4. Reason is the lamp of the mind—the only torch of progress; and instead of blowing that out and depending upon darkness and dogma it is far better to increase that sacred light.

5. Every man should be the intellectual proprietor of himself—honest with himself, and intellectually hospitable—and upon every brain reason should be enthroned as king.

6. That every man must bear the consequences at least of his own actions; that if he puts his hands in the fire, his hands must smart, and not the hands of another. In other words, that each man must eat the fruit of the tree he plants.

I cannot conceive that the teaching of these doctrins would fill penitentiaries or crowd the gallows. The doctrin of forgivness—the idea that somebody else can suffer in place of the guilty—the notion that just at the last the whole account can be settled—these ideas, doctrins, and notions are calculated to fill penitentiaries. Nothing breeds extravagance like the credit system.

Most criminals of the present day are orthodox believers, and the gallows seems to be the last round of the ladder reaching from earth to heaven. The Rev. Dr. Sunderland, of this city, in his sermon on the assassination of Garfield, takes the ground that God permitted the murder for the purpose of opening the eyes of the people to the evil effects of Infidelity. According to this minister, God, in order to show his hatred of Infidelity, "inspired," or allowed, one Christian to assassinate another.

Religion and morality do not necessarily go together. Mr. Talmage will insist to-day that morality is not sufficient to save any man from eternal punishment. As a matter of fact, religion has often been the enemy of morality. The moralist has been denounced by the theologians. He sustains the same relation to Christianity that the moderate drinker does to the total-abstinence society. The total-abstinence people say that the example of the moderate drinker is far worse upon the young than that of the drunkard—that the drunkard is a warning, while the moderate drinker is a perpetual temptation. So Christians say of moralists. According to them, the moralist sets a worse example than the criminal. The moralist not only insists that a man can be a good citizen, a kind husband, an affectionate father, without religion, but demonstrates the truth of his doctrin by his own life; whereas the criminal admits that in and of himself he is nothing and can do nothing, but that he needs assistance from the church and its ministers.

The worst of criminals of the modern world hav been Christians—I mean by that, believers in Christianity—and the most monstrous crimes of the modern world hav been committed by the most zealous believers. There is nothing in orthodox religion, apart from the morality it teaches, to prevent the commission of crime. On the other hand, the perpetual proffer of forgivness is a direct premium upon what Christians are pleased to call the commission of sin.

Christianity has produced no greater character than Epicteus, no greater sovereign than Marcus Aurelius. The wickedness of the past was a good deal like that of the present. As a rule, kings hav been wicked in direct proportion to their power—their power having been lessened, their crimes hav decreased. As a matter of fact, paganism of itself did not produce any great men, neither has Christianity. Millions of influences determin individual character, and the religion of the country in which a man happens to be born may determin many of his opinions, without influencing, to any great extent, his real character.

There hav been brave, honest, and intelligent men in and out of every church.

Q. Mr. Talmage says that you insist that, according to the Bible, the universe was made out of nothing, and he denounces your statement as a gross misrepresentation. What hav you stated upon that subject? A. What I said was substantially this: "We are told in the first chapter of Genesis that in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. If this means anything, it means that God produced—caused to exist, called into being—the heaven and the earth. It will not do to say that God formed the heaven and the earth of previously existing matter. Moses conveys, and intended to convey, the idea that the matter of which the heaven and the earth are composed was created."

This has always been my position. I did not suppose that nothing was used as the raw material; but if the Mosaic account means anything, it means that whereas there was nothing, God caused something to exist—created what we know as matter. I cannot conceive of something being made, created, without anything to make anything with. I hav no more confidence in fiat worlds than I hav in fiat money. Mr. Talmage tells us that God did not make the universe out of nothing, but out of "omnipotence." Exactly how God changed "omnipotence" into matter is not stated. If there was nothing in the universe, omnipotence could do you no good. The weakest man in the world can lift as much nothing as God.

Mr. Talmage seems to think that to create something from nothing is simply a question of strength, that it requires infinit muscle, that it is only a question of biceps. Of course, omnipotence is an attribute, not an entity, not a raw material; and the idea that something can be made out of omnipotence—using that as the raw material—is infinitly absurd. It would hav been equally logical to say that God made the universe out of his omniscience, or his omnipresence, or his unchangeableness, or out of his honesty, his holiness, or his incapacity to do evil. I confess my utter inability to understand, or even to suspect, what the reverend gentleman means when he says that God created the universe out of his "omnipotence."

I admit that the Bible does not tell when God created the universe. It simply said that he did this "in the beginning." We are left, however, to infer that "the beginning" was Monday morning, and that on the first Monday God created the matter in an exceedingly chaotic state; that on Tuesday he made a firmament to divide the waters from the waters; that on Wednesday he gathered the waters together in seas and allowed the dry land to appear. We are also told that on that day "the earth brought forth grass and herb-yielding seed after his kind, and the tree-yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind." This was before the creation of the sun, but Mr. Talmage takes the ground that there are many other sources of light; that there may hav been volcanoes in activ operation on other planets. I hav my doubts, however, about the light of volcanoes being sufficient to produce or sustain vegetable life, and think it a little doubtful about trees growing only by volcanic glare. Neither do I think one could depend upon "three thousand miles of liquid granit" for the production of grass and trees, nor upon light that rocks might emit in the process of crystallization. I doubt whether trees would succeed simply with the assistance of the "aurora borealis or the aurora Australis." There are other sources of light, not mentioned by Mr. Talmage—lightning-bugs, phosphorescent beetles, and fox-fire. I should think that it would be humiliating, in this age, for an orthodox preacher to insist that vegetation could exist upon this planet without the light of the sun; that trees could grow, blossom, and bear fruit, having no light but the flame of volcanoes, or that emitted by liquid granit or thrown off by the crystallization of rocks.

There is another thing, also, that should not be forgotten, and that is, that there is an even balance forever kept between the totals of animal and vegetable life; that certain forms of animal life go with certain forms of vegetable life. Mr. Haeckel has shown that "in the first epoch, algæ and skulless vertebrates were found together; in the second, ferns and fishes; in the third, pines and reptils; in the fourth, foliaceous forests and mammals." Vegetable and animal life sustain a necessary relation; they exist together; they act and interact, and each depends upon the other. The real point of difference between Mr. Talmage and myself is this: He says that God made the universe out of his "omnipotence," and I say that, although I know nothing whatever upon the subject, my opinion is that the universe has existed from eternity; that it continually changes in form, but that it never was created nor called into being by any power. I think that all that is is all the God there is.

Q. Mr. Talmage charges you with having misrepresented the Bible story of the deluge. Has he correctly stated your position? A. Mr. Talmage takes the ground that the flood was only partial, and was, after all, not much of a flood. The Bible tells us that God said he would "destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life from under heaven, and that everything that is in the earth shall die;" that God also said, "I will destroy man whom I hav created from the face of the earth, both man and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air, and every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth."

I did not suppose that there was any miracle in the Bible larger than the credulity of Mr. Talmage. The flood story, however, seems to be a little more than he can bear. He is like the witness who stated that he had read "Gulliver's Travels," the stories of Munchausen, and the "Flying Wife," including "Robinson Crusoe," and believed them all; but that Wirt's "Life of Patrick Henry" was a little more than he could stand.

It is strange that a man who believes that God created the universe out of omnipotence should believe that he had not enough omnipotence left to drown a world the size of this. Mr. Talmage seeks to make the story of the flood reasonable. The moment it is reasonable it ceases to be miraculous. Certainly God cannot afford to reward with eternal joy a man for believing a reasonable story. Faith is only necessary when the story is unreasonable, and if the flood only gets small enough I can believe it myself. I ask for evidence, and Mr. Talmage seeks to make the story so little that it can be believed without evidence. He tells us that it was a kind of "local option" flood—a litle wet for that part of the country.

Why was it necessary to save the birds? They certainly could have gotten out of the way of a real small flood. Of the birds, Noah took fourteen of of each species. He was commanded to take of the fowls of the air by sevens—seven of each sex—and, as there are at least 12,500 species, Noah collected an average of about 175,000 birds, provided the flood was general. If it was local, there are no means of determining the number. But why, if the flood was local, should he hav taken any of the fowls of the air into his ark? All they had to do was to fly away, or "roost high;" and it would hav been just as easy for God to hav implanted in them, for the moment, the instinct of getting out of the way as the instinct of hunting the ark. It would hav been quite a saving of room and provisions, and would hav materially lessened the labor and anxiety of Noah and his sons.

Besides, if it had been a partial flood, and high enough to cover the highest mountains in that country, the highest mountain being about seventeen thousand feet, the flood would hav been covered with a sheet of ice several thousand feet in thickness. If a column of water could be thrown seventeen thousand feet high and kept stationary, several thousand feet of the upper end would freeze. If, however, the deluge was general, then the atmosphere would be forced out the same on all sides, and the climate remain substantially normal.

Nothing could be more absurd than to attempt to explain the flood by calling it partial.

Mr. Talmage also says that the window ran clear round the ark, and that if I had only known as much Hebrew as a man can put on his little finger I would hav known that the window went clear round. To this I reply that, if his position is correct, then the original translators of King James's edition did not know as much Hebrew as they could hav put on their little fingers; and yet I am obliged to believe their translation or be eternally damned. If the window went clear round, the inspired writer should hav said so, and the learned translators should hav given us the truth. No one pretends that there was more than one door, and yet the same language is used about the door, except this—that the exact size of the window is given, and the only peculiarity mentioned as to the door is that it shut from the outside. For any one to see that Mr. Talmage is wrong on the window question, it is only necessary to read the story of the deluge.

Mr Talmage also endeavors to decrease the depth of the flood. If the flood did not cover the highest hills, many people might hav been saved. He also insists that all the water did not come from the rains, but that "the fountains of the great deep were broken up." What are "the fountains of the great deep?" How would their being "broken up" increase the depth of the water? He seems to imagin that these "fountains" were in some way imprisoned—anxious to get to the surface, and that at that time an opportunity was given for water to run uphill, or in some mysterious way to rise above its level. According to the account the ark was at the mercy of the waves for at least seven months. If this flood was only partial it seems a little curious that the water did not seek its level in less than seven months. With anything like a fair chance by that time most of it should hav found its way to the sea again.

There is in the literature of ignorance no more perfectly absurd and cruel story than the account of the deluge.

I am very sorry that Mr. Talmage should disagree with some of the great commentators. Dr. Scott tells us that, in all probability, the angels assisted in getting the animals into the ark. Dr. Henry insists that the waters in the bowels of the earth, at God's command, sprung up and flooded the earth. Dr. Clark tells us that it would hav been much easier for God to hav destroyed all the people and made some new ones, but that he did not want to waste anything. Dr. Henry also tells us that the lions while in the ark ate straw like oxen. Nothing could be more amusing than to see a few lions dining heartily off of straw. This commentator assures us that the waters rose so high that the loftiest mountains were overflowed fifteen cubits, so that salvation was not hoped for from any hills or mountains. He tells us that some of the people got on top of the ark, and hoped to shift for themselvs, but that in all probability they were washed off by the rain. When we consider that the rain must hav fallen at the rate of about eight hundred feet a day, I am inclined to think that they were washed off.

Mr. Talmage has clearly misrepresented the Bible. He is not prepared to believe the story as it is told. The seeds of Infidelity seem to be germinating in his mind. His position no doubt will be a great relief to most of his hearers. After this, their credulity will not be strained. They can say that there was probably quite a stormsome rain, to an extent that rendered it necessary for Noah and his family—his dogs, cats, and chickens—to get in a boat. This would not be unreasonable. The same thing happens almost every year on the shores of great rivers, and consequently the story of the flood is an exceedingly reasonable one.

Mr. Talmage also endeavors to account for the miraculous collection of the animals in the ark from the universal instinct to get out of the rain. There are at least two objections to this: 1. The animals went into the ark before the rain commenced; 2. I hav never noticed any great desire on the part of ducks, geese, and loons to get out of the water. Mr. Talmage must hav been misled by a line from an old nursery book that says, "And the little fishes got under the bridge to keep out of the rain." He tells us that Noah described what he saw. He is the first theologian who claims that Genesis was written by Noah, or that Noah wrote any account of the flood. Most Christians insist that the account of the flood was written by Moses, aud that he was inspired to write it. Of course, it will not do for me to say that Mr. Talmage has misrepresented the facts.

Q. You are also charged with misrepresentation in your statement as to where the ark at last rested. It is claimed by Mr. Talmage that there is nothing in the Bible to show that the ark rested on the highest mountains. A. Of course I hav no knowledge as to where the ark really came to anchor, but after it struck bottom we are told that a dove was sent out, and that the dove found no place whereon to rest her foot. If the ark touched ground in the low country, surely the mountains were out of water, and an ordinary mountain furnishes, as a rule, space enough for a dove's foot. We must infer that the ark rested on the only land then above water, or near enough above water to strike the keel of Noah's boat. Mount Ararat is about seventeen thousand feet high; and so I take it that the top of that mountain was where Noah ran aground—otherwise, the account means nothing.

Here Mr. Talmage again shows his tendency to belittle the miracles of the Bible. I am astonished that he should doubt the power of God to keep the ark on a mountain seventeen thousand feet high. He could hav changed the climate for that occasion. He could hav made all the rocks and glaciers produce wheat and corn in abundance. Certainly God, who could overwhelm a world with a flood, had the power to change every law and fact in nature.

I am surprised that Mr. Talmage is not willing to believe the story as it is told. What right has he to question the statements of an inspired writer? Why should he set up his judgment against the Websters and Jacksons? Is it not infinitly impudent in him to contrast his penny dip with the sun of inspiration? What right has he to any opinion upon the subject? He must take the Bible as it reads. He should remember that the greater the miracle the greater should be his faith.

Q. You do not seem to hav any great opinion of the chemical, geological, and agricultural views expressed by Mr. Talmage? A. You must remember that Mr. Talmage has a certain thing to defend. He takes the Bible as actually true, and with the Bible as his standard, he compares and measures all sciences. He does not study geology to find whether the Mosaic account is true, but he reads the Mosaic account for the purpose of showing that geology cannot be depended upon. His idea that one day was a thousand with God, and that therefore the "days" mentioned in the Mosaic account are not days of twenty-four hours, but long periods, is contradicted by the Bible itself. The great reason given for keeping the Sabbath day is that "God rested on the seventh day and was refreshed." Now, it does not say that he rested on the "seventh period," or the "seventh good while," or the "seventh long time," but on the "seventh day." In imitation of this example we are also to rest, not on the seventh good while, but on the seventh day. Nothing delights the average minister more than to find that a passage of scripture is capable of several interpretations. Nothing in the inspired book is so dangerous as accuracy. If the holy writer uses general terms an ingenious theologian can harmonize a seemingly preposterous statement with the most obdurate fact. An "inspired" book should contain neither statistics nor dates, as few names as possible, and not one word about geology or astronomy. Mr. Talmage is doing the best he can to uphold the tables of the Jews. They are the foundation of his faith. He believes in the water of the past and the fire of the future—in the God of flood and flame—the eternal torturer of his helpless children.

TALMAGE, as our readers know, has devoted his last few Sundays to "answering" Col. Ingersoll. A correspondent of the Chicago Times had an interview with Col. Ingersoll last week, during which the Colonel paid his respects to the Brooklyn preacher. He uses him up completely. A factitious importance is given Talmage from the fact that his sermons are widely reported (perhaps as curiosities of Christian literature), and we surrender our editorial pages to Mr. Ingersoll, knowing our readers will keenly appreciate his reply.

Book Notice.

THE BRAIN AND THE BIBLE; or, the Conflict between Mental Science and Theology. By Edgar C. Beall. With a preface by R. G. Ingersoll. (See advertisment on last page.)

If Col. Ingersoll's name were not signed at the end of the preface we should think he had written the whole work. The author has adopted Feuerbach's sentiment, that "the purpose of my writing is to make men anthropologians instead of theologians; man-lovers instead of god-lovers; students of this world instead of candidates for the next; self-reliant citizens of the earth instead of subservient and wily ministers of a celestial and terrestrial monarchy" and throughout the book the author's love of humanity is conspicuous. The object is to render the principles of virtue more secure and to purify and intensify the religious nature of man by directing it to its legitimate objects of flesh and blood. After the preface by Col. Ingersoll the bock contains the Author's Preface and Introduction and chapters upon "The Pilot of the Passions," "The Fall of Man," "Change of Heart," "The Plan of Salvation," "Is Nature Self-existent?" "The Design Argument," "Joseph Cook's Scientific Theism," "The Correlation Argument," "The Logic of Jesuitism," "Popular Objections to Infidelity," "Our Substitute for Christianity."

Mr. Beall is a practical phrenologist, and his book is "Phrenology vs. Orthodoxy." He has few peers, says the Cincinnati Commercial, in the science, and he is indorsed by the highest phrenological authorities. The book is as interesting as Ingersoll's "Gods," which is the highest encomium we can pass upon it. It should be read by every Freethinker and student.

IF in the conflagration which burned his office last Tuesday morning, and from which he himself so narrowly escaped, Irenæus Prime sees a dispensation of providence, we shall not quarrel with him. In reviewing his past misdeeds, if he fail to find one which would seem to justify this visitation by fire so near the birthday of Thomas Paine, we would refer him to the editorial pages of the Observer for the months of September, October, and November, 1877.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 70.

795. The sacrament of the Eucharist, or the Lord's Supper, was not first practiced by Christians. The pagans had it long before them.

796. Anointing with holy oil is not a Christian ceremony. It was assuredly borrowed from the pagans.

797. A belief in a day of judgment was not first entertained by Christians. The Persians, the Egyptians, and even the Grecians, taught it at a much earlier date.

798. A belief in the resurrection of the dead is not Christian in its origin. All pagan nations believed in it.

799. Religious fasting was by no means first practised by Christians. It was common in all pagan religions.

800. The power to forgive sin was not first promulgated by Christians. Pagans were hundreds of years before them in this.

801. A belief in bibles and sacred writings by no means first existed with Christians, nor even with Jews. The Hindoos much earlier had their sacred scriptures, and so had the Persians, the Egyptians, and other pagan nations.

802. Prayer to the gods and celestial dignitaries did not originate with Christianity. Every nation in paganism exercised it and enjoined it.

803. The doctrine of a second birth did not originate with Christianity. Some of the pagan nations believed in it.

804. Repentance and humility were not first taught by Jesus. Zoroaster, Chrishna, Buddha, Confucius, and others taught it long before him.

805. Love to God and love to human beings was very far from being first taught by Jesus. Every ancient sage and philosopher strongly inculcated it.

806. The Golden Rule was not first taught by Jesus. The same sentiments were earlier inculcated by Buddha, Pythagoras, Confucius, Thales, Bias, Socrates, Pittacus, Plato, Hillel, and others.

807. Monasteries and monks did not originate in Christianity.

808. Christianity was not the first religion to have priests and holy men to commune with the gods. Every ancient pagan religion had its priests.

809. The surplice, the cope, the dalmatica, and all else of the toggery of priests did not originate in Christianity, but were all borrowed from the pagans.

810. I don't believe that the God of Judaism and Christianity had much invention, if he could not devise some new rites, sacraments, ceremonies, and dogmas, but he was compelled to make up his new system wholly from the worn-out and dilapidated shreds and patches of the older pagan systems which had been in existence for many centuries.

811. I do not believe, however, that Christianity found any model in the pre-existing systems of religion for the bitter and deadly persecutions which she has mercilessly dealt out to those within her power who presumed to entertain views and opinions not in keeping with her own demands and unlike the standard which she has elevated for all to approach and yield submission to. In persecution she has been original. She has in none of the religions which preceded her found any warrant or example for the lives she has taken and the blood she has spilt. In this she transcends all other systems.

812. I cannot see, despite all that is claimed for them, that the teachings of Jesus excel in sound morals and love for humanity the teachings of many of the old sages and reformers who lived long before him. They do not appear more excellent than the inculcations of many of the old philosophers and teachers. Menu, a thousand years before him, said: "Endure injuries and despise no one. Commit no hostile act even for your own preservation." Christna taught: "He who can bear up against the violence produced by lust and anger in this life is properly employed and a happy man." Buddha said: "Let a man overcome anger with love; let him overcome evil by good; let him overcome the greedy by liberality; the liar by the truth. Not to commit any sin, to do good and purify one's mind, that is the teaching of the awakened." Confucius: "Do unto another what you would have him do unto you, and do not to another what you would not have him do unto you. Desire not the death of thine enemy. Hold faithfulness and sincerity as first principles. When you have faults do not fear to abandon them. To subdue one's self and return to virtue, to propriety, is perfect virtue." Thales said: "Avoid doing what you would blame others for doing. Cultivate friendship for an enemy. Be kind to your friends that they may continue so, and to thine enemies that they may become so. Prevent injuries if possible; if not, do not revenge them. Be to everybody kind and friendly. Speak evil of no one, not even thine enemies." Pythagoras taught: "Every man ought to speak and act with such integrity that no one would have reason to doubt his simple affirmation. It is impossible he can be free who is a slave to his passions. To revenge yourself upon your enemy make him your friend." Bias thus instructed: "It is a proof of a weak and disordered mind to desire impossibilities. The greatest felicity is to be able to endure misfortunes patiently. Great minds alone can support a sudden reverse of fortune. The most pleasant state is to be always gaining. Be not unmindful of the miseries of others. If you are handsome do handsome things; if deformed, supply the defects of nature by your virtues. Be slow in undertaking, but resolute in executing. Praise not a worthless man for the sake of his wealth. Do all the good you can, and whatever good you do, ascribe the glory to the gods. Lay in wisdom as the store of your journey from youth to old age, for it is the most certain possession." Pittacus said: "Do not to your neighbor that which you would take ill from him." Socrates enjoined: "Return not an injury if you have received one. Return not evil for evil." Plato inculcated: "The unrighteous man, or the sayer and doer of unholy things, had far better not yield to the illusion that his roguery is cleverness. For men glory in their shame; they fancy they hear others say of them, 'These are not mere good-for-nothing persons, burdens on the earth, but such as men should be who mean to dwell safely in a state.' There are two patterns set before them in nature, the one blessed and divine, the other godless and wretched. Honor is a divine good, and no evil thing is honorable. The perfectly just man is he who loves justice for its own sake, not for the honors and advantages that attend, and is willing to pass for unjust while he practices the most exact justice, and will not suffer himself to be moved by disgrace or distress, but will continue steadfast in the love of justice, not because it is pleasant, but because it is right." Sextus enjoined: "What you wish your neighbors to be to you, such be ye also to them. Endure all things if ye would serve the gods." Aristotle wrote: "We should conduct ourselves toward others as we would have them act toward us." Aristippus said: "Cherish that reciprocal benevolence which will make you as anxious for another's welfare as for your own." Isocrates taught: "Act toward others as you would have them act toward you." Publius Syrus thus inculcated: "Pardon the offenses of others, but never your own. You can accomplish by kindness what you can not by force. Better overlook an injury than avenge it. It is a kingly spirit to return good deeds for evil ones. Receive an injury rather than do one." The Essenes in their religious instructions taught: "Lay up nothing on earth, but fix your mind solely on heaven. Forsake father, mother, brothers and sisters, houses and lands." Hillel said: "Do not to others what you would not like others to do to you." Philo wrote: "It is our first duty to seek the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness." Cicero taught these most excellent truths: "We are created for the sake of mankind and to be useful to each other. Nature endears man to man. Nothing is more natural to man than kindness. Knowledge seems isolated and barren unless accompanied by love of all men and trust in our common brotherhood. All men are plainly bound together. Duty is always performed when the advantage of mankind is sought. He is a good man who benefits as many people as possible and harms nobody. True philosophers have not neglected the advantage and interests of mankind. Care for other men and serve the common brotherhood. Nothing is so much in accord with nature as utility. The standard of utility is the same as that of morality. Whatever is really useful is virtuous, though it does not at first seem so." Seneca taught these excellent moral precepts: "The grandest of empires is to rule one's self. There is nothing grand that is not also calm. Who has most? He who desires least. Throw away all anxiety about life and make it pleasant. If you hear that others have spoken ill of you, consider whether you have not done the same, and of many people. How much better to heal an injury than to avenge it! I shall take the world as my country. Guard rigorously that social tie which binds man to man and establishes the rights common to the human race. Life is warfare, and those who climb up and down steep paths and go through dangerous enterprises are the brave men and leaders in the camp; but to rest basely at the cost of others' labors is to be a coward, safe because despised." Antoninus said: "Be to every one kind and friendly." Marcus Aurelius thus taught: "Be cheerful and not seeking external help, the tranquillity which others give. A man must stand erect and not be kept erect by others. Never value anything as profitable to thyself which shall compel thee to break thy promise, to lose thy self-respect, to curse, to act the hypocrite, to devise anything which needs walls and curtains. If thou holdest to this, expecting nothing, fearing nothing, but satisfied with thy present activity according to nature, with heroic truth in every word and sound which thou utterest, thou wilt live happy, and there is no man able to prevent this." Much more equally as good of the the teachings of the ancient sages might be cited, but this is deemed sufficient.

813. I do not believe the teachings of Jesus which his followers admire so greatly will compare with the foregoing in sound and practical wisdom and common sense. I will give a few specimens which certainly are not equal to the inculcations of the pagan philosophers.

814. Here is one specimen of Jesus's teaching: "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee;" that is to say, if your eye becomes inflamed from any cause, or pains you, gouge it out and throw it away. There is certainly no good sense in such commands. It would be far better to remove the cause of the difficulty, and save the eye.

815. Jesus further said: "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee." That is equivalent to saying, If a boil comes upon your hand, or it becomes lame, cut it off and throw it on the dung-pile—most foolish advice to give, and a most foolish injunction to simple followers! It would be infinitely better to care for the boil or the lameness of so important a member and save it for future usefulness. There is nothing in the teachings of the pagan sages a thousandth part as foolish as such talk about cutting off the right hand for any little ailment that might befall it.

816. Again, Jesus said: "Whoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also. Whoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. If any man sue thee at the law and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also." I count this senseless advice, and far inferior to that given by the pagan teachers. Because a man has been wrongfully smitten is a very foolish reason for his offering another part to also be unjustly smitten. None but a fool would act in that way, and Christians, though many of them might be denominated fools, very rarely keep this commandment of their savior. If a man is unjustly compelled to go a mile it is a very silly remedy for it to repeat the injustice by performing another mile. If also a coat has unjustly been taken from a man there is not the slightest sort of reason in his yielding up his cloak to the same unjust man. It is simply paying a premium for unjust deeds and courting their repetition. If there is any sense in a man's parting with his coat because he has lost his cloak, the same reasoning would cause him to give up his pants, and even his shirt, hat, and boots, and assume the condition Adam and Eve were in when turned from the hand of their maker, and before they ate any apples. If this kind of shedding clothes by command were advisable in warm weather, the advice would be most impracticable when the mercury stands 20 degrees below zero. I am sure that not one of the old pagans ever taught such absurdity.

817. Jesus again said: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, etc." Possibly pious Christians may think this sound and sensible teaching, but I do not. It has no sense in it, because it is impossible to follow it. A man cannot possibly love one whom he knows is his deadly enemy, and who is doing all he can to injure him and wrong him. He may treat him civilly in return for his bad conduct, he may even return good deeds for evil ones, but it is impossible for a man to really love his enemy if he knows he is an enemy. He might just as easily love the fire for burning his flesh, or a club that had caused him great pain. It is not in human nature to love that which does us the most deadly injury. It is simply idle to command a man to love his enemy.

818. Again, Jesus enjoined: "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." This, with man's proneness to faults and mistakes, with his fallible human nature, is just as impossible for him to perform as though the command had been, Be as wise as God; be as powerful as the eternal; be as infinite as the Omnipresent; leave the gross earth and rise in the ether miles above the earth's surface. Such commands would be as absurd as impossible. A finite mortal cannot be expected to equal infinity in anything, and it is not wise to require it. No wise ruler will require of his subjects what is impossible for them to perform.

The Next New York Freethinkers' Convention.

As the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will remember, the late Freethinkers' Convention, held at Hornellsville, N. Y., adjourned to meet next year at Watkins Glen; and in accordance therewith it will be held there for five days, commencing Aug. 16th, and the association will probably, as heretofore, invite the Freethinkers of the United States and Canada to meet with them, and thus make it really a National Convention.

And thus early I desire to call the attention of the Freethinkers of the nation and of Canada to the fact that it is very desirable that the coming convention be one of the largest and most important ever held.

Watkins Glen is one of the most pleasant and attractiv summer resorts in this country. Its natural and picturesque scenery is nowhere surpassed. Thousands flock there every year from all parts of the world to witness it, and it will well repay, of itself, a long journey to view it. The hotels and boarding-houses of Watkins are numerous, large, and well kept, and the proprietors will very greatly reduce their rates for all who attend the convention. And I am assured by some of the general passenger agents of the various railroads that lead to Watkins, that if the friends of the convention will make an effort to make the coming convention one of large proportions they will giv us very much lower rates than they hav ever given us before.

So thus early I desire to call upon all the friends of Freethought everywhere to commence making preparations to make the Second Watkins Convention one that shall command the attention of the world.

I was pleased to learn on my late tour through Michigan that many of our leading Freethinkers of that state are making their calculations to attend at Watkins.

As before stated, it is a most pleasant summer resort, and the Freethinkers of wealth in the country, who desire to hav a vacation from business of a week or two during the summer months, should make arrangements to take their vacation at Watkins, and during the time "take in" the great convention.

And now that the "pipe of peace was smoked" at Chicago last fall, and all our contentions were there amicably settled, let every branch of the great Liberal party be represented at Watkins. I hope to see at the convention every Liberal editor in the United States and Canada, and nearly every Liberal speaker. Let the Materialist, the Spiritualist, the Free Religionist, the Liberal Christian, the Shaker, and all others who believe in Freethought, and are willing to be known as Freethinkers, in the broadest and most liberal sense of that word, be there represented. Come one! come all! H. L. GREEN,

THE COSMOS AS GOD, OR COSMISM.

The first thought of man was to find his solution and guide of his life in the world or cosmos around him. Thus began a series of interpretations of nature, which have extended step by step sidewise and scientifically from Fetichism to Materialism, Cosmism, and Pantheism; while at the same time, according to the law of the three states, the progress of religious steps has been upward from Fetichism to Polytheism and Monotheism. But while under this law the growth of God-conceptions has been emotionally and dynamically upward and tree-like, the body of the tree has been enlarged intellectually and statically ring by ring on the sides—i. e., from Science to Science—until in that direction the original solution of nature by the will has ended in every Science in a solution by law. While, therefore, Theology has grown upward from Fetichism to Monotheism, Science has grown outward from the same Fetichism to Materialism and Cosmism. Thus:

This brings us to the fourth Subjective Harmony.

IV.—THAT NO CONCEPTION OF NATURE OR OF THE COSMOS CAN BE TO CIVILIZED MAN HIS COMPLETED GOD, i. e., HIS SOLUTION, GUIDE, AND UNITY OF LIFE.

We say to civilized Man: In the early history of the race the case was far different. Fetichism was the only religion possible then; for as man solved the world by knowable wills supposed to haunt or dwell within objects, he could guide himself by their supposed wishes. This savage part of the story is well told by an incident in that most delightful book of travels, Darwin's "Voyage of the Beagle" (p. 68). Out on the pampas on the Rio Negro, in South America, stands a large and wonderful tree, grand, sublime, and desolate in its loneliness. To the Indians it is at once a landmark and a Fetich God. They have strewn and almost covered it with their valuable and hard-earned offerings; for to them it is the source of all of their health, safety, and fortune.

To Darwin it was interesting for its history as a landmark, and as a tree botanically, and because it was socially an object of worship to the natives. But for him there was no conscious or wilful Godship present, as there was to his Indian guides. Where they saw supernatural powers, he saw only natural objects and their material, vegetable, and social results.

The state of mind of our race when all Theology was in this savage Fetich condition is well illustrated in many parts of the same work of Darwin (see pp. 212 to 216). Now what science did for this wonderful tree to Darwin, it has done for the whole Cosmos to the more intelligent part of our race. It has exorcised and banished the Gods from it. Instead of explaining the Cosmos by wills, inherent in or about it or its parts, it has placed the explanation of law under every part and the whole of it. Scientific Materialism or Cosmism consists in the running of laws through the knowable world as the warp of which all phenomena are the woof.

Now what is the effect of this side-growth of Fetichism into Science—this passing of wills into laws throughout the external world? Plainly its effect is to destroy the religious value of the Cosmos. There can be little unity caused by the conception of law, except to the intellect, which may be exercised in common to understand it. The social emotions are not moved to any concurrence by the "machine of the universe" or Cosmos.

Materialism and Cosmism, or "Cosmic Theism," may therefore be important parts of the Philosophy of the world, but it cannot be the religion of intelligent people, because they cannot return to Fetichism or Atrolatry or Sun-worship. There can be no social union or religion to propitiate or placate those gods which Science has replaced by laws as to which all such sacrifice, union, and labor would be as idle and ridiculous as for Darwin to join the Indians in the worship of their tree-spirit.

These remarks are worthy of consideration by those Liberals who seem to be willing to accept the name "Materialism," or "Cosmism," or "Cosmic Theism" as some kind of a "religious" designation. A little meditation will show them that all of these names are applicable to an explanation of the material world only, and can therefore in the first place only be parts of the Positive Philosophy, and in the next place they can have, for reasons above intimated, little or no religious value except to Fetichists. The last phrase, "Cosmic Theism," is an amusing contradiction unless an intellectual return to Fetichism is meant by it, commonly called Pantheism. Modern German speculation often favors the use of this word.

But this Pantheistic hypothesis cannot answer effectively for religious purposes the questions: Is it true? Is it good?

It assumes that the whole Cosmos or knowable world, is or acts as a whole and as a will or god, and that there is a mind infused through the whole mass of things, which is the cause of their motion and forms. As Virgil says, "Mens agitat molem"—it is mind which moves the mass. Now it is enough to say of this belief that it has not the slightest proof. Objectively it is not provable. It is merely an intellectual phase of Fetichism which assumes inherent mind instead of will as the mover of things or of the Cosmos as a whole.

Nor is this Pantheistic belief good—that is, subjectively it is not of much religious value. It is too intellectual to be valuable as Fetichism, and too emotional, and general and confused to be good law or science; and so it ever remains, a sterile hybrid between a Religion and a Philosophy. It has never been the basis of a sect, much less of a polity, or of the life of a people.

But in the aspect of Art the Pantheistic view of the world has been, and doubtless will be, of the greatest value. "Pantheism is the Atheism of Poets," says Littré; and Comte has grandly shown, in his introduction to his "Synthése Subjectif," that we are all children, and therefore Fetichists, at the bottom of our hearts. We can no longer to the intellect explain the world by Wills, but we use it and them by constant fiction as the creation and symbols of our emotions which we embody and express by and reflect from the face of Nature. Thus in modern times schools of Nature-Poetry, Romanticism, and especially of Landscape Painting, have arisen, the inspiration of which is but a reflected Fetichism of the heart. We replace in Nature for emotional and artistic purposes, from our hearts, the wills which Science has exorcised. This, as Comte shows, is legitimate if peo- have sense enough not to get their poetry and philosophy mixed, which is, however, as yet very generally not the case. But the modern Art which, in this way, has come to make Nature the reflection of the human soul, is the highest, truest, and purest teacher of Humanity. Nature is infused and made a vocal symbol, and so echoes back, even to the most stupid, the human feelings and sympathies which make us all one. Such touches of Nature make us all akin; and more, they make us kind. Art revives and expresses under this inspiration the beautifulest, gentlest, and most religious sentiments of the human soul and make them a common gift and inheritance to all whose hearts are open to feel and receive.

This suggestion may explain and increase the charm that rises from the pages of Shakspere, Goethe, Byron, Shelley, Wordsworth, Coleridge, or Keats. It will enable us to see in the galleries of modern paintings not simply representations of things more or less accurately drawn, but symbols of that human spirit world of thought, feeling, and sympathy, which endures from heart to heart and from age to age when the fleeting symbols themselves have perished. Would one know how much this suggestion may mean, we would advise him or her to study Goethe's Faust (both parts), from year to year, under the light of Positive Philosophy and Religion, for that Faust is, when we grasp it, the last and our truest Bible.

Our next topic must be to consider the religious value of The Infinite.

Views of an Episcopal Clergyman on the Guiteau Case.

I hav followed minutely, step by step, the unfolding of the evidence in this case, and found enough material to form a most unqualified judgment of the merits of the question of responsibility of the assassin. But apart from the direct responsibility of the assassin himself, I hav been forced to discover a responsibility also resting on not mere individuals, but even on communities of people, and those professedly Christian people, without whose influence the assassin as such would not hav existed. Guiteau is naturally a fanatic, and only required fostering by some particular organization of other fanatics to develop his own fanaticism into what has come to pass in him. The charge of malice does not destroy this view, but, if true, only enhances the certainty of the wretch's final development. I must admit, however, that not much can be laid to the charge of the Oneida Community, for Guiteau had been made before he had got to them; and indeed he neither suited them nor they him. He suited Moody and Sankey better, and if his mind had been better balanced he might hav completed a wonderful trinity. There is one faculty wanting in Guiteau—a faculty which John Calvin possessed in an eminent degree—the faculty of enduring cunning and self-preservation. In this he has at every stage of his life shown himself to be sadly wanting. Had Guiteau been a Roman Catholic he would not hav committed the deed; and it is very likely that, had he been an Episcopalian, he would not hav done it, for a deference to priestly counsel would hav been an impenetrable bar to his lapse toward the actual crime. Guiteau was trained in the same school as that which produced the witch-burners and Quaker-killers of New England, and for that school he would do anything in his power. I hav not the least doubt that he was aiming at becoming president in the end, and that most of his wild statements in court are genuinly his heart's thought. It may be said that the idea of his committing the murder through religious fanaticism is irrelevant, inasmuch as it was more connected with politics than religion; but we must remember that it was religion first, then anything else—politics if it came in the way—and that with a Puritan like Guiteau politics and religion are inseparable. I will tell you what I think: Guiteau might make a pretty good president of the United States in some respects, but for some of us he might prove the death. Some religionists hav a hobby in this country; they are constantly endeavoring to bring to pass the realization of the union of religion and the state, especially in favor of the Congregational form. Guiteau could hav gone in for that, even if he had to reasort to a mighty coup d'état. Guiteau would establish a state religion, murder or drive out Romanists and the strictest of the Episcopalians, inaugurate a general St. Bartholomew among Infidels, bend the necks of Baptists, Methodists, Evangelical Episcopalians, and others of the like kind to complete subjection or union, and charter a supreme congregational régime with a line of popes and priests and deacons, monks and everything thereto appertaining. The grand culprit of the times would be Henry Ward Beecher, who would be executed in the state of New York with the most exquisit tortures that man could devise, as the profoundest Judas of the congregational community, and cast into hell fire as the vile serpent of their paradise. A new revelation would be added to the Bible to complete a third Testament containing all the laws and regulations of the new community. Upon the whole I am convinced that Guiteau is not alone responsible for the murder of the president, though he may deserve to be hanged for it, and may hav in the face of the law to formally answer for it, without a chance of being protected by the insanity cloak. Ye men and women of America—many of you, not all of you—I call your attention to your wretched brother Guiteau. Will ye allow him to die on the gallows, after he has done so much for you, and while ye yourselvs are as much to blame as he?

Thou, Lex Americana, and thou, Justitia, are ye going to hang Guiteau and let the crowd who nourished his every thought go unpunished? But perhaps ye cannot help yourselvs. We hav a lesson in Guiteau of the actual condition of human thought and the bent and dangers of certain human actions in America; let us do all we can to improve on our knowledge.

Florida.

Shall we hav a colony of Liberals in the southern part of the state—a real heaven on earth? I believe we can if we only will; and now is the time to start it while land is cheap. With twenty-five in number, and each having $500, we can buy the land and divide it in lots to suit us. We can start it in cultivation by hiring or otherwise; and in a few years we can hav a visible heaven, one that we can either make a home in or visit in winter, as would suit our condition best. I went to Orange county last winter and bought ten acres of land, one mile from Orlando, set it in orange-trees, and I now hav about eight hundred in a prosperous condition. If the Liberals will investigate the matter, I am sure they will come to the same conclusion that I did. I believe it is the easiest and best project for money-making in the world; and I am not sure but that it is even better than the great banking system J. B. Weaver speaks about. Liberals, will you investigate? If so, send for some state documents, and the Orlando Reporter. Whatever knowledge I hav I will gladly giv. Address me at Bushnell, Ill.

Garrison in Heaven.

I hav just read this unique little ten-cent pamphlet, Denton's dream, and must say the dream is well dreamt and better told. I think if Christians had only had an inkling of the consequences of sending Garrison to heaven they would never hav allowed him to enter the pearly gates, but would hav sent him to keep company with Agassiz, Parker, Washington, Lincoln, and others in the regions below. If you want a vivid picture of heaven as it is before Garrison runs all hell into it through that underground railroad he and Denton are to inaugurate, send for this little gem of a dream. It is comic, convincing, and readable. Address D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York.

Letters from Friends.

MOOSE CREEK, MON. Jan. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find inclosed $10—$5 to be applied to subscription on THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $5 to be dedicated to the valiant truth seeker abroad. I wish for his ideas as he has them. Please add my name to the fund if not too late. I want his book, for he will tell us what he sees with his natural eyes. He will tell natural men and women about natural things. I do not think he is inspired, so anything he sees and writes will be instructiv and tangible. Inspiration is awful slippery; now you hav it, and now you don't; now you see it, and now you don't see it. It seems very thin. The truth seeker thinks that he is earthly both in body and mind, hence I hav great faith in what he sees and what he describes; besides, I wish to help him and others. I would hav pledged myself for five dollars long ago but I hav been real hard up, and could not while the good TRUTH SEEKER was being sent to me without pay; but if nothing happens I will keep even after this. Yours respectfully, J. B. THOMPSON.

FILLMORE CITY, UTAH, Jan. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber for several years, and greatly admire THE TRUTH SEEKER for its bold and fearless utterances in defense of mental freedom and its well-directed blows in assailing superstition and error of every kind. It seems wonderful that in spite of all the absurdities inherent in the various religions of the day, the majority of mankind either cling to them or giv a tacit consent thereto, so that a man of earnest thought is in danger of losing caste should he giv expression to his honest convictions respecting them. For instance, what an absurdity is involved in what is termed Thanksgiving Day. Shipwrecks on our coasts may hav brought mourning into a thousand families; the fire-fiend may hav rendered desolate ten thousand homes, and one-half of our crops may be destroyed by an element which under more favorable circumstances produces fertility, yet when the regular season comes round the old stereotyped thanksgiving proclamation is considered in order. Can it be reasonably expected that the mourners will giv thanks because of their bereavements, or that those who hav been made childless or orphans, and hav been stripped of their all by fire and flood should giv thanks to him who is supposed to control all events? Surely not. How, then, can those who sympathize with humanity, and do all within their power to alleviate its sorrows and sufferings, join in thanksgiving to a being who (if all-powerful, as he is supposed to be) could by the slightest effort hav prevented all those calamities? Again, in view of those evils which afflict mankind, does it not seem a burlesque to repeat this scripture: "Not a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice; even the very hairs of your head are numbered"? Of what advantage is it to notice the sparrow, if nothing is done to prevent its fall? or to number the hairs of our head, if the entire body is suffered to perish? If there is a being behind nature to whom praise is due for all that happens to giv joy and comfort to humanity, is it not reasonable on the same principle to attach blame to that being for all that happens to produce pain and sorrow? Surely the contemplation of such a deity cannot in the nature of things produce in us very exalted ideas of his character. It seems to me much more reasonable and satisfactory to consider, with the highest intellects of the age, that everything in nature is governed by inevitable law or necessity without the slightest regard to the wishes or welfare of men (or any other sentient being), who must either liv in conformity to those laws, or suffer the consequences. But I must not enlarge on this subject, and will, therefore, come to business. I inclose $10 to renew my subscription, and for the Round-the-World trip and some books. Yours truly, JOHN KELLY.

RANDOLPH, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith please find $10 for two copies of your book "Around the World"—one copy for Mrs. Sarah W. B. Skidmore and one for myself. It is a little late, but I hope it is in time. I was not aware until now of your terms. J. E. WEEDEN.

STAMFORD, CT., Jan. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find my check for $8—$3 to pay for the paper and $5 for the book. I shall go to New York before long and see you. Let THE TRUTH SEEKER come right along as long as I liv, and when I die, send the bill to the probate judge.

Yours most truly, H. A. TYLER.

ROYAL CENTER, IND., Jan. 12. 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I send you $5 for the Round-theWorld fund and $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Hoping you are all well, I remain, Yours, GEO. HENDEE.

SALEM, ILL., Jan. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find money order for $5 for Mr. D. M. Bennett's historical trip around the world. I hope it is not too late to get my name in the volume. Better late than not at all.

Yours most respectfully, S. S. SACKETT.

PORT PERRY, PA., Jan. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed six dollars—five for Mr. Bennett's trip Around the World, and send me two of the books called: "Fruits of Philosophy." The remaining half-dollar put down for a trial subscriber for three months. I am very well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope that it may hav a greater circulation in the future.

Sincerely yours. HAMBLET JACKSON.

EPWORTH, IOWA, Jan. 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I see by your card that the Round-the-World fund is still open. Inclosed find $5 for the above fund. JOHN W. SHUMWAY.

LEMOORE, CAL., Jan. 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $8—three for THE TRUTH SEEKER and five to aid Mr. Bennett to return home. I had nothing to do in sending him, but perhaps should hav had had I not been from home most of the time for the last year, and only occasionally read a TRUTH SEEKER, but I see he writes as brilliantly as ever, and of course I must hav his book, as everybody ought to. I like your comments on Wm. T. Wisner's letter. Wonder if it will open the eyes of the blind, or are they hypocrits?

Yours truly, DR. L. S. MOORE.

[The letter of Mr. Wisner's referred to is the one incorporated by Guiteau into his address to the jury, and which has been circulated all over the country. It is, perhaps, useless to remark that Guiteau omitted to append to this "remarkable letter" the comments of THE TRUTH SEEKER.—ED. T. S.]

ROCK ELM CENTER, WIS., Jan. 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $5 inclosed, and add to the Round-the-World trip the name of S. J. FOX.

THE DALLES, OR., Jan. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed eight dollars, five for the Round-the-World trip, and three for THE TRUTH SEEKER for o e year. You will get two or three more subscribe from this place soon, also an order for some book M. LYMAN.

MONTAGUE, TEX., Jan. 22, 1882.

FRIEND MACDONALD: As I was opposed to Bro. Bennett's going round the world just at this critical time when he was so much needed at home, and I could not help him to go, I suppose you will allow me to come in on the return trip with $10 for the two volumes of his travels. Two TRUTH SEEKERS failed to get here from some cause within a few months, and I giv away all the rest and circulate all the Liberal works I can get. "Gods and Religions" is lent most of the time. I don't get a chance to read it myself. I am selling Judge Waite's book, and lending it, too; and also the Agnostic; and being in a grist-mill givs me a chance to talk to the people considerable. I am circulating Greenback papers, too. I came from the North, and hav been here four years, but can't say I like this country. There is too much ignorance and superstition here. The effect of slavery still exists, and this generation will not outgrow it. For some unaccountable reason No. 35 of THE TRUTH SEEKER did not get given away, so I will mail it to you. If you receive it send me an "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" and "Honest Questions and Honest Answers." The first money I can spare I shall send for more books and pamphlets to circulate. I expect the bigots destroy some of my books, for I hav lost several of Thomas Paine's among the number, and Robert Dale Owen's "Debatable Land." Well, I will be with them while I stay, and make as large a break into their old fortifications as possible. Yours truly,

GEORGE W. CARPENTER.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Jan. 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I thank you for continuing to send me my paper, although I hav been your debtor since August. I do not wish to be without THE TRUTH SEEKER while I am able to read it, and so long as it continues to teach and preach such good doctrin as radical Liberalism. I am none of your half-way or compromise-with-orthodoxy Liberals, but hold the opinion that if orthodoxy and superstition are wrong, the further we get away from it the better we are. There is no lurking-place between right and wrong, and hence my radicalism toward that which I know to be right. Mr. Bennett's letters are getting more interesting every week. I do hope, and were it any use praying, I surely would ask and pray, that he be restored safe, first to his noble wife, and then to the American Liberals, all of whom will be glad to hear of his safe return.

I am glad to see by last week's TRUTH SEEKER that the "V's" are still coming thick and fast. May they continue to come. I think it is a good idea to hold back a little while longer the publishing of Vol. I. of "Around the World." I, for my part, am not in any hurry, as I am getting it all from the paper. I say, fill up the volumes full, and make them fat, as Mr. Bennett at first promised, and you bet he never would feel satisfied if he thought that one of his promises to his subscribers was unfulfilled. I say fill them up with Mr. Bennett's news from abroad, interlined with some of his own good logic, and if $5 don't pay for the work, let Mr. Bennett say so, and I hav the confidence in his subscribers to the work that they will each of them advance $1 or $2 more, if required to complete the work. I, for one, will make good my proposition. I should be sorry to hear of the word fail getting into such an enterprise.

I notice in your last issue Mr. H. L. Green's visit and lecture in this city; and, by the way, he givs a very true description of the superstition and bigotry of this city. I am glad to hear, through him, that our Liberal League of this city is doing such a good work. There is surely much need for it. You perhaps wonder why I am not a member of the League. Well, my answer is, that I am obliged to work twelve hours per day seven days in the week, and so hav no time to attend any daylight meetings, but I intend to use what influence I can as an individual to spread the new gospel of Liberalism through my little circle of acquaintances to help me in this. I bring to my aid THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is a never-tiring advocate of the principles I preach. Mr. McSteen and I will send you, at an early day, the balance of this year's subscription. Wish we could do so at this writing, but cannot. Hoping that the good work will go on increasing, I remain

Yours for truth, H. B. MAXWELL.

FERNDALE, CAL., Jan. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office order for $3.50—$3 for subscription, and for the fifty cents I wish you would send tracts or leaflets containing arguments against the Sunday law, as we hav one in this state, and the Christians are trying to enforce it, which is putting the state to thousands of dollars, expense. I believe the majority of the people want the same law for Sunday that we hav for the rest of the week. We intend to make a big effort to hav the Sunday law repealed at the meeting of our next legislature. If you hav none on hand I think you could do a great deal of good by getting up some. The enforcement of the said law is kicking up a big fuss. Leagues are forming here, the same as in Kansas, to enforce and to resist the Sunday law, and I sincerely hope you will send us ammunition from your bounteous magazine that will help us to victory. I am a temperance man, but I don't want the Christians to use our legislatures to prop up their tottering structure. As long as our government legalizes the selling of intoxicating liquors the rights of the liquor dealer should be protected the same as other branches of business. When will Christians learn to do by others as they would that others should do unto them? Yours truly, A. SWEET.

MIDDLE FORK, IND., Dec. 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I write to inform you of the death of my father, Jesse Gard, who died a few weeks ago. He was an old subscriber to your paper, and requested me to write you of his death, and notify you to please discontinue his paper. He said to tell Mr. Bennett that he took his paper as long as he lived, and was only sorry that he could not take it with him into the great beyond. He died perfectly calm, and realized fully that he stood in the immediate presence of death. Yet he met the grim monster bravely, and approached the grave "like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams." His burial was very largely attended, thus showing the high respect in which he was held by his friends and neighbors. His daily life was a complete refutation of the Christian slander that an Infidel cannot be a good man and a good citizen. His death gave the lie to those hypocritical fanatics who are always telling us that an Infidel must necessarily repent before he makes his final exit into the realms of shade. With my best wishes for the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER,

Yours respectfully, M. H. GARD.

RIDGEWAY, KAN., Dec. 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The neigborhood of my date will interest your readers. Seventy years ago there was born in old Virginia, of Lutheran parents, a son, who was trained in that faith. As he grew up and read his Bible in Sabbath-school, he was troubled at the skipping of certain passages by his teacher. On asking the wherefore he learned that they were obscene. On asking again why the good Lord would write such, he was told that it was not for us to inquire —"Who art thou, O man, that repliest against God?" This begot the germ of his skepticism, which, under fair, honest culture, grew into brave, truth-loving denial of inspiration. At sixteen he, with his parents, six brothers, and three sisters, removed to Harrison county, Ohio, in a Quaker settlement. There he got into a Bible-investigating society. The older member first read a chapter, in answer to questions giving his views, and then the others followed, each expressing his opinions freely. In a few sittings the females dropped out to spare their blushes and disgust at the lessons' filth. The men, however, still continued, and by fair, honest investigations every one came out Biblical skeptics. As they emerged from absurd, superstitious fables, they moved on the road of common sense and science.

Hiram M. Heberling, the Virginia son referred to, married at a suitable age, and afterward spent three years in California, assisting to make it a free state. and extracting a little fortune from its mines, the half of which was spent in doctoring and burying a number of his sick comrades.

Finally, as Kansas opened to free-soilers, Mr. Heberling, wife, and children gathered all together to come hither. Here, with remarkable bravery, they, without losing a member, passed through all the troubles, withstanding successfully all the border ruffians. With his three unfaltering sons, all well armed, the heroic father engineered and fought straight through every emergency and danger. While too many of his neighbors were plundered, and more than a few, far and near, murdered, this remarkable family came through with the loss of a single mule. The mule being a stubborn free-soiler, it is more than doubtful whether he went the villainous ways of his wretched captors. Had he gotten loose, he had evidently made a bee-line for home.

In the way of labors and means to sustain the struggle for freedom, Mr. Heberling spent two or three thousand dollars, and yet has obtained, by industry and economy, independence, and still better, wide usefulness. He served in the first state legislature in '61–'62, and from that day to this impressed all his associates with the luxury of doing wrong to none and right to all. The unfortunate and the poor hav always found in him and family true friends. Besides, he has never suppressed his honest sentiments. To the pious, the superstitious, and the clergymen he has invariably spoken his knowledge and belief, as they did theirs. At neighboring gatherings, picnics, etc., he would take food and baskets of apples, saying, "These are the best prayers I hav to offer." As Franklin, when asked to giv a bell for a church, returned a library, saying that "sense was better than sound," so he would say "mellow apples are better than windy prayers."

Within a radius of two miles and a half, including some two hundred families and one thousand population, less than one-fifth are religious. The overwhelming majority are truth-loving Freethinkers. To no one agency is so much of this freedom due as to Hiram H. Heberling. Out of seven living children and eighteen grandchildren, each and all neither believe nor profess more than they can learn by and from their common sense. Moreover, the neighborhood, embracing the township, six miles square, without a church or preacher, is exemplarily moral. No one township, though full of church-members, can be found more so nor as much so. Indeed, the heaven of common sense and truth has happily spread to contiguous townships. As our war closed peace and prosperity set in, and with a glass on one of the hills the domicils of some two hundred independent farmers and eleven well-built and furnished schoolhouses are seen.

Instead of preaching and praying over the wild fancies of another world, the people consider the wiser means of utilizing this; so much the more do they improve and enjoy it. For years Mr. H. has taken and carefully read THE TRUTH SEEKER, with other true papers and books. As he reads he distributes to his neighbors. Though up to his three score and ten he is vigorous and activ, notwithstanding his life of dangers, exposures, and uncommon toil. In view of his final repose he assured me today that he felt a pleasure rather than a pain; the more so as he saw the cause of truth and freedom gaining over ignorance and superstition. Truth is mighty and will prevail, so sure as it is wisely handled by its friends. Yours truly, W. PERKINS.

DES MOINES, IOWA, Jan. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: For the first time of my existence I venture on a communication to you. Until I was quite a lad I was brought up in the old orthodox style—that is, in ignorance and superstition's school. It may not be out of order for me to tell you what brought me to begin to do my own thinking. In the town where I was born, which is Dowlair, in Glamorganshire, Wales, the populace on a certain day held a great jubilee, carrying the effigy of the immortal Thomas Paine through the streets, mocking it with infernal delight and derision. After they had paraded this effigy to their heart's content, and got hoarse with their devilish yelling, they took it to the bonfire, from whence they sent it off, as they thought, to glory—or to hell, I do not know which—having previously charged it with gunpowder. That was the end of their infernal sport for a time. But it did not stop there, but came in another shape. They then made hob-nails with "T. P." stamped on the heads. These were for the working men to wear in their shoes to trample his name in the dirt. O ignorance, when will you open your eyes? I, for my part, would rather subscribe to erect a monument to his memory than to the memory of any other man that ever lived on earth.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best food for thought I hav ever read. A friend of mine showed me a copy of it, and I cannot do without it now.

Y urs for truth and liberty, G. E. WARD.

SHERIDAN, MICH., Jan. 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for your paper for one year. I hav been a trial subscriber, and the paper has already become a favorit with the family. Father says any one who takes it for three months will want it longer; so I think you can count on us for life subscribers. You are doing very much to hasten the good time coming when the world will realize the fact that

> "We shape ourselvs the joy or fear
> Of which our coming life is made,
> And fill our future's atmosphere
> With sunshine or with shade."

MISS E. A. GLEASON.

GLEN BEULAH, WIS., Jan. 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: What makes your paper of special interest to me is that much of its religious (if I may call it so) sentiment is antagonistic to my own. It is of slight value to me to hav my own opinions substantiated. Other people's thoughts, while differing, captivate attention, and in this way, I suppose, we get rid of our theoretical crotchets.

Permit me an idea in reference to Guiteau's case. My friend Stephen Pearl Andrews, in your issue of Jan. 8th, makes some valuable statements. I wish he had dipped deeper into the psychic phase of our sociology applicable to that admirable subject. As Mr. Andrews says, church theology is on trial; but I fear if the authorities apply the barbarian remedy of hanging that theology will not hang too. With all their acquired and transmitted divinity, theologians are not apt to see behind results of force. Hanging Guiteau will be construed as a grand vindication of God's justice! But what if they cannot catch the real Guiteau? But what if that magnificent expedient to rid the world of such a wretch simply furnishes him a better opportunity for mischief, if so disposed, "over there." As, like everybody else, Guiteau is a child of society, society is bound to disciplin him and fit him and all such by correct education for better uses of his abilities than to prey on presidents. Hanging only "raises the devil." Justice is never vindicated on the principle, "he deserves it." Its true office is correction for improvement and reform—nobler uses. Saviorhood consists of right gestation in the first place, then right instruction to right character.

There is a philosophy in Guiteau's statement about "inspiration" or "irresistible pressure." Does not the electric positiv control the electric negativ? Is not the negativ under "irresistible pressure?" Men constitutionally demented in moral perception, but exqisitly impressible in the sense of selfishness or animal impulses, are but mere tools of others in offered or compelled service. Guiteau is simply the agent or medium that voices the moral plane of political and theological society. He appropriated and demonstrated in the actual the murderous elements generated in our politico-credal pandemonium. No one hired him, no plot was concocted, but certain politicians did wish Garfield were out of their way. In an organically murderous vehicle like Guiteau that wish took murderous form. He reasoned, yes, crazily reasoned, that "the end justifies the means"—that Garfield removed would restore harmony in the party and thus save the country. God would be vindicated! Elemental murder in the very air itself, the consideration mixed up with salvation to the union and the glory of God—was not this an irresistible force to a man of moral idiocy?

There are other psychic influences coöperating in this national drama of which I hav not space now to speak. Were the judge, lawyers, and jury in Guiteau's trial posted in psychologic laws, tracing from effects back to causes, their ruling, argumentation, and decision would be very different, in accord with the life law of reformatory justice. J. O. BARRETT.

MILNERSVILLE, OHIO, Jan. 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav one copy of the "Book of Mormon" (Mormon Bible), by Joseph Smith Jr., author and proprieter, printed by E. B. Grandin, for the author, in 1830. This is one of the first edition, in good condition, bound in leather. It is one of the scarcest books published in the nineteenth century. I will sell it or trade it for other books. To collectors of rare books this is a chance not often found.

DR. W. B. ROSAMOND.

EDGERTON, O., Jan. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is very seldom, in these skeptical days, that we find an educated man who is a genuin Christian, but I hav found one at last. Prof. C. E. Newberry, the present superintendent of our schools at this place, is a Christian, sincere even to lanaticism. He devotes fifteen minutes of precious time each morning to prayer to an impossible, unknown nondescript, whom nature is constantly ruling over as if he were a mere baby. For my part, I will try to get along the rest of my life without wasting any time in praying to a great unknowable nothing—something that does not exist.

The above seems to imply that I am an Atheist, which I am in the full sense of the word. I am aware that it is somewhat unpopular at present to hold Atheistical views, and it will be unpopular just as long as the people will not stop to think and investigate for themselvs. There are but two sides to the God question, and if one of the two theories can be proved absolutely impossible, then we may consider the other as established. Either the boundless universe, including all matter and all force, was created out of nothing by a god, or else it is self-existent and eternal, never having been caused or created by any extraneous power. That the universe was made out of nothing is absolutely impossible, for the reason that nothing, possessing no potencies, inherent qualities, etc., could never possibly become the cause of something—of the infinit all. The human mind, with all its efforts, cannot conceive of any thing that has not a material basis. Has any one an imagination strong enough to conceive of nothing being changed into something? Certainly not. From nothing there can nothing be made. And all the gods and devils deluded and ignorant man has devised cannot make one atom out of nothing. The idea is crude, absurd, and really unthinkable, and ought to be and will be discarded from the minds of all intelligent men and women.

"But," says the Theist, "all things must hav a beginning." If so, please tell us when your god began. Did he not hav a creator? Did not this creator hav a creator, and so on back forever? How many creators would you hav? All finite things must hav a beginning, and the od man, reasoning from this fact, concludes that the infinit must also hav a beginning. But the same method of reasoning cannot be applied to the universe, because there is no analogy between the finite and the infinit. In considering the question, "Whence came the universe?" the human mind is indeed lost upon the sea of "the unknowable," unless we accept the only true answer to the question, which is this: It never came, it never had a beginning, it has ever existed, and will continue to exist during all the succeeding ages of eternity. The universe contains within itself all the powers, potencies, and possibilities to produce all existing phenomena; therefore it will be seen that a god is wholly superfluous, that there is nothing for a god to do in the infinit economy of nature; and that he must of necessity vanish before the increasing light of science. I know it is very difficult to giv up belief in a god, but as knowledge advances God recedes, and in time he will hav to step down and out. The Greeks mourned when Zeus was no longer supreme. The Romans grieved when Jupiter no longer hurled thunder-bolts from his throne in the heavens. The gods are tumbling from their thrones one by one. The throne of Jehovah is crumbling, and he must sooner or later share the fate of his brother gods. Science is fast diminishing the realm of the supernatural, and substituting the natural instead. When we hav learned to worship the natural instead of the supernatural, we will become purer, grander, and nobler men.

Yours for the religion of nature, A. J. SHAFER.

MURDEROUS GODS.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

MR. EDITOR: The great intellectual people of America hath an idol of bloody proclivities. The assassin Guiteau proclaims that it was the American deity who shot Garfield, and he is not in the least responsible. If that be so, what are the American people doing that they should recognize so cruel and bloody-minded a deity? Moreover, behind this supposed deity the most atrocious of villains might shelter their foul carcasses, and defy any court to hang them. So long as the people believe in this dogma of inspiration it can be used for the vilest of purposes. There is no time to be lost wherein every well-disposed and civilized person should deeply reflect on this monstrous doctrin of inspiration. Already it hath soaked the earth with human gore, and now is the time to see to it that every murderous wretch who puts in a plea of inspiration as an excuse for his bloody crime should die without mercy, and any deity or God having power to commit the revolting crime of murder should be execrated by everything human. And as to his swarms of sponging, plundering priests, they should be ignored as aiders and abettors in the black swindle of inspiration. Can it be possible that the American people will still bow and cringe as abject slaves to any deity who slays their good president, and that without one particle of cause? Surely the people are not sunk so deep in superstition as to worship any deity who is a cold-blooded destroyer of good and true men. But any number of men, women, and children hav been destroyed in the name and for the glory of this relentless tyrant of the sky.

But now, once for all time, deny the right or power of God or men to take life in any murderous or revengeful manner. Hang every pious or impious crank, or any other wretch on earth, sky, or any other place, whose hateful propensity is the shedding of innocent blood.

Sir, is there no way of waking up the people to a sense of their danger through this miserable superstition which seems destined to make our beautiful planet a huge lunatic asylum? Cry aloud, and spare not, for we are drifting rapidly to a fearful crisis.

Yours in hope, T. WINTER.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Jan. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to the letter of Dec. 11, 1881, of "Byron Adonis," from San Francisco, contained in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 7th inst., allow me to state that it is greatly exaggerated as to the "Paradise of the Pacific." Everybody else but him knows here what an overcoat is, and they are worn here to good advantage, too.

In proportion to the population we hav more poor people here in California than there are in the East, and poor people do not liv on air either, however good it may be. Talking about San Francisco being an Eden, when nine out of every ten tourists will tell you that even in midsummer you hav to change your overcoat three times a day there!

California wants immigration, but let truth prevail first and at all times.

Yours truly, HENRY FUCHS.

Times Go by Turns.

The lopped tree in time may grow again,
Most naked plants renew both fruit and flower,
The veriest wight may find release of pain,
The driest soil suck in some moistening shower;
Time gently turns, and chances change its course,
From foul to fair, from better hope to worse.

The Sea of Fortune doth not even flow;
She draws her favorit the lowest ebb;
Her tides have equal times to come and go;
Her loom doth weave the fine and coarsest web:
No joy so great but runneth to an end,
No hap so great but may in time amend.

—Southwell (1560–1595).

Compensation.

It was the time of autumn.
When leaves are turning brown,
Green to yellow, and pied, and black,
And some were tumbling down.

It was the time of autumn,
When fruits are gathered in,
Some for the press, some for the vat,
And some for the miller's bin.

Then poor men fall a-playing.
For that their work was o'er;
And rich men fell a sighing,
That they could play no more.

For the summer time is a merry time,
If a man has leisure to play;
But the summer time is a weary time,
To him who must work all day.

Thanks be, then, to the giver,
That loves both great and small;
To every one it something givs,
But to no man givs all.

The rich who careth for himself,
Finds, after pleasure, pain;
But the toiler, whom he cares not for,
Rests, and is glad again.

Mental Evolution and Potency of Matter.

As animal organizations rise in the scale of being and adaptable use and corresponding mental advance, we observe that such increase in mind capacity is attained through increased nerve susceptibility, by which their sense nerves become more and more delicately impressed by external objects—i. e., objectiv expressions which improved sense nerves transmit to the brain and mind—and, thus, as the mind becomes correspondingly more delicately impressed, it becomes more perceptiv and acutely expressiv, idealistic, and so more imaginativ, and, hence, in greater contrast with its associate lower animal promptings, desires, and expressions.

Here nerve functions cease, and the separate entity of mind takes up and weaves its judgment of nerve impressions; and here, too, we trace the clue to man's greater antagonisms, between his inherited low animal desires, promptings, or proclivities, and his attained higher mental characteristics, which, in their unrestrained expressions, so imaginativly pamper his animal desires, indulgences, and consequent excesses that too frequently degrade him, morally, below the less imaginativ habits of lower animals (from which he has arisen) in the scale of organization. So man, in such unrestrained transitional state, frequently becomes more vile than the lowest brutes, in consequence of his capacities for imaginary indulgences too often expressed in cunning and practical cruelty. Their increased perceptions and imaginary appetites—not properly educated—take the form of unrestrained selfish cunning and indulgence, regardless of the rights of others.

My theory (an axiom to me) is that the universe is composed of intelligent and non-intelligent materials, and that all finite minds are derived from cosmic mind matter—as individualized parts of the infinit creativ mind—attracted to such organisms incipiently, and as they rise in the scale of organic development, in proportion to the sensitivness of their nerve constructions, being increasingly developed by such sense nerves as instructors of outward objects—our environments—and so become practical, but limited, co-creators, in their expressions. It, thence, follows that the scale of mental being—our capacities to acquire knowledge—rise, evolutionally, by gradually acquiring keener nerve susceptibility inherited from ancestral perceptiv uses; being thus successivly acquired and transmitted to their posterity, in more and better educated susceptible sense nerves, as the adaptable mind instructors. Hence, the posterity of educated parents always tends to increasing the facilities to acquire knowledge by such growing susceptibility of sense nerves, and particularly when conducted through a long line of ancestral cultivation—only acquired by education. Thus the prospectiv importance, with all classes, for education to enable them to transmit such increase of cultivated sensitiv nerve media between mind and objects—between the subjectiv and the objectiv environments—as the only means to attain perceptiv mental advance for ourselvs, or evolutional mental progress to our posterity. Benighted and degraded man—mentally and morally—will continue through all successiv generations, so long as elevating education of our sense susceptibilities (the origin of our perceptiv capacities to acquire knowledge) are neglected; and thus forever perpetuating class distinctions, or caste, in society, as well as degrading superstitions, and so are led by designing selfish men.

Materiality of all minds—as paramount forces—are a necessity, and are inseparable from association with unintelligent matter, in its varied impressed moods and forms, to hav any cognition of or control of the same, or for mind to hav any self-manifesting existence in the absence of such interdependence, as being the unconscious media for all our manifestations in impressions and expressions—matter alone acting upon matter. In fact, mind has no tangible existence without unconscious matter in association, as interdependent forces, co-operating in harmony of design, by mental invention; and with will-force for execution, by which all unconscious matter is, alone, brought into subjection in coherent phenomenal conditions and forms. Hence, material minds become the sole factors in nature and art for all the coherent and highly intellectual disposition of unconscious matter; and, therefore, intelligent and non-intelligent matter are co-related and co-eternal mutual necessities, being an interdependence for all mental impressions and expressions, in inventiv designs and expressiv executions upon unconscious matter—unconscious and so unintentioned matter, having no choice, is but the dependent yielding tool to conscious will-force power for all material phenomena. The conscious mind being material, alone enables it to act thus mechanically upon the matter which is not conscious, to giv it its coherent laws of action—matter alone acting upon matter—which we call its protentiality, but is, more properly, its mental enforced conditions.

The assumed potentiality of matter, as self-acquired, self-adjusting, and self-acting—i. e., without intelligent origin of its laws of action—is a palpable contradiction, since such Atheistic doctrin invests unintelligent, unconscious, senseless, and so unintentioned matter, with the voluntary co-operativ attributes of mind characteristics, with its highest inventiv capacities and will-force power, to account for the elements assuming such wondrous co-operativ acts and effects, in the production of needed combinations and highly complicated and ingenious mechanisms, everywhere exhibited in nature's laboratory, in cosmos and microcosmus—whereas the reflectiv mind knows that co-operation (a word which can, alone, describe such marvelous actions of matter) is an exclusiv act of intelligence in combination for such effects.

Can any single action of unconscious matter exist, or take place, without a cause, without a preceding impulse adequate for the effect? If not, then the vaunted potentiality of such matter, as self-possessed, is, in every instance of its action—single or combined—but the effects of a preceding cause, and so is not of its own doings, its self-acquired acts, or potency, as the cause of its motions or effects. This same absurd potential claim applies to the universe of matter, in all its multifarious works; in which some one primal cause is necessary for all after effects, and their intermediate chain of secondary causes and effects, in the consecutiv growing combinations and mechanisms of matter, in cosmos. And certainly, no conceivable potentiality of matter, without a guiding, intelligent, will-force origin of its laws of action, is possible for such incoherent materials to thus act coherently—i. e., for unintelligent matter to pursue intelligent ways, or to ape intelligent modes. Such claim presupposes that all matter is intelligent, to thus pursue intelligent ways; which must be an absurdity. As, in all human performances, every act or effect, upon unconscious matter, we know to be the exclusiv result of an invention of our minds, as a first cause of all such actions, impressed upon unconscious matter by our will-force. An infinit will-force must act, by the same intelligent processes, over the equally unconscious and incoherent materials of the universe.

When we take a comprehensiv survey of the material universe and behold its mechanisms, its order, harmony, and exactitude of motions and relations, in space and times; and its marvelous adaptability in its adjustments, not only to avoid confusion and conflicts, but to secure proper combinations and needed results as a whole, and in detail in each globe, for all their useful and esthetic arrangements, and requirements, everywhere exhibited in space and in our immediate environments, we but so confirm the reign of universal law and forethought, and thus of their intelligent and highest inventiv origin. And when we contemplate the wondrously complicated and delicately adjusted machinery of animal and vegetable organizations, in their countless numbers and variety, scattered through every clime on our globe, and each adapted to their local environments, with its peculiar sustentation; and everywhere immersed in a sea of atmospheric gases, or liquids, so exactly adjusted in their components and temperature that the slightest variation in their compounds would cause illness and death to such organisms; and excess of temperature beyond certain limits would render such sections uninhabitable, makes the doctrin of intelligent provisional origin of everything too palpable for doubt. And when we further add to the account of these marvelous constructions and necessary adaptable adjustments of the inorganic to the organic, the further wondrous bequeathment and development of finite minds to all animal tribes, differing only in degree of mental capacity, but not in kind, whose extreme sensibility require more especial fit surroundings than do the vegetable kingdom; all supposed possible potentiality to unintelligent, unconscious, unthinking, and so of unforeseeing, senseless, and unintentional matter, of itself begetting and controling such wondrous diversity in minds, mechanisms, and adaptable arrangements, fails wholly of any possible explanatory attributes, or conceivable power of such senseless matter, to so arrange the universe of elements and their effects, to adjust the requirements, even such as we now behold, here only partially considered; and with the crowning glory of minds acquired and their modes of instruction—between objects and subjects—the doctrin of the exclusiv intelligent origin of all things becomes an irresistible conviction, an axiom, to all unprejudiced minds.

In connection, I ask of any candid, sensible observer and thinker, can all such wonders of cosmos come from unintelligent matter only, without a foreseeing design or purpose in all their combinations, mental acquirements, and mechanical perfections, and corresponding acts? which so self-evidently require the highest intelligence for their conception or invention, and co-operativ will-force power of a material mind to bestow such finite minds, and to giv effectiv mechanical laws to unconscious matter, thus materially to enforce their observed executiv acts—matter of itself only being impotent for such effects? We know, too, that with our infinitly less knowledge and power, all our co-operativ intelligence is required for the accomplishment of our comparativ small control of some matter; while such matter, of itself, has not even the potentiality to imitate, or form the machinery which our minds devise and compel, by our will-force, such unconscious matter to perform—and such matter never resists our manipulations and control, as if it had an irresistible way of its own; a potentiality that our minds could not alter, direct, and force it into new actions and forms.

Herein, as above shown, are all finite minds proved to be co-creators, in a small way; and yet very important ways for their well-being, in their various devises; and, as such co-creators, are fitly supposed, by my theory, to derive their minds from cosmic mind-matter, as individualized parts of the great cosmic mind-matter, which, in its entirety, constitutes the infinit creativ mind, in giving laws for the actions of universal unconscious matter, as the only possible factor for the coherent actions of all matter—thus giving it all its seeming (self-acting) potentality; as we giv to some matter, which our minds, by invention and will-force, control. Creation is not in making matter, but in controling its disposition.

Thus as a first cause must exist, adequate for all effects—every phenomenon—so we are constrained to infer and, per force, admit for nature's wondrous works, that such primal cause must be an intelligent invention—a design—capable by co-operativ will-force to impress its behests, mechanically (as being a material mind), upon yielding and unconscious matter, all its laws of action, as the only assignable adequate power for its coherent acts, everywhere exhibited. Hence the consistent and necessary propriety of considering the universe as composed of intelligent and non-intelligent materials; the former as the inventiv first cause of all actions of unconscious matter and the, thus, mechanical controling power of the latter, as the unconscious materials to form all phenomena; and, therefore, that the two forces (primary and secondary—master and slave) are co-related and co-eternal independent necessities of the universe of coherent phenomena. So neither were ever created; but both, jointly, forever existing as mutual dependences and necessities. This alone solves the riddle of the universe of mind and matter and their modes of operation and effect. Therefore any supposed potency inherent in matter alone, as self possessed—the same not being co-operativ (co-operation being an exclusiv act of mind) is unintentioned and senseless—is, self-evidently inadequate, and so is incompetent to perform. Just as we find to be the fact in finite mind performances with unconscious matter, which such minds alone co-operativly impel into all its artificial combinations and forms.

Mind may be proved to be material—however subtil—from the well-known facts that it is moved, or impressed, by the motions of matter, as that of the body or external objects, conveyed by our sense-nerves; and, conversely, by the motions or expressions of our minds, conveyed through nerves and muscles, do we move the unconscious matter of our bodies and outside objects as desired. Thus the mind feels the motion of matter by its impacts, tremors, and vibrations; and, responsivly, expresses itself by its own motions, conveyed through nerves and muscles for necessary work. The science of dynamics proves that matter can only be moved by other matter, hence mind is material, however subtil it may be, as its feeling is thus proved to be engendered by motions of matter. The mind's abstract feelings, or sentiments of love, sympathy, admiration, and all mental processes, are induced from the products of memory of former motions of matter—its education—then directly affecting our sensibilities.

At the risk of some repetition, I will conclude this part of my subject with the reaffirmation—deeming it to be a highly important doctrin—that mind invention is the primal and only possible first cause of all coherent actions to unconscious matter, which is directly engaged in the production of all phenomena. The laws enforcing which are primarily due to intelligent will-power over such unconscious materials, yielding to the paramount force of mind—mind being material acts thus mechanically; i. e., simply matter acting upon matter, as the only possible dynamical action. As we see only such effects—the cause being hidden—we as blindly imagin such laws of matter—not looking beyond the results—to be the inherent, self-acting property or characteristic of matter only. As, analogously, looking only to the operations of man's bodily works, we might, if we had no knowledge of his directing mind, quite as rationally infer that such performances were inherent, self-acquired capacities of his body only. In short, material minds are a necessity for mechanical action upon other matter which is not conscious, and, therefore, has no volitional potency of its own. Such associate minds invent a purpose, a design, and then by their co-operating will-force, acting mechanically, are the only understandable potential powers in cosmos capaple of giving coherent laws of action to universal unconscious matter for any and every phenomena.

Beyond such intelligent impress there can be no inherent potency in unconscious matter, or any coherent phenomenal actions in the universe; simply because of the absence of the only possible co-operativ power, intelligence, in giving phenomenal expressions to matter, for a purpose—all material actions exhibiting a purpose, proclaims a guiding design, which can only come from a co-operating, directing intelligence. The universe being compounded of intelligent and non-intelligent materials, as coeval characteristics, the former controling the latter into all its phenomenal acts.

Minds thus characterized of imperishable materials—eternal matter, coeval with the unconscious elements—are, by necessity, as indistructible as is all matter, and are therefore immortal. As all minds are alike in kind, differing only in degree, so are all animal minds equally eternal; and thus can we, with equal certainty, be most pleasantly assured that out dumb companions and cherished pets in this world will bear us company in that assured succeeding life to which we all aspire. There, as here, our minds and theirs will be evolutionally progressing in new fields for observation, and thus of continued education; and so of progress in keener perceptions, by more delicate sense-media, and modes of communication with each other, including those of our own here dumb but intelligent companions, whose kind acts and eloquent expressions of affection we so much desire to rejoin and perpetuate with our kindred and other human friends.

These conclusions are the necessary results of the wholesome and most intelligent doctrin of the materiality of all minds whose evolutional progress is observable from incipient infancy to maturity in this life. This being an established characteristic of material minds, here must consistently be perpetuated—as matter is persistent—with our identity, our ego, in another life, through all time. Such materiality of minds, of course, wholly dispels the delusion of mystic immaterial supernaturalism, as having no place in a universe of exclusiv matter and law.

Thus let us imbue our minds in this life with all useful intelligence and moral goodness, that we may attain enjoyment here, and thus prepare us more satisfactorily to recognize our identity, our ego, in a succeeding life; and thus the more readily to participate in the only consistent inference of our evolutional mental progress there as here.

This doctrin of our future life is based upon the indestructible material element of all minds—which I think I hav fully proved in my books and published papers, as here—with our corroborativ experiences in this life; against which, I believe, no reasonable argument or sophistry can prevail.

So subtil is the element of mind that we know each other ouly by acts of our bodies, in works, writing, speech, expression, and inferences therefrom. So, too, we can only know the mind of the great Intelligent First cause—God—from the widespread book of nature (the only biography), where is amply displayed such wondrous wisdom, power, and beneficence as a bounteous provider; that permits no other inference of character to such Intelligent First Cause and fountain-head of cosmic phenomena. To such is due our admiration and our adoration, as the sole religion of appreciating finite minds, without any attached mysticisms and ambiguity, or of exclusiv priestly knowledge to dominate—nature is the exclusiv educator and refiner for all minds.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founde d upon the doctrin and authorit of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progres and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which man kind are capable of receiving.

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an which is the Doctor's latest and greatest me discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful plaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single ca some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; o upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had becou foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a pale or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. ☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, aided by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

NONE of us can tell what we might do or might not do under a strong pressure of favorable or unfavorable circumstances. We move as we are moved, and it is well that the besetting impulse of all humanity tends in general toward the highest, noblest, and best. It is well that goodness, love, humanity, industry, sobriety, and all the virtues predominate over their opposit, so that the great preponderance of circumstantial influence is toward elevating progress, happiness, and true morality—Elmina D. Slenker.

NONE but the utterly illiterate can entertain the notion of an individual deity who has a seat above the clouds and directs the separate affairs of men and women. The faith in miraculous interventions cannot exist in an activ mind. It may be maintained by a persistent refusal to admit knowledge; it may be preserved as a relic of the memory, but it cannot be actually held by any intellect that is awake to the issues of modern thought.—O. B Frothingham.

LIVES of great men all remind us,
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time;

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait!—Longfellow.

NOTHING is true because 'it hath been said;" nothing is false because it has been denied. "Truth is so." Goldsmith says, "As ten million circles will never form a square, so the united voices of myriads of men will never giv the least reality to what is false." Theodore Parker thought the stars might keep their places "however men's heads run round."—Christian Register.

ABSOLUTE trust in reason is the fundamental axiom of rational religion. Whether "whatever is is best" or not, whatever is is best to know, that somehow we may adjust ourselvs to it, and not liv our lives on a false basis. Emancipation from the fear of knowledge is a great emancipation If rational religion did nothing more for us than to secure us this emancipation, it would make no slight demands upon our gratitude and our allegiance.—J. W. Chadwick.

NO ONE can be a great thinker who does not recognize that, as a thinker, it is his first duty to follow his intellect to whatever conclusion it may lead. Truth gains more even by the errors of one who, with due study and preparation, thinks for himself, than by the true opinions of those who only hold them because they do not suffer themselvs to think.—Mill's Liberty.

HE that is strongly of any opinion must suppose (unless he is self-condemned) that his permission is built upon good grounds, and that his assent is no greater than what the evidence of the truth he holds forces him to; and that they are arguments, and not inclination or fancy, that make him so confident and positiv in his tenets. Now if, after all his profession, he cannot bear any opposition to his opinion; if he cannot so much as glv a patient hearing, much less examin and weigh the arguments on the other side, does he not plainly confess it is prejudice governs him?—Locke.

KNOWLEDGE is as food, and needs no less
Her temperance over appetite, to know
In measure what the mind may well contain;
Oppresses else with surfeit, and soon turns
Wisdom to folly, as nourishment to wind.
—Milton.

IT is our business, for our own sake, for God's sake, for the world's sake, to find what is true, and let the heart come after and learn to love and venerate and worship the truth. It is not the heart's business to lead the head, but the head's business to lead the heart.—J. M. Savage.

YOU may rest satisfied that what is nonsense upon a principle of reason will never be sense upon a principle of religion.—South.

IT is as natural to die as to be born; and to a little infant, perhaps, the one is as painful as the other.—Bacon's Essays.

BUT this we know: Our loved and dead, if they could come this day—
Should come and ask us, "What is life?" not one of us could say.
Life is a mystery as deep as ever death can be,
Yet oh, how dear it is to us, this life we liv and see.

Then might they say—those vanished ones—and blessed is the thought,
So death is sweet to us, belov'd, though we may show you naught;
Nothing is known, but I believe that God is overhead;
And as Life is to the living, so Death is to the dead.

IF there are any persons who combat a received opinion, or who will do so, if law or opinion will let them, let us thank them for it, open our minds to listen to them, and rejoice that there is some one to do for us what we otherwise ought, if we hav any regard for either the certainty or the vitality of our convictions, to do with much greater labor for ourselvs.—Mill's Liberty.

IN the ordinary theological treatment of it, reason is alternately patronized and discarded. Against Romanism and its dogmas and rites, the popular Protestantism uses reason with uncompromising energy, vehemence, and ridicule, allowing the claim of no self-styled infallible church, as interpreter of an infallible Bilble. But to free, inquiring criticism, philosophy, and science, this same Protestantism utters deprecations and warnings against blind and false and proud and misleading human reason, and throws itself back for absolute truth on an assumed infallible book, though interpreted by fallible men.—W. C. Tenney.

Odds and Ends.

WOULD it be vulgar to call soothing syrup a kidnapper?

A MAN cannot smoke a cigar too short unless he smokes it too long.

A BOIL in the kettle is worth two on the nose A corn on the ear is worth two on the toes.

OF course smoking is worse than chewing, for the old adage says, "Of two evils chews the least."

"LET'S 'lustrate it," hiccoughed a political orator. "It's beautiful. You see, an old farmer comes to town loaded with new wheat, an' he goes home loaded with old rye."

THE Mail, at Malta, Illinois, glories, or something like it, over the fact that there is a $250 baby in that county for whom no father can be found. It may hav been left over from some camp-meeting?

"Do you pretend to hav as good a judgment as I hav?" exclaimed an enraged wife to her husband. "Well, no," he replied slowly, "our choice of partners for life shows that my judgment is not to be compared with yours."

CARLYLE being once asked the difference between a natural fool and an educated fool, replied, "Just about the difference between you and me, I suspect." The questioner was never able to determin which kind of a fool he was.

"ELLA, is your father at home?" said a bashful lover to his sweetheart. "I want to propose something to him." "No, Clarence, papa is not at home, but I am. Couldn't you propose to me just as well?" And he did, with perfect success.

"THE sentence of the court is," said Judge Porter, a popular Irish magistrate, to a notorious drunkard, "that you be confined in jail for the longest period the law allows; and I hope you will spend your time in cursing whisky.' "I will, sir; and Porter too."

"JOHN, did you go round and ask how old Mrs. Jones is this morning, as I told you to do last night?" "Yes, sir." "Well, what's the result?" "She said that, seeing as you were impudent enough to ask how old she was, she had no objection to telling you she's seventy-four."

AN Oil City gentleman, who recently traveled in Europe, said he was at dinner one day in Paris, and while telling a story was attacked with a sudden and continued fit of sneezing. When he ceased, a Russian gentleman at another table, named Plitcheekee, turned about and complimented him on his correct pronunciation of the Russian language!

"IN THE GOLD ROOM."

Her golden hair fell on the wall of gold
Like the delicate gossamer tangles spun
On the burnished disk of the marigold,
Or the sun-flower turning to meet the sun
When the gloom of the jealous night is done,
And the spear of the lily is aureoled.
—Oscar Wilde.

"WHAT did you do with that letter that was on my table?" asked Gus de Smith of the colored boy who cleans up the room.

"I tuk it to de post-office, sah, an' put it in de hole."

"What did you do that for? Did you not see there was no address on the envelope?"

"I saw dar was no writin' on de velup, but I 'lowed yer did dat ar on purpuss, so I couldn't tell who yer was a writin' ter. I'se an edicated nigger, I is."

UNDAUNTED.—A TRUE STORY OF GOAT ISLAND AND THE BAY.

We sat on the deck of the ferry-boat—
The gallant El Capitan—
And as the darkness about us closed
And no one saw us, as we supposed,
My dexter I gently ran
About her delicate waist.
Now you must know that this girl divine
Was altogether and wholly mine,
Which fact I mention, lest you opine
The dexter could be misplaced.

"Sweet child," I said, as her dainty head
Coquettishly touched my own,
"The night is beautiful! Would that we Had wild ducks' pinions, that we might flee
Away to some happy zone
Where sorrow and care come not.
Upon Goat Island I'd like to make
A habitation for thy sweet sake,
And liv with thee in a grot.
What joy to wander with thee awhile
Among the boulders of that loved isle;
To chase the clam through the wilderness,
And feed on strawberries—more or less!
Wouldst like it, dear one?" She answered, "Yes."

"Wouldst like it?" I said, but I said no more.
A shadow fell on the canvassed floor,
And harsh and sudden a voice chimed in;
"Just so, my cherubs; we'll now begin!"
Whereat, the monster, with iron hand,
Raised me up by the collar-band,
And dropped me over the starboard rail.
"Good night," he said, as my frantic wail
Rang out on the midnight breeze;
"Go build your grot on the island dim—
I'll guard your charmer ad interim,
But write to us often, please!"

I heard no more, so I swam ashore,
And shivered the long night through,
Among the rocks 'neath the brazen bell—
Which clangs and clashes above the swell—
When tempests and fogs are due.
And thus I mused as I nursed myself
And shook from my locks the dew;
"This angry parent believes, no doubt,
The crabs are picking my eye-balls out—
He thinks I am cold and still.
Dream on, old rooster; my clothes are wet,
But I'm not feeding the fish, you bet!
I'll woo the charmer and win her yet!"
And, so help me Jove, I will!

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. George W. Dunlap, a Western revivalist, has eloped with a fair Kentucky convert.

WENDELL PHILLIPS heads a petition against compulsory vaccination, and so do thirty Boston physicians.

A SHOOTING-GALLERY in Denver city has a figure of Guiteau for a target, and the business of the place is "away up."

AT Genoa all dead bodies may now be legally burned instead of buried. The crematory furnaces are in full working order.

IT is estimated that as the result of the persecution of Jews in Russia 100,000 Jewish families hav been reduced to poverty, and property has been destroyed to the extent of £16,000,000.

A RING has been formed in an opposition colored Ebenezer church at Richmond, Va., against the Rev. John Jasper, the author of the "sun-do-move" theory. Bro. Jasper has taken up the cudgels, and is on the war-path.

"I DARE Ingersoll," said Talmage last Sunday, "to take his mother's Bible on some Sunday afternoon and go into his room and lock the door, and kneel down and read the fourteenth chapter of John." Talmage is a great joker.

THREE men who had committed murder in cold blood were lynched by the citizens of Seattle, W. T., a short time ago. The coroner expressed himself as unable to determin by whose hands the murderers came to their death, but was satisfied that "substantial and speedy justice" had been subserved.

THE verdict of a Methodist clerical jury in the ecclesiastical trial of the Rev. H. O. Hoffman, of Bloomington, Ill., was reached at two o'clock in the morning. The defendant asked leave to lead in prayer, just before the vote was taken, and was accorded the privilege, which he used most fervently.

WILLIAM S. WARD, a St. Louis negro, started a spirited revival in a negro congregation between his conviction of murder and the hanging. He was not allowed to attend the meetings, of course, but he wrote fervid exhortations, which were read with a "wonderfully moving effect upon the people."

THE failure of Mr. Thomas Hughes's Rugby colony is announced by the Rugbean, which says that the venture was "a fiasco almost before the echoes of applause over its beginning had died away." The location of the settlement in the wild mountains of Tennessee was unfortunate, and the men who joined it were not of a kind to hew success out of a forest.

"Now, little Marie," said a French lady to her godchild, as they passed a confectioner's shop in which a wealth of sweetmeats was displayed, "shall I giv you Faith, Hope, and Charity in chocolate?" Marie reflected for a moment, and then rose to the occasion: "Merci, chere marraine, but I should like the twelve apostles, because they will be more to eat."

FRENCH Protestants are much discomforted about the approaching suppression of the theological faculties at the University of Paris. Hitherto their degrees hav had the stamp of the state equally with those of the Roman Catholic faculties. They agree that the latter are useless and should be suppressed, but they wish to retain state sanction for their own teaching. Since the time of Luther the Protestants hav not been wanting in cheek.

AN enterprising burglar caught a-burgling a few days ago remarked, "Well, God made us all, some for policemen and some for thieves." This gentleman has in a few words given an excellent summary of the only true faith. God made the shark and the sailor's legs, the lion and the sheep, the policeman and the thief, and just fitted them for each other. All his works do praise him, and even the burglar joins in the chorus.—London Freethinker.

A NORTH ADAMS clergyman, commenting in his sermon upon the way in which churches raise money in these degenerate days by means of festivals, fancy fairs, and the like, made the remark that in Bible times "Jesus Christ didn't dish out ice cream at fifteen cents a plate, and hav the twelve apostles act as waiters, nor did St. Paul tend door at ten cents a head." He might hav added that it is not known that St. John ever condescended to a grab-bag, and Judas Iscariot was not mean enough to put two oysters in a stew and sell it for twenty-five cents.

THE following charitable sentiment was uttered by Pentecost, the revivalist, last week: "When a man boldly defies God and rejects Christ, he is 'done for,' and might as well be left alone. He can't be saved. This attitude damns him. Christ givs him up—why should his servants quarrel with him before their people? Such a course is contrary to the spirit of the gospel and in defiance of common sense. I hope I shall never again hear the name of Ingersoll from a minister's lips." The particular minister from whose lips Mr. Pentecost does not desire to hear again the potent name of Ingersoll is thought to be Bro. Talmage, of whose popularity Bro. Pentecost is exceedingly envious.

IN speaking of the attempt now being made in Connecticut to obtain a repeal of the old Sunday laws, the Hartford Times says: "The hour on the great century clock is no longer what it was in the Puritanic, Quaker-persecuting and witch-hanging days; and our statute-books should represent that fact." The Sunday law in Connecticut is peculiarly behind the age. Sunday excursions are illegal, and boats only in defiance of the law could carry passengers on Sunday to the Niantic Camp. In closing a long editorial on the "Modification of the Sunday Law," the Times says: "Moreover, there is a larger class than either, who oppose this intolerant legislation, top and bottom; and it may be just as well to remember that this latter is the growing class."

ALGERNON SWINBURNE, in a note "On the Character of Mary Queen of Scots," in the current number of the Fortnightly Review, referring to the assertion of Mr. Froude that Mary left the world with a lie on her lips, energetically observes that the Catholic God of her worship would no more hav been offended at this than the god of Dahomey is offended at human sacrifice. "Witness all the leading spirits among his servants, in that age if in no other, from pope to king, and from king to cutthroat; from Gregory XIII. and Sextus V. to Philip II. and Charles IX., and from Philip II. and Charles IX. to Saulx-Tavannes and Maurevel. To their God and hers a lie was hardly less acceptable service than a murder. Blessed Judas was a servant only less commendable than Saint Cain. Nor, on the whole, would it appear that the lapse of time has brought any perceptible improvement to the moral character of this deity. The coup d'etat of Aug. 24, 1572, was not an offering of sweeter savor in his expansiv and insatiable nostrils than was the St. Bartholomew of December 2, 1851. From the same chair the vicar of the same God bestowed the same approving benediction on Florentine and on Corsican perjurer and murderer."

HERE are some of the pastoral utterances by which Barnes, the Kentucky revivalist, expects to bring the intelligent sheep of the blue-grass pastures into the fold. The account is given by a reliable Louisville paper: Wednesday night Barnes preached on the travels of Paul and Silas. After introducing his subject, he took his Bible, held it up to the gaze of the audience, turned it inside out, twisted it into all sorts of shapes, and after explaining minutely for five minutes the excellence of the book and its binding, he said: "That's the kind of Christian I am—just like the Bible—Levant morocco, silk-sewed, kid-lined, Baxter's best, bound inflexible. God grant you may all be found inflexible." Among other noticeable things he said: "Pray the Lord to limber us up. Don't be old stiffeys." "I'm not going up to let any boarding-house keeper make anything off of me till I get to heaven. Let the Lord look out for your boarding-houses; he'll always do it. Just drop; Jesus will catch you. The people up here in Louisville don't know the Lord from the devil. They think a good many things the devil does are done by the Lord. O Lord, you're good; the devil's mean. I'm taking pot-luck through this wicked world. But you're good. Praise the Lord! Don't imitate the fashionables and say, 'How d'ye do?' 'Pretty well, thank you.' Say, 'Pretty well, praise the Lord.' God took up the world and shook it like a terrier would shake a rat, and there was a big earthquake."

AS we predicted, the fanatics hav commenced the work of enforcing the Sunday law in this city. The war has been carried on for some time in the country towns, and already one life has been offered up as a sacrifice on this altar of intolerance. The fight in this city commenced on Tuesday last, when a large number of citizens engaged in various occupations were arrested for violating the law. Among the Jewish-Americans arrested are Adolph Levy and Charles Myer, boot and shoe dealers, A. Roos and H. Lando, clothiers, J. and A. D. Heineman and J. Pausen, clothiers, M. A. Gunst, tobacconist. The arrested parties gave bail. The complaining witness is one Marx P. Schetzel, of No. 1004 Market st., but of course he is only the agent of the aggressiv band of fanatics leagued together for the purpose of enforcing the Christian Sunday on this community. The fight promises to be long and bitter, but although the Supreme Court has declared the law constitutional there will be trouble in enforcing it, owing to the hostility of public sentiment and the fact that trying too many cases would clog the law courts. Now that the advocates of the obnoxious Sunday law are determined to enforce it, it is the duty of all classes of liberal-minded citizens to unite in legally preventing as far as possible undue hardships from being perpetrated upon any special class. Wholesale arrests, on information given by the opponents of the law, would, in all probability, be the best means of bringing the Sunday law into even greater contempt than is now held for it. Let there be wholesale arrests of railroad magnates, steamboat men, newspaper proprietors, hotel-keepers, druggists, wholesale butchers, grocerymen, lawyers, who are all found in their offices "breaking the Sabbath," managers of theaters, and all classes in general, and then the issue will be brought to a focus. Stop all business, make Sunday a day on which the power of the tyrant of intolerance is felt to the very marrow, and then this public which has so long enjoyed social liberty and passed the Sunday as conscience dictated will find what it is to groan under the blue laws. We think that the best way is not to fight this particular law, but, as we say, actually enforce it—enforce it so thoroughly that both the law and its advocates will become a stench in the nostrils of the community. If we are to hav a Christian Sabbath let it be a genuin institution, smelling of brimstone and tasting of gall to the dregs of bitterness. If its enforcement in this merciless sense will not wake up the liberty-loving people of San Francisco and the state to wipe out the law and cover its fanatical advocates with odium, then we are mistaken. The Sunday of the past has been to the masses of San Francisco a day of rejoicing and happiness, a day on which as free men and free women they had a respite from the grave cares of life and could say "their souls were their own." Thousands of the working classes sought nature's fields for rest and recreation; thousands enjoyed themselvs at the theaters and other places of innocent amusement. Stop all this, pen men and women up as if they were cattle, dictate to them as if they were slaves and serfs, burden their lives with petty tortures, and you enforce the Puritanical Sunday and the Christian Sabbath. Enforce it until the public vomits this spawn of fanatical fury.—San Francisco Jewish Times.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

The Book of the Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh.—Continued.

CHAPTER VII.

MELCHISEDEC'S THIRD VISIT.

1. And it came to pass when all the camp was quiet, when the pilgrims, the men-servants, the horses, the mules, the asses, and moreover the dog, had betaken themselves to repose, the Venerable Visitor of olden time again drew rein at the couch of the Scribe, and thus did salute him:

2. Hail, earnest Truth Seeker, I greet thee again on this occasion, and fain would give thee renewed assurances of my friendly regard. Hast thou aught on thy mind concerning which thou wouldst like to inquire of me to-night? If thou hast aught that is not well settled in thy own understanding, I will cheerfully come to thy aid.

3. Straightway the Scribe made answer in this wise: Venerable Friend, again art thou welcome, and again would I assure thee that thy visits are most agreeable to me. If I may dictate to thee what I would that thou discoursest upon to-night, let it be the story connected with this land of Yahweh, in which these pilgrims are now sojourning; thou wilt give me joy if thou wilt declare unto thy servant if all the record is true that is written of this land; and if it so be that all is not true, wilt thou graciously point out the true from the false?

4. Then mildly answered the Venerable Visitor: Know ye, then, that the story connected with the land of Yahweh does not differ greatly from the stories of other ancient lands; and it is well at all times to bear in mind that in the stories of olden days in all lands the imagination of the writers had much to do.

5. In all that men call ancient history but little is truly worthy of the name of history. So much fable was mixed up with their facts, and the accounts were written so long after the events transpired, that many times the story is wholly unlike the real truth. This remark applieth not only to one particular country, but to all countries the same.

6. In ancient days there were very few who were capable of being historians, neither possessing the learning requisite for the undertaking nor the fidelity to write nothing but the truth. The utterances of nearly all the ancient writers should be read with a great measure of allowance.

7. I will furthermore state that the writers of all nations and all countries, as well as in all times, do what they do by their own knowledge and abilities, and in no other way do they write. The gods have never helped men to write any more than they help them to plow, to plant, and to reap. Man's work must be done by man alone; the gods never do men's work, and it is only idle to claim that they have done so or ever will do so. Writing history is man's work, not the work of the gods of any people.

8. When the claim is set up by any people that any of the gods wrote any given story or account, do not forget that the claim is untrue; no God hath written anything of the kind. It is very easy to make such a claim, but it is impossible to make it true. Remember it is an axiom of truth that the gods never do the work of men. Man must ever do his own work.

9. There is a substratum of truth in the stories of nearly all ancient countries, though all abound with more or less of fable. The Jewish story is no exception to this rule. Their gods, for they had more than one, were no more able to write than the gods of other nations; and if it were possible for any of them to write, their stories would be no more reliable than if men alone had written them.

10. In the Jewish story it is not very difficult to point out that which by no possibility can be true. It by no means follows that possible narratives are always true, but it may be accepted as truth itself that impossibilities are never true though they have been written thousands of years, and have been reiterated thousands of times.

11. All that is supernatural in the Jewish story, as well as in all other stories, is untrue. Every claim of a miracle having been wrought, of the impossible having been performed, of the laws of nature having been superseded, is a false and superficial claim. To this extent, at least, the Jewish story is false. Other parts may be true (though they are not, as already remarked, necessarily so), but miracles are never true.

12. In Jewish story, as well as in the stories of other nations, there is a basis of truth. The Jews were a Semitic race, and moved into what is called Palestine from Arabia and Chaldea more than three thousand years ago.

13. They were not very much unlike what thou seest in the Bedouins to-day; they were wild, nomadic, pastoral, living by their flocks, and without fixed habitations, and roving from place to place. Their characteristics, I repeat, have been retained by the Arabs and the Bedouins now living.

14. They had no literature, they possessed but little civilization, and had no history that was ever correctly written. It was not until they had been conquered and subdued by the nations that surrounded them that they began to acquire the civilization and spirit of progress which other nations possessed in excess of them.

15. They were not more moral, they were not more peaceful, they were not more truthful, than the nations which surrounded them. They possessed as many vices as the nations round about, and there was no reason why they should be accepted, to the exclusion of all other people, by any god that ever existed or was ever devised.

16. It is unwarranted and very unwise to accept for truth an impossible assertion, simply because it is old, or to believe the gods spoke it because it has come down from ancient times. The gods can do precisely as much to-day as they did thousands of years ago, and could do precisely as much thousands of years ago as they can do to-day—and that is nothing at all. It is strange that men will continue to give credence to an old, impossible story, when they would not believe it for a minute if told of events that occurred a few months or years ago. What would be impossible four months ago would be equally impossible if dated back four thousand years ago.

17. To begin with the Jewish Bible story, I will take up some of the points and give you my views upon them. The story of the Garden of Eden, the creation of the world, the formation of man and woman, the temptation and fall, is only a poem, or fable; nor did the same originate with the Hebrews. They obtained their ideas of cosmogony, and the story of the Garden of Eden, from the Babylonians, when held by them in captivity, and proofs of this are abundant by the fact that practically the same stories have been found stamped upon earthen tablets in the ruins of Nineveh and Babylon, and which were so inscribed many centuries before the Israelites were taken there.

18. The Babylonians were far more advanced in literature and civilization than were the Hebrews, and the latter obtained from the Babylonians the greater share of the learning they took back with them to their country. The Babylonians learned very little from their captives, but their captives learned very much from them. The greater share of the Old Testament was not written till after the return from the Babylonian captivity, and in that way can easily be accounted for the introduction of the Babylonian theory of cosmogony, the first pair of human beings, their temptation and fall.

19. That this poem—for that is all that it is—is untrue there are most abundant proofs. Adam and Eve were not the first pair of human beings who existed. In a score of countries in different parts of the earth have been found the bones of human beings who lived on the earth fifty thousand, and even a hundred thousand, years ago. These proofs are found in Asiatic countries, in the countries of Europe—not omitting England and Wales—and even in thy own country, called the New World, thou hast abundance of proofs that human beings lived there not less than fifty thousand years before the time of Adam.

20. The same is true of the age of the earth. There is nothing better proved than the fact that the earth has existed more than six thousand years. The truth is, it has existed many hundreds of thousands of years. I myself am unable to tell thee how many hundred thousand or millions of years have rolled by since the earth was separated from the parent body, the sun; when it took upon itself a separate existence, assuming the spherical form, condensing by parting with its superabundant heat, until it approached something like its present size, when its surface crystallized in the form of rocks, a large portion forming also from the clayey deposits in the water which surrounded the earth.

21. Howbeit it must have required a hundred thousand years for the surface of the earth to become cool enough to admit of water remaining upon it in a condensed or liquid state. One class of rocks, by the lapse of ages, became hardened into stone, and are called aqueous rocks; while those termed igneous were thrown up by volcanic action, and when cooled off became solid stone.

22. The outer portion of the earth is made up of several strata of aqueous and igneous rocks, which are found both separately and together, and which have occupied hundreds of thousands of years in forming. In those farthest down no trace of animal or vegetable life is found, showing conclusively that for incomputable ages the earth existed as a sphere, doubtless having the motion it now has, and without a particle of organized life of any kind upon it.

23. In the strata above these the remains and fossils of a low order of life are found, and from these, as we ascend in the scale of time and examine the accumulating strata, the remains of quadrupeds and mammals are found; and finally man himself comes to view. These strata, these fossils, and these remains were not brought into existence, were not formed within six days of each other, but millions of years must have elapsed between the earlier stage and the later.

24. The carboniferous deposits of coal in numerous parts of the earth are incontrovertible proofs of the great age of our globe. Your scientific men are quite correct in deciding that these deposits are of vegetable formation, and that they are the product of an immensely fertile growth of plants adapted to such production, and that those plants could only have flourished in a warmer and more humid atmosphere than that now existing on the earth. And as these coal deposits are found in abundance in many latitudes and climes, even within the polar circle—which with the very slow movement of the earth changes its poles and its equator—it must have required some hundreds of thousands of years for the polar region to have occupied the place of the torrid zone.

25. Again, those who have made the races of men their study find the earlier or prehistoric races were a crude, wild, undeveloped class, who possessed nothing of the intelligence of the men who have peopled the earth for the last few thousand years. By the crude stone implements, by the fact that human bones have been found in caves and under deposits and formations that must have required tens of thousands of years to perfect, and side by side with the bones of animals that passed out of existence long prior to what are called historic times—even more than six thousand years ago; by these and other proofs that cannot be thrust aside irrevocable proofs are established than man existed, on the earth more than ten times as long ago as the Bible writers knew anything about, they being wholly unable to explain these things.

26. These truths—and truths they are—demonstrate with unerring certainty that the Bible story is but an idle fable; that, so far from its being true, it is false in every particular, even though it be the foundation of the Jewish religion, and of the Christian religion—which is largely an outgrowth of the older absurdity.

27. As the Babylonians in their day knew nothing of the demonstrations of modern science which have been brought to light within the last two centuries, and as the Hebrews largely obtained their views from the Babylonians, of course they necessarily remained in the same dark ignorance.

28. These are truths that cannot be averted nor disposed of; they are facts which no Jew nor Christian can disprove; and at one fell swoop they brush away the entire substructure of Judaism and Christianity. And I state as another axiom of truth that where the foundation of any system is wrong, not all that can subsequently be built upon it, all the reverence that can be extended to it, all the repetitions that can be made of the false theory, can ever make it true for one moment. The Bible story is assuredly false. It has not the shadow of truth in it, and every time it is repeated a lie is surely uttered. These are fables which had their birth in the brains of ignorant, imaginative men, and no God had aught to do with them.

29. Another great untruth has a thousand times been uttered in the silly story about Noah and his flood. This fable was also borrowed from the Babylonians, and is as false as that the earth is but six thousand years old.

30. Many nations, whose knowledge, as well as their fable, was borrowed one from another, had ideas more or less wild and vague about a flood which once visited the earth. This fable was not general with all nations; some entertained it and some did not. For instance, the city of Thebes in Egypt, which was founded before the time set for the flood, has no such tradition, and never heard of such a thing as a general deluge, as described in connection with Noah.

31. The Phœnicians, also a very ancient people, had no such tradition, and never dreamed that the earth had been a year under water, which drowned every man and every animal save Noah and his family and the menagerie he had with him. Neither have the Chinese, who claim to have reliable records running back for twelve thousand years, any tradition of Noah or his flood. If Noah and his God got up a flood, it did not reach so far as China on the one hand nor Egypt on the other; or if it did the people never learned anything about it.

32. But the Babylonians had such a legend, and it has been found inscribed on their tablets in cuneiform characters, which are thought to have been executed not less than four thousand years ago. There the Jews learned it; and after they returned to their own land it was very easy to incorporate it into their writings, and for those who came after to believe it was the work of a God. When men and women are ignorant enough they will be found capable of swallowing without a strain or a wry face the most utter falsehoods.

33. It would seem that there are so many utter impossibilities in connection with the flood story that no sensible person could believe it for one minute. But when it comes to the religious falsehoods of the age of three thousand years, there is nothing too monstrous, nothing too absurd, to be told, and nothing too ridiculous to be believed; and as the tales have been told over and over, there are hundreds of thousands of tolerably well-informed people who readily give their assent to those baseless creations who would not think of giving them a moment's credence if told at the present time and by persons whom they know.

34. It is indeed marvelous to note with what facility men can believe that rain could fall continually day and night for forty days, and with such rapidity as to raise the water over the entire earth to the tops of the highest mountains, making the rain-fall reach seven hundred and twenty-five feet per day, or thirty feet per hour, or six inches per minute. It is wonderful how they can persuade themselves that the atmosphere could sustain such a volume of water, to say nothing about where it could all find a place to go after the work of killing was performed.

35. It is most singular how they can believe it possible for a man and his three sons to gather into one vessel pairs or sevens of all animated creation, with the exception of the fishes, lobsters, crabs, and turtles, which are supposed to have been able to stand the prolonged freshet, and this from all the zones and climes on the face of the earth, when the same feat would require hundreds of men to work faithfully for a year.

36. It is astonishing how sensible people can believe that the same force of men, besides accumulating in one place the millions of quadrupeds, bipeds, birds, reptiles, snakes, insects, including bugs, beetles, worms, spiders, flees, lice, and thousands of those varieties of animated existences, could secure the necessary multiform kinds of food needful to keep that vast menagerie alive for thirteen months.

37. They scarcely stop to think that there must have been a great diversity of the kinds of food required, and that much of it could be kept only with extreme difficulty. For instance, many of the animals must have fresh meat, and that every day; some must have fresh fish—salt or stale fish would not answer; some must have fresh leaves, and they must not be allowed to dry up; some must have the bark of trees; some must have seeds, and a great variety would be necessary; some would require roots; some would require honey; while many exist on insects alone, including ants for some, bugs for many, worms for many, with a great variety of other forms of food unnecessary to mention.

38. It is passing strange how people can believe it possible that such a gathering of several millions of animals, little or big, even though they had all the kinds of food they required, could for one day, or even for one hour, live thus shut up in a vessel corked and pitched air and water tight, with but a single door and a single window, which Yahweh closed after they had all got in, to say nothing of the thirteen months which they were obliged to spend together, unfitted as they were by their very natures to be thus shut up in the dark without fresh air.

39. It would seem that the believers in the story of this big rain should recognize the necessity of of Noah and his sons providing for the vegetable as well as the animal kingdom. Plants, small or large, including herbs, shrubs, and trees, must inevitably die if kept under such a volume of water for a year. It was just as necessary that they should be taken into the ark, transplanted into the flower-pots of graded sizes, as it was to take the animals.

40. The very fact that the vegetable kingdom was not destroyed despite the flood, proves that the animal kingdom could have withstood the watery ordeal nearly as well.

41. In short, the whole story is too absurd, too silly, for sensible people to give their attention to, or seriously entertain for one moment. The question then inevitably arises, Is the story the truth or is it a falsehood? I proclaim, with the utmost emphasis, that it is falsehood, and nothing but falsehood; and to say that the cause of truth and virtue requires the believing of such silly tales is as false as the story itself. There is no virtue in believing falsehood under any circumstances.

42. It is such idle tales as this that make the Jewish and the Christian religion nothing less than contemptible. When any system of religion has to depend upon a mass of such foolish and senseless tales as this, it is time for men and women of good sense to discard it utterly. It is enough to condemn any system of faith that in it is incorporated one such gross falsehood as the story of Noah and his flood.

43. Of a truth more lies have been told in the cause of gods and religions than in all other causes in the world; and in this respect no systems have gone farther than Judaism and Christianity. Though they have stood for thousands of years, they are based upon falsehood, and deserve the honest and hearty execration of mankind.

44. Falsehood should always be despised, under whatever garb it seeks to shelter itself, but most of all when it clothes itself in the habiliments of religion and virtue. Let me advise thee to beware of religious falsehood, and I ask thee to extend the advice to thy numerous readers.

45. But I will now take my departure; to-morrow night I will call upon thee again, when, if thou choosest, this subject shall be renewed. Good-night; may thy sleep be sweet and refreshing.

46. The Scribe barely had time, as the shadow was passing out the tent door, to return his good-night, to thank him for his visit, to express his satisfaction with what he had heard—confirmatory as it was of the convictions he had already entertained—and to express the hope that the Venerable Friend would not fail to come again. In the morning the Scribe felt that he had had a refreshing sleep.

CHAPTER VIII.

FOURTH DAY'S JOURNEY—SEA OF GALILEE REACHED.

1. And it came to pass on the four and twentieth day of the month, after the pilgrims had partaken of the viands which the cunning Ethiopian had prepared for them, and the men-servants of the tribe of Syria had indulged in their usual morning quarrel about the disposal of the luggage, and which part each Syrian should perform, the pilgrims were seated in their saddles, and each man and woman, and moreover the dog, set their faces toward the Sea of Galilee.

2. The captain of the host led the way when Bridges of the land of Hoosier was not in the lead, which was mostwise the case. As for the Scribe and his horse Al Borak, neither is ambitious. The one is willing to bring up the rear and the other does not make himself unhappy about it. If, however, Al Borak would walk a little faster, the Scribe would in nowise murmur.

3. About the usual number of the dusky sons of the desert were met to-day, with the ever-accompanying donkey or camel and the old flint-lock musket. Among the Bedouins met this day was one who recognized Al Borak, the horse of the Scribe, and straightway did he come toward him as a man approaches his friend. When the Scribe perceived that two friends had met, he stopped his beast and remarked to the Bedouin, Thou knowest this horse, then? When the Bedouin said, Yallah, hallah, bellallah, or something that sounded like that, and straightway he came to Al Borak and fell upon his neck, threw his arms around it, and kissed him upon the mouth.

4. The Scribe was gratified to see such marks of affection on the part of the Bedouin, who was not very old nor exceeding ugly; but he was only sorry to see that Al Borak did not adequately return the caress; in short, he did not seem to be specially moved by the touching incident, and, regretful to relate, he did not return the kiss. From that hour the Scribe knew that his horse was of the Bedouin stock; but he rejoiced not, neither was he abashed, but went on his way.

5. As the pilgrims neared the southern end of the plain of Huleh, they saw one hundred and forty-four thousand of ravens or crows (computed), which were flying about in a dense body, keeping up a continual cawing and croaking, which sound even worse than Syrian singing; howbeit, Syrian singing is simply horrible, and the pilgrims hear it continually.

6. Some of the pilgrims did greatly marvel at what so many ravens could mean, and hoped none of the horses of the host were seriously endangered. Then did the Scribe make this remark: Peradventure those sable birds are holding their fall elections. Be it known, moreover, that the ravens of the Land of Yahweh, who fed Elijah when he led off in the Dr. Tanner business, are somewhat larger than the crows in the land of Unclesam, and they have a coarser voice withal; nor are their notes as beautiful as the nightingale, which one gladly sits up all night to listen to.

7. As the pilgrims ascended the hill, at the termination of the plain of Huleh, and passed over the interminable rocks which no man is able to number, lo and behold, when they lifted their eyes, did the famous Sea of Galilee heave in sight. Then did the heart of every pilgrim rejoice, and mentally did he exclaim, Glory to God in the highest; mine eye hath now seen this great little body of water, and now can I depart in peace. Selah.

8. Be it known that this Sea of Galilee is the most diminutive body of water in the world that is called a sea, over which so much has been said, and about which such a great fuss has been made. Some little sheets of water called ponds, in the land of Unclesam, look nearly as large as does this famous Sea of Galilee, otherwise the Lake of Tiberias, or the Lake of Genesareth. The Scribe was reminded by it of the little body of water by the side of which he was born—to wit, Otsego Lake, in the land of the Mohawks. The Sea of Galilee is a trifle the larger, but Otsego Lake is a thousand times the prettier, including the surroundings.

9. The Sea of Galilee was still some miles away when the eyes of the pilgrims first beheld it, and for an hour and a half did they ride over a continual mass of rocks that were enough to make the heart of the traveler grow weary and faint.

10. Many of these rocks are honeycombed with an exceeding great honeycombedness, even like unto the skulls of camels and horses and asses and oxen scattered all over the face of the earth round about.

11. On the eastern side of the Sea of Galilee are the abrupt and barren hills of Bashan, on which nothing can grow or ever did grow. These same hills, howbeit, do not belong to the Land of Yahweh.

12. On the western side and at the northern and southern ends the hills rise more gradually, but they are so rocky that in many places a shoat would require to have a very sharp nose to be able to introduce it between the rocks withal; howbeit an animal of the swine breed has not been known in these parts for five hundred years, more or less.

13. There are, peradventure, ten thousand acres of land, or, more properly speaking, rocks, which descend toward the Sea of Galilee; and of this body not five hundred acres can be plowed, or ever were plowed, so continuous are the rocks withal.

14. Here and there are little nooks and patches of half an acre, an acre, and peradventure five acres, which could be plowed, while the residue could only be cultivated with a sharp-pointed pick, and the hills for miles upon miles are naked rocks and nearly as barren of vegetation as a tile roof in the month of August.

15. When the Scribe did cast his eyes about and saw the utter sterility of the greater share of the country before him, he raised his voice and broke forth in these words:

16. Know all men by these presents, that were I a god of unlimited power, and essayed to make a world and a country to suit myself, and to be the abode of the people I selected from all the nations of the earth, and moreover to be the residence of my only well-beloved son, whom I should send here to spend his vacation, and to die withal, to atone for the sins of wicked men and women who had lived out the natures with which I had endowed them—

17. Yes, that this innocent son must die to repair the blunders I had made and to enable me to forgive the helpless wretches who had lived as I had designed them to live—then if I could not get up a better country than this, as my soul liveth, I would throw up the contract and turn the job over to my adversary, the devil, and at once start a barber's shop with a borrowed razor. (Howbeit Yahweh says in his book that he did once borrow a razor, but whether he ever returned it deponent saith not.) Witness my hand, De Robigne, the Scribe.

18. Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of the man of God Getz and the man of God James, of the land of Williampenn and the land of Johnbull, aforesaid.

19. Furthermore did the Scribe say, If this land ever flowed with milk and honey, of a truth the cows have died off with starvation and the bees have emigrated to some other country.

20. For the midday meal the pilgrims halted at an old caravansary of the middle ages, called Kahn Yubb Yosef, where a stone house still stands, and a well which affords good water. Be it known that this is the main camel-road from Egypt and Damascus, and while beforetime it was greatly traveled, it is no longer much used with camels bearing rich merchandise.

21. Hard by this place is what is said to be the veritable pit in which the youthful Joseph was cast by his evilly disposed brothers, who were envious of him because he could dream more than they, and also because his father furnished him with a fancy coat of many colors.

22. When the father sent him to see what had become of the other eleven of his sons, they saw him approaching and said among themselves: Here cometh that dreamer: let us kill him and put him out of the way so that he will trouble us no more.

23. But the elder son Reuben possessed more kindness of heart than the others, and he persuaded the boys not to kill the lad, but to cast him into this deep pit, whence he could in nowise escape. The good-hearted Reuben doubtless intended to release the lad in due time, and let him return to gladden the heart of the aged parent at home; but the other boys with evil hearts did sell the stripling to some Ishmaelites who were journeying to Egypt, where he became a great man, even greater than the king.

24. The wicked sons, however, took off the lad's coat of many colors, and dipping it in blood, took it to the father and wickedly made him believe that wild beasts had torn and devoured the old man's favorite. Altogether it is a nice little Sunday-school story, but let us not pursue it further at this time.

25. When it is remembered that the Scribe hath seen the pit into which poor little Joseph was cast, it is hoped the reader will be duly appalled at the intelligence; but there is one little drawback which partially spoils the felicity and the happiness of this occasion; a few miles away there is another veritable pit into which the veritable Joseph was cast, and from which the veritable big brothers sold him into Egypt. The poor Scribe was so perplexed to decide which of the two was the simon-pure pit which the lad was cast into, that, sad to relate, he came near doubting whether he was thrown into either pit. But the happy reader, having paid his money, is at liberty to take his choice.

26. After the meal was dispatched the Scribe walked forth to the small plain hard by and gathered seeds of what the captain of the host says are Lilies of the Valley: also of the squill plant now shooting up in luxuriance, and which looketh a little like tulips in the spring, but very much more stocky. The same is a pretty plant, and also possesses much utility. It grows abundantly in these parts, having roots like unto large onions.

27. Anise likewise grows wild here in great abundance, and is a neat, clean-looking plant from six to twelve feet in hight. The seeds have been mostly gathered, or they have fallen to the earth.

28. The Scribe did also gather seeds of the oleander, which grows plentifully in this locality, and is even yet in blossom. To those friends who will write a nice letter to the Scribe, directed to Yokohoma, Japan, care of the Oriental Banking Corporation, he will be pleased to mail some of each of these seeds. He will also remark that tens of thousands of pink and white crocuses of small size are now springing up in abundance, presenting their beautiful, modest, little blossoms.

29. A short afternoon's ride brought the pilgrims to Kahn Minyeh, close by the side of the Lake of Galilee, and where a gushing spring springs up from the earth. Here we found the white tents were already pitched, and the pilgrims gladly alighted.

30. The pilgrims were now on very historical ground, if the gospel story can be considered historical. Here, where stands the camp, is said to be the site of Capernaum, and hard by is the land of Genesareth, so often mentioned. Here also, about this little lake, Jesus is said to have spent a considerable share of his ministry; here he chose Peter and John and James to be his disciples, and here he performed several miracles. Howbeit, there is another site for Capernaum, and the Scribe was again thrown into the same perplexity as to which is the true one.

31. The day was still warm, and the Scribe resolved that he would have a bath in the great Sea of Galilee, and he went apart along the coast and took a fine wash. The shore is lined with stones pretty well worn, though they still cut the feet not a little. He waded into the water on which Jesus is said to have walked, and in which Peter would have sunk had not the Master saved him; yes, here did the Scribe lie down and let the incoming waves (for the wind from the east was blowing briskly) of the Sea of Galilee pass over his prostrate form. The water was so warm as to be agreeable, and he greatly enjoyed the bath withal; and straightway all the pilgrims did likewise bathe in the same sacred waters.

32. The extreme length of the lake is twelve miles, and this is measuring from the longest points. The greatest width is six miles, and in some places not more than half that distance, and the waters near the shore are decidedly shallow. This indeed seems like a small body of water to call a sea, and for ships to be floating upon.

33. The Scribe wondered in his heart what kind of ships they could have been, where the timber was obtained to build them, and how much business they could have found carrying freight the enormous distance of eight or ten miles. In view of all this, the Scribe did speak in this wise: Of a truth this country has been vastly overrated. If this little pond is a sea, then a ship should not be much larger than a wash-tub; and if all the events named in the story were in proportion, the whole thing must truly have been a small-potato affair.

34. The river Jordan, a turbulent, muddy stream, enters the lake through something like a gorge at the northeastern extremity, and passes out again at the southern end of the lake, a clear and passive stream, and thence flows through the valley of the Jordan to the Dead Sea, sixty miles or more to the south.

35. It is a fact worthy of note that the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan are nearly seven hundred feet lower than the Mediterranean; so that if a canal, as has been talked of, should be cut through, all this Jordan valley would be deeply submerged, but some of the surrounding country would doubtless be improved.

36. El Ghuweir, or the Little Ghor, is the ancient land of Genesareth. The meaning is supposed to be either Valley of the Flowers, or Gardens of the Prince. It is nearly three miles long, and in its greatest breadth nearly a mile, capable of making four or five good farms. This lies along by the side of the lake, and a considerable portion of it is not so stony but that it can be plowed. It now grows principally thistles, squills, oleanders, and a shrub that bears some resemblance to the willow. This is nearly all the good land there is near the Sea of Galilee.

37. This was a short day's ride, not over half a score and five miles.

CHAPTER IX.

MELCHISEDEC'S FOURTH VISIT.

1. And it came to pass, about the usual hour, on the fourth night, that the Venerable Visitor made his appearance, and said, Unless you have other wishes, we will continue the conversation where we left it at our last interview. To this the Scribe assented.

2. It matters very little, so far as the story of the Hebrews is concerned, whether there was such a man as Abraham is represented to be, or not; it matters very little whether he represented his wife to be his sister for gain, or supposed prudence, even after she had become nearly a hundred years of age;

3. It matters little whether he slept with his handmaids as wives; it matters little now whether he attempted to offer up his young son Isaac as a sacrifice to his god Yahweh; it matters little whether he took six fresh wives after he became one hundred and twenty-five years old and raised a good-sized family; and even though these things were not so, it would scarcely be worth the while to correct the statements; but there are portions of the narrative which I will take the trouble to point out.

4. The parts representing that Abraham held conversation with Yahweh face to face, or in any other way, and that they entered into a contract and made bargains upon any subject whatever, is entirely false. No man held any conversation with any god at any time or in any country. Such tales are just as true of Jupiter or Odin as they are of Yahweh or Brahma, and it is the extreme of silliness to relate them for the purpose of inducing men to believe them, and it is worse than silliness for people who pretend to have good sense to spend their time over such frivolous falsehoods.

5. No God who has ever been devised has ever spoken a word either to man or to another god. They are dumb as the grave; and every time it is said in any book, or by any person, that the gods or any god have spoken, a falsehood of the deepest dye is told.

6. It would possibly answer for man in his childhood age to amuse himself in relating such stories, to see if he could induce other childish men and women to believe him, but it is very poor business, in this advanced age of the human race, for men to occupy themselves in this sort of exercise.

7. It may be pardonable for insane people and those of very weak, unbalanced minds to give themselves up somewhat to vagaries of this kind, even to the extent that Yahweh has commanded them to take the life of a dear little child, but it is the hight of culpable absurdity for people of sound mind to delude themselves in that way.

8. As a matter of fact, I will state that the story of Abraham is mythical; there was never such a person who was the father of the Jewish race. The story of him was not written for many hundred years after the time assigned to him, and the person who wrote it did not know whether there was such a man or not. He was practically a borrowed idea, taken from Brahma, of India; the name is nearly the same, an A being prefixed to the beginning and two letters transposed.

9. Brahma was the father of the gods of the Hindoos, and consequently of the faithful of that land. As Abraham was a copy, he was also the father of the faithful of Jewry. Sarai was also a change of the name of Saravasti, the prominent goddess of the Hindoos.

10. The book of Genesis, in which the story of Abraham appears, is pretended to have been written by Moses, together with the four books that follow called the Pentateuch; but a more false statement could not be made. Moses never wrote a word of them, nor were they written in the time when Moses was said to have lived. A candid examination will convince any reasonable person that this assertion is true.

11. In the first place, in those books are recorded the death and burial of Moses; he certainly could not have written that; if he did, he was wholly unlike all other persons who have ever lived. And the expression, in speaking of his grave, No man knoweth of his sepulcher till this day, clearly implies that the account was not written till a long time subsequent to the event; under any other condition the expression would be an absurd one.

12. Again, in speaking of Moses, it says in one of the books of the Pentateuch, There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses. A sensible person can hardly believe that a man would speak in that way of himself, even if the form of the expression did not unmistakably convey the idea that the narration was written long subsequent to the event. If a man should write thus of himself, he would be a person unfit to be believed.

13. The passage in Genesis xxxvi, 31, And these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel, clearly shows that that book was not written until kings had reigned in Israel, which would bring the time down nearly a thousand years. It can hardly be conceived possible that any person would mention the kings of Israel before there had been any to mention.

14. The expression again in Numbers xii, 3, Now this man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were on the face of the earth, could not possibly have been written by the man himself, unless he was the veriest braggart and boaster that ever lived. A man who could speak of himself in that manner would be incapable of writing a truthful account of anything.

15. In Exodus xvi, 35, it reads thus: And the children of Israel did eat manna forty years, until they came to a land inhabited; they did eat manna until they came to the borders of the land of Canaan. Now, as the statement is made that Moses got very old and died before the children of Israel reached the borders of the land of Canaan, he certainly could not write what they did after he was dead and buried. The blindest devotee should be able to see that.

16. In Deuteronomy iii, 11, is this language: For only Og, king of Bashan, remained of the remnant of giants; behold, his bedstead was a bedstead of iron; is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon? Nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the breadth of it, after the cubit of a man. To say nothing of the positive falsehood that a man ever lived who required a bedstead eighteen feet long and eight feet wide, it is only necessary to note the impossibility of Moses having been the writer of this statement, for in his day nothing was known of the Israelites of Rabbath, for it was not taken till David's time, when his general Joab, as stated in 2 Samuel xii, 26, fought against Rabbath of the children of Ammon, and took the royal city. The most superficial should be able to see that Moses could not have written anything about Rabbath of Ammon, and it could not have been written till at least four hundred years after Moses was dead.

17. In Deuteronomy ii, is this: The Horims also dwelt in Seir beforetime; but the children of Esau succeeded them, when they had destroyed them, and dwelt in their stead; as Israel did unto the land of his possession which the Lord gave unto them. This, of course, refers to events after the Israelites had possession of the land of Canaan, and clearly could not have been written by Moses, who died before the land was so possessed. To believe that Moses was able to write out the history of what occurred hundreds of years after his death, is what has to be done to accept him as the author of the Pentateuch.

18. In Deuteronomy xxiv, 14, is this: Thou shalt not oppress a hired servant that is poor and needy, whether he be of thy brethren, or of the strangers that are in thy land within thy gates. The same remarks are applicable to this; the passage was written after the Israelites had a land to possess—after they needed to employ laborers—and could not therefore have been written by Moses.

19. In the same book, chapter iii, 14, is this: Jair, the son of Manasseh, took all that country of Argob, unto the coasts of Geshuri and Maachathi, and called them after his own name, Bashan-havoth-jair, unto this day. This was written as historical, and after the events had transpired, and not as prophetical, before they occurred, and hence Moses could not have been the writer. The expression, Unto this day, shows that the writing was not done till a long time after—probably hundreds of years.

20. Leviticus xviii, 24, 28, reads in this way: Defile not yourselves in any of these things . . . . that the land vomit not you out also as it vomited forth the nations which were before you. Can any sensible person believe this was written before the Israelites reached the land of Canaan?

21. In Genesis xi, 15, is this, For I was stolen out of the land of the Hebrews. The same remarks also apply to this. It was written after the Hebrews had a land, and could not have been done by Moses. It is preposterous to think that he wrote about what was stolen out of the land that was not acquired until after his death.

22. Genesis xxiii, 2, reads thus: And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba, the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan. The name Hebron was not given to that place till after the country was occupied by the Israelites. Moses never wrote that name.

23. Genesis xxxv, 19, reads thus: And Rachel died and was buried in the way to Ephrath, which is Bethlehem. The twenty-seventh verse reads: And Jacob came unto the city of Arbah, which is Hebron. As the names Bethlehem and Hebron were not in existence until after the Israelites occupied the land, the passages using those names could not have been written by Moses.

24. The allusion made to the city of Dan in Genesis xiv, 14, proves conclusively that the book could not have been written by Moses, for there was no Dan until after the Israelites entered the land of Canaan and took the place where the city of Dan was afterward located. Men are not apt to write about cities, or even to mention these names, when they are not in existence. If they should do such things they would thereby prove themselves utterly untruthful.

25. In Exodus xxxviii, 8, looking-glasses are spoken of. As looking-glasses were unknown until hundreds of years after Moses was no more, he could hardly have written about them. I have mentioned but a part of the passages of this kind that might be cited (and these have been alluded to by others), but I have introduced enough to show conclusively that Moses did not write the books of the Pentateuch, and that there is not the slightest probability that they were written for several hundred years after the time when Moses is claimed to have lived, and more than a thousand years after the time assigned to Abraham.

26. Just consider for a moment the igno[rance] the progenitors of the Jews thirty-five hu[ndred] four thousand years ago, when it is said [ther]

[informed] baseless [fab]em a mo-

Abraham lived—not one man in a thousand could write, and no history of those times was written. Nearly fifteen hundred years after the time when Abraham is said to have lived and to have entered into a contract with Yahweh about a quantity of real estate here in Syria, a desire was felt by certain ambitious people to get up a sort of national history, and the job was attempted by persons who knew nothing of who had lived fifteen hundred years previous, or of the events that had occurred so long before. It is, perhaps, hardly strange, then, that in what was written the imagination and invention of the writers were brought into exercise much as is the case with our romance writers of the present day; and, as I have said before, ancient romances are no truer than modern ones.

27. As, then, Abraham was only a myth, and had no real existence, the same is true of Isaac and Jacob; they are also mythical characters. No such persons as described in the Jewish scriptures under those names ever lived. Even if it is admitted for a moment that those men lived, the writers of the books named had no possible means of knowing anything about them, save what might possibly be handed down by tradition, and all must see how utterly unreliable that would be with an ignorant and barbarous people after a period of fifteen hundred years had elapsed.

28. If Jacob did not exist, neither did his sons; they were simply a creation to take the place of, or to represent, the twelve signs of the zodiac, which had an important place in nearly all the religious systems older than that of the Jews. The sons of Jacob were simply a borrowed idea from other and more intelligent nations. This assertion may not be credited by many who all their lives have given credence to these old myths referred to, but it is nevertheless strictly true.

29. I must also spoil another pretty tale, or rather a series of them. The story in the Bible about seventy of the descendants going into Egypt and remaining there some two hundred and fifteen years, in which time, though under severe oppression, they had increased to be three millions of people (which number they must have reached to turn out six hundred thousand men able to bear arms and go into battle) is wholly mythical. No such event ever occurred. It is only a part of the romance which the Jewish writers were so ingenious as to devise.

30. It has been correctly stated that the Egyptians were a people who made record in their rock temples, on their monuments, and on papyrus, of all the notable events which occurred in their country, even to the products of their farms, and their poultry-yards. This being the case, to conceive that a people should dwell in their country over two hundred years, in which time they reached the number of some three milllons; that when they decided to depart from the country and the Egyptian king saw fit to detain them, the most unheard-of calamities fell upon the country, among which was the turning of the river Nile and all the rest of the water in the country into blood; frogs overrunning the country in such a terrible manner as to get into the kitchens, the kneading-troughs, and everywhere else; lightning and hail killing all vegetation and nearly all animal life, and this in a country where it rarely ever lightens and where hail never falls; locusts in immense swarms eating up all the vegetation after the hail and fire had killed it; a perfect avalanche of lice; a most destructive murrain among the cattle, which killed them all; the first-born of all the families of the land, from the king down to the humblest, killed in one night; and, finally, that when three millions of servile people really left, the Red Sea opened and let them pass through on dry and solid ground; and when the king of Egypt and all his hosts, with horses and chariots (the horses had, however, been killed from one to three times before), rushed in after the escaping people, the waters closed back upon them and drowned them every one—to suppose all this could occur and the intelligent and learned people of Egypt have no kind of record of it, and say nothing about it in their history, is to suppose the most egregious monstrosity true that ever was imagined. No such event ever took place; it is all a romance.

31. I restate it, the Hebrews never lived in Egypt; they never made brick there; the plagues of Egypt never took place; that vast army of men, women, and children never got out of Egypt in one night; the Red Sea never parted its water in the manner described; the king of Egypt and all his army were not drowned. All, all is a fiction.

32. The remarkably meek man Moses is also a myth. It is not true that he was adopted by a daughter of the king of Egypt after being fished out of the water. Moses, the lawgiver, was merely a copy gotten up after the pattern of Menu, the lawgiver of India; Menes, the lawgiver of Egypt; and Minos, the law-giver of Greece. These were all believed in and had a reputation long before the story of Moses was written.

33. The story of the children of Israel roaming for forty years through the desert between Egypt and the land of Canaan in accomplishing a journey which could have been performed in a few days, and their living on manna all that time, with all the other impossible events which were said to have transpired in the two years (for there are thirty-eight of the forty years concerning which there is no account given) is all mythical, all romance, all false. Not a word of it is true.

34. The prolonged details about Moses having interviews with Yahweh; about the terrible fireworks on Mount Sinai; about the engraving of the tables of stone; about Moses obtaining a view of Yahweh's back parts, are all romance, all positively untrue. As I have said before, no god has ever held conversation with man, and no man has ever held a personal interview with a god. Whenever a statement has been made that gods and men have talked together, and that men have seen the gods and heard them speak, a falsehood has been uttered. No matter how plausible the story; no matter how much poetry is woven into the tale; no matter how much sanctity is wrapped around it, it is all a lie; and, as I said, religious lies are the worst of all.

35. I have, however, said enough for this time. I shall have more to say to thee on the occasion of future visits, and do not wish to weary thee or thy readers too much at a time. I will now leave thee to thy reflections and to sweet repose. Good-night.

36. The Scribe reverently bade the Venerable Visitor good-night, with thanks; and his sleep that night was so sweet that in the morning he could hardly realize that he had had a visitor at all.

CHAPTER X.

FIFTH DAY'S JOURNEY.—BETHSAIDA, CHORAZIN, MAGDALA, AND TIBERIAS.

1. And it came to pass on the morning of the twenty-fifth day of the month, when the savory viands of the Ethiopian had been judiciously disposed of, and all the pilgrims were seated in their saddles, that the captain of the host led them up the shores of the Sea of Galilee to the sites of the towns of Bethsaida and Chorazin, so noted in gospel story.

2. But it must be confessed that there is here again more uncertainty as to the localities, for two or more sites are claimed for each town; but the glorious privilege of taking choice still remains. Peradventure it does not make a world of difference if we do not get all the places rightly located; so if we take the country all in, the main thing is accomplished.

3. At the upper town we saw the remains of what is called an old synagogue; but as there were images and figures carved upon the stone, the Scribe thought it more likely to be the ruins of a temple under Roman auspices, as the Jewish law prohibits any kind of representations being cut in stone. Howbeit the blocks of cut stones are now lying around in considerable numbers.

4. Hard by the ruins a family of Bedouins reside in their tent, and the pilgrims walked down to see the women making and baking bread. One was mixing the dough in a large copper pan, and another was rolling it out in very thin slices and spreading the same upon convex sheet-iron, under which a slight fire was kindled. The dough is rolled so thin that a small fire suffices to do the baking. Two or three stone huts and a tent or two are all that are left.

5. The females, as do nearly all the Bedouin women, have their lower lips, their faces, and their hands, tattooed, or stained with some dye that makes their uncomeliness much increased, until it seemeth strange that any man could fall in love with them withal.

6. As remarked, this is the locality, here about this lake, where Jesus is said to have performed many of his mighty works. He is said to have pronounced woes upon those towns around the lake, saying it would be better for Tyre and Sidon in the day of judgment, where such works had not been performed.

7. It was in these waters that the remarkable haul of fish was made. It was here that Peter was directed by Jesus to catch a fish out of whose mouth a coin was taken with which to pay the tax. In fact, the pilgrims were shown one of the same kind of fish, and the Christians at Tiberias keep small ones of the same kind for sale. Of course they are holy.

8. It is claimed that it was near this lake that the famous Sermon on the Mount was delivered, and that near it the five thousand were fed with the five loaves and two fishes. Truly there are mounts enough hereabouts on which many sermons might be preached, but it would now be a very difficult feat to perform, to feed five thousand hungry Syrians and Bedouins with five loaves and two small fishes, and it could be done now as easily as ever it could.

9. From what was called a ship Jesus is said to have delivered to a large audience on the shore one of his memorable discourses. Verily the ship must have been smaller than those which traverse the Atlantic, or he must have spoken with a very loud voice to be heard, for the waters are so shallow a long way from shore that a boat of much size could not come within a furlong of it.

10. It was in this neighborhood that Jesus is said to have performed the Dr. Tanner feat of going forty days without eating, but where he found the wilderness to do his fasting in no man knoweth. Which hill round about was called an exceeding high mountain, which the devil took Jesus to, and from which he was able to see all the kingdoms of the earth, the Scribe is unable to state.

11. The highest mountain anywhere about is Hermon, and that is differently described as being ten and twelve thousand feet above the sea. On clear days from the top of it one can see seventy-five miles, or possibly a hundred; but that view takes in but very few of the kingdoms of the earth, and leaves out all the important ones. The Scribe fears that statement is not strictly correct.

12. Josephus tells about fighting in a naval and land battle near the upper end of Lake Genesareth, or the Sea of Galilee, in which he had the misfortune to be thrown from his horse and receive a wound which caused his defeat. But Josephus never heard of the marvelous works which Jesus performed hereabouts. It does not look now hereabouts as though twenty men could be raised to fight any kind of a battle. There are no more ships, and very few men.

13. It was the will of the pilgrims to take a ride upon the Sea of Galilee, but the wind had blown from the east so briskly that the owner of the single old boat on the lake deemed it unsafe to venture out, especially as there is no one here now who can quiet the tempest and still the waves. So the boat ride had to be abandoned, and the pilgrims mourned greatly.

14. The ground was retraced to the place of camping, and the pilgrims continued their journey through Genesareth to Magdala, where they stopped to lunch.

15. This is the spot celebrated as the birthplace of Mary Magdalene, a young woman who was unwise in her love affairs, and did not succeed in building up a first-class reputation. Many since have done similarly, and not a hundredth part so much said about it. The very spot is pointed out where the house stood in which she was born, but one spot answers just as well as another. Mary has done nothing amiss for eighteen hundred and fifty years. Let her be remembered kindly.

16. Directly on the opposite side of the lake are the ruins of Gergesa, or the country of the Gergesenes, where Jesus is said to have cast a lot of devils out of two wild men who lived among the tombs, and which he gave permission to enter some two thousand swine that were feeding hard by, and who thereupon rushed headlong down a steep place into the sea and were drowned.

17. It never has been satisfactorily explained whether there were two thousand devils in these two unfortunate men, or whether one devil was able to get into two thousand hogs at the same time, but it seems they were drowned all the same.

18. To the Scribe the affair has seemed as not only a hoggish trick, but as an unfair transaction; if the owner of the hogs was ever paid the value of the pork no record was made of it, and the inference is that not a cent was handed over, inasmuch as Jesus was requested to leave those coasts. It is not singular that such a desire was felt.

19. There are, however, a few discrepancies about this devil and hog story a little difficult to reconcile with an infallible account. Matthew says there were two of the men who had all those devils in them, while Luke insists that one only contained them. Matthew says the affair happened in the land of the Gergesenes, while Luke and John say it was the land of the Gadarenes, a different place; and, what makes it worse, no tombs have been found at either place which the men with devils in them could have made their stopping-place.

20. With equal differences, Dr. Thomson points out Gergesa as the steep place where the swine ran down into the sea, because there is no other place that answers the description; while the Bible dictionary states that the place was a town in Moab called Gadara, now Um Keis, some distance away, where the swine would be under the necessity of taking a hard gallop of two hours to reach the sea. They must have had a large quantity of devil in them to cause them to do that. The Scribe does not undertake to settle the disagreement between the evangelists and the good men who undertake to tell what they meant. Should he attempt to settle all these disagreements he would have more to do than he could attend to.

Prof. Huggins's Prayer.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since we hav a revised decalog, it would be proper, no doubt, to present to the Liberal public a revised "Lord's prayer." I offer the following as a substitute, hoping it will meet the approval of your many readers.

L. E. H.

THE LORD'S PRAYER REVISED.

Our mother and father who are everywhere! We strive to comprehend thee. Thy kingdom is universal, thy will is ever done throughout space. We desire to work for our daily bread. We want to pay our debts, and desire our debtors to pay us. Thou leadest none into temptation, and did we but comprehen[illegible] thee, we could avoid evil. We strive for the beautiful, the true, the just, evermore. Amen.

The Wonderful Advantages of Soft Money.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been very much interested of late in the financial problem, so I will giv you a few thoughts upon that very important question. Mr. J. H. Wood, of Detroit, Mich., in his letter printed January 28th, comes the nearest of any one to my ideas, only he does not go far enough.

Among other good things he says:

"For many years past the head-line to one column of the Irish World has read, 'Usury is Theft.' This is plain sense, to my mind, and the only way to stop interest, or usury, is for the government to pay its own debt and supply its people with a full legal-tender money in sufficient amount to pay all debts at once, and hav no necessity to borrow. If this were so, there would not be so many men in this country claiming more wealth than many millions of their fellow-men. The government that will not supply its people with money of its own creation, made a full legal tender, in sufficient amount to pay all debts and save all interest, is unworthy of support from the laborers, or respect from any one."

If the government would make all our money paper money, and a full legal tender, we would not need in the arts one-quarter of the gold and silver in the land. This would break up most of our large mining corporations, who now absorb so much time, labor, and capital, all of which could go into other and more useful industries. With enough greenback money in the country to pay off all debts, public and private, we would be able to do all business on a cash basis; we would not need any lawyer to collect debts, as there would be no trust, consequently no debt—all would be cash. But the bankers who now rob the people by charging interest on the money that costs them nothing, will say in reply: "The price of labor and all commodities is measured by the gross amount of money. Now, if wheat is worth $1.30 per bushel with say one billion of money in the country, if you increase that amount to ten billions wheat will go up in price several hundred per cent." Well, what if it does, will not the farmer get just so much more for his toil, and will he not be able therefore to pay his hired man ten or fifteen dollars per day while he now starves him on one dollar? But, says the banker, who now sits in his easy-chair while other people's money is at work for him nights and Sundays, "After a while wheat, labor, and every commodity will rise in value so that it will be just as hard to earn the price of a bushel of wheat in greenbacks as it now is to earn $1.30 in gold at the present price." This would be true if we stopped the printing-presses and made no more money—and this is the fatal point in limited greenbackism—but I would propose a continual issue of government paper money, enough to fill every demand of trade, so that there could be no stop, no dull times, no dull trade. This would check overproduction; as we would all be out of debt and hav money to spare, it would be easier in many cases to buy than to produce.

We would not hav to work one-quarter of the time we now do, which would giv us all an opportunity to study finance, and improve our minds. We would hav no government taxes to pay, as there would be no government debt; no local taxes, because all improvements would be paid for in cash. All government expenses could be paid by the government in paper money, which would cost comparativly nothing, and would answer every purpose of coin, if the use of coin was discontinued by law, and full legal-tender paper money was placed in its stead.

"But," says hard-money Shylock, "foreign nations would not take our greenbacks." That is just what we want; if they refuse our paper money, we shall hav just so much more in this country to use. It is no advantage to us to export our tools of trade while we need them at home.

Again the worshiper of the golden calf will object, saying, "If all our money is paper money, when a man wants to go abroad he will hav to pay a high price for coin or bullion to use in other countries." So much the better; he will spend his greenbacks here, and our stock of money will not be depleted as it now is by every traveler who leaves our shores.

When we buy more abroad than we hav goods to sell we must now pay the balance of trade in coin, and a large part of our money leaves the country; but if we had nothing but paper money we should not buy more abroad than we hav goods to pay for, and all our money would consequently remain at home. Yes, Mr. Editor.

When we drive the lazy bankers out of their easy-chairs and into industrial pursuits by an unlimited issue of full legal-tender greenbacks, there will be no more fifty-million-dollar estates, no more poor or work-houses, but all will be on an equality financially.

There will be no incentiv to accumulate more than one's pro rata share, for there will be no debt, and greenbacks will draw no interest. Each and every one will hav enough money, and all will be financially satisfied.

Yours for unlimited greenbacks,

Soft Money.

Cheering.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Those Liberals who form their opinions of Spiritualism mainly from the scurrility of the secular press hav but a slight knowledge of what various planes of thinkers the subject embraces. Having myself been an examiner of its peculiar phases for many years, and a listener to the various conclusions expressed by its converts, I feel impressed to drop you a few lines.

Some converts, strongly evangelical in their early teachings, hav really a hard time of it. Taking the Bible for a starting-point, they are inclined to measure everything by its dictum; a Catholic from his credal standpoint; a Universalist from his; a Presbyterian from his; an Israelite from his; a Quaker from his; an Atheistic Materialist (if he can be prevailed upon to examin the subject at all) from his rather captious analytic standard. Thus Spiritualism embraces a curious admixture of thinkers who by frequent intercourse with each other beget a fellowship which has a Liberalizing tendency on the mass; but yet, heaven be praised! no credal or priestly organization.

I hav noted another curious fact, that it is far easier to make a convert of an out-and-out analytic skeptic by the presentation of facts and intelligence than of a professed religionist. With the former, corroborativ intelligence and phenomenal facts are all that he needs. Not so with the Bible credist; he has a severe struggle. Having been early indoctrinated with the terrors of orthodoxy, and the belief that the devil and his emissaries can take any shape and complexion to deceive the very elect and circumvent poor humanity; they approach the quiet, philosophic circle of sitters with holy trepidation and tiptoe solemnity!

In a recent article in a prosperous Spiritual journal it was remarked that "Spiritualists should cultivate the most kindly feelings toward skeptical Materialistic lecturers. They were essential co-workers in the advancing army of thinkers, who, with their merciless scythes and grubbing-hooks among the briers and brambles of superstition and priestcraft, prepare the ground for the seed of living truths."

From my long observation of Spiritual facts and intelligences I cannot but take the same view as the above-mentioned writer of progressiv unfoldment. It should matter nothing to the Spiritualist what are the utterances of such bold but honest writers and lecturers as Wakeman, Underwood, Chainey, and Elmina. Let them fulminate and amuse themselvs heartily with the ridiculous aspects of some of our spirit messages and so-called delusions and surprising phenomena! These Liberals are generally learned, honest, energetic, and logical; and if they hav not had the same opportunity to learn what we know, who would thank them to play the hypocrit?

Speaking from my Spiritual standpoint, I hav the assurance from advanced spirit intelligences that mortals who from untoward circumstances or for want of opportunity leave this rudimental sphere in a state of moral degradation, sensuality, and ignorance hav of necessity to seek every avenue of instruction and resume their neglected education should they aspire to higher elevation in their future home.

The skeptic may desire it, and prate about the prospectiv luxury of an "eternal sleep," but I can safely assure all such they cannot take this eternal snooze should they by suicide attempt it. Belief or unbelief has nothing to do with our position in spirit life—Spiritualist or skeptic. It is knowledge and the practice of humanitarian labors. Hence when any of our humanitarian liberators and bold thinkers, like Messrs. Bennett, Ingersoll, Wakeman, and Elmina, hav lived the "lease of nature," hav recovered from their agreeable surprise and had their private chuckle at the knowledge of immortality, this universal legacy to man, it will be found that their labors hav not been fruitless. Nor will they wonder when appealed to by sensual popes, bishops, and cramped-minded men of God—mayhap the shameless Anthony himself—for a lift in the way of purity and moral honesty.

The Vaccination of Immigrants.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Many English inquirers as to the utility and physical effects of vaccination hav been astonished to find that efforts are being made to induce the authorities in the United States to legislate with a view to making the practice compulsory in that country, especially upon immigrants on landing in America from countries in which it has long been enforced, all of whom must therefore hav already been vaccinated. Whether there exists any political motiv—i. e., a desire to repress such immigration, we cannot tell. But before any such high-handed measure is adopted by Congress, I trust that President Arthur and his cabinet, in the interest of the people of the states themselvs, will apply through their ambassador to the British foreign office to be furnished with the official documents mentioned below, and refer the same for strict critical examination and report by some judicial legal authority accustomed to sift and weigh evidence.

With reference to the report of the committee of the House of Commons in 1871, it will be found on reference to Hansard's reports that such committee was granted only after the expressed intimation that no doubt as to the value and importance of vaccination could possibly be awakened thereby, and consequently such members as were considered safe were nominated to serve thereon. Nevertheless one at least of those members has, from his subsequent inquiries, completely reversed the opinions he then held on this question. The principal witnesses examined on the government side, also, were salaried medical members of the vaccination department which should be borne in mind by the judicial examiner in summing up the real import of the entire evidence.

Is It Special Providence?

It will be remembered by the readers of Truth Seeker that about two years ago, when bills were posted for a lecture at Irwin's Sta Westmoreland Co., Pa., by B. F. Underwood, clergy of that place heartily denounced the lect and all his kind, admonishing their congregat to use any means to prevent his speaking.

The final result was that Wm. Crookston, A. Bowser, and B. F. Underwood were arrested ar taken before the Westmoreland county court thereby involving heavy expenses on their side.

But here comes a reverse. The Rev. Mr. K pastor of the Baptist church at that place, himself very conspicuous in the cause of Chri lending his time and tongue against the Irwin erals, so much so that his church became inv in debt to such an extent that it had to be s sheriff's sale. Mr. Crookston was the pur and now it is a paying institution by the na Crookston's Opera House.

But to return to Mr. Knox. He sought fields of labor, but none seemed to prosper his influence. Two weeks ago he resigne charge of the flock of the little stone chur Weaver's Old Stand, in the same county, to into the world and earn his bread by the sw his brow, as his congregation could raise h more salary. He has become a book agent, the "Life of President Garfield," whose ortl is questionable and who was a Republican in p which is in antagonism to the political views Knox, who is a very strong Democrat.

But, what was my surprise on returning fr daily toil on last evening, to find that Mr. Kn put up at my house for the night, and was ask hospitality. Although I do not keep a public I long ago made up my mind never to send tramp away hungry so long as I had a c divide. But how times change human affai once orthodox bully in two short years shelter of out-spoken Infidels, while wa as a vagrant in the same county in which he bitterly assailed them; while his opponent Mr ston has become a wealthy merchant! Can special providence?

H. L. Green's Lecture Trip.

To the Editor of The Truth Seek

On the 9th of the present month I started my second lecture trip, and am pleased wherever I go that the interest in Freethou tions is increasing. A number of circumsta recently transpired that hav stimulated th that direction. The public generally has discussion in the North American Revie Col. Ingersoll and Judge Black, and has how thoroughly the great defender of orth vanquished. Then the Garfield prayer shaken the faith of many in the efficacy And Guiteau's deity dodge has done much faith in divine inspiration.

The first town I visited was Meadville, there enjoyed the hospitality of Joseph Y your subscribers, and an especial frie Truth Seeker. Meadville is a very su town, and there are but few outspoken Libe A number of Freethought lectures hav ered in Meadville, but Mr. York always most of the expenses. I was glad to heeler's name to your subscription list. The Unirians hav a theological university here, but as it neither orthodox nor Liberal, it has but little effect upon the sentiment of the community.

At Greenville, Pa., I enjoyed a short, pleasant visit with Dr. David Edgar, a great admirer of Mr. nnett. He informed me he had just visited THE UTH SEEKER office, and was soon going to engage selling THE TRUTH SEEKER publications. As the tor is a very energetic man I think he will succed. Here Mr. W. Washburne consented to take E TRUTH SEEKER four months on trial. I pret he will become a permanent subscriber.

I was much pleased with the Liberals of Warren, o, and I think they will soon organize a Liberal gue there. I was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. F. Reilly—most admirable people. Mr. Reilly e from Catholicism to Protestantism, and then reethought. He says since he landed on the foundation of Freethought he has enjoyed life e never did before. Here I made the acquaintof Duncan McLaren, James H. Smith, Mr. and Charles Van Wormer, and James Boyes, all e-awake Liberals. Mr. Duncan McLaren, the oad ticket-agent, is one of the best read men I met for many a day.

The next town I visited was Youngstown, Ohio, e I lectured Sunday afternoon before the new ral League just organized there. This League t a few months old, but bids fair to be of the best Leagues in existence. The officers O. P. Wharton, editor of the Daily Journal , president; Griffith S. Williams, secretary; Thomas Cohan, treasurer. Mr. J. A. Wright, oungstown, is one of the most activ workers in vineyard" in the state of Ohio. He is a good ker, and proposes to enter the lecture field soon. e he may meet with abundant success.

om Youngstown I went to Akron, and on my stopped an hour at Ravenna, and was pleased ke by the hand C. S. Curtis, one of your friends subscribers.

ere are many intelligent Liberals in Akron, but lack organization, and some person with the ssary qualifications to get up meetings. Here I Judge S. W. McClure, ex-Gov. Edgerton, H. eath, W. C. Allen, J. J. Hall, Z. C. Jones, J. H. William Buchtel, S. M. Wilson, and C. C. om, all of our household of faith, and all leadtizens of Akron.

ile at Akron I received an invitation from as Sharp to lecture in Salem, Ohio, and I spoke a large and intelligence audience in that on Sunday evening last. For many years has been a stronghold of Infidelity, and I was d to take by the hand there those live and re- Freethinkers, Messrs. J. B. and F. Purdy, Elihinery, and Thomas Sharp. On the followonday evening I lectured in Peninsula, Ohio, to e audience in the town hall. Mr. Erastus n, a man of property and standing, and a lifereethinker, invited me there. With the exn of a lecture given in that town by W. S. me years since, this was the only lecture of d ever delivered in Peninsula And I never audience that gave better attention. At the f my talk of two hours and a half, William l, the lawyer of the place, rose and expressed iration for the lecture, and offered a resolut the speaker be invited to return at his earonvenience and deliver another lecture. This, se, was gratifying to your correspondent.

ext lecture was delivered last Thursday even- Grafton, Ohio. The lecture was arranged s. Maria Pierce and Mrs. R. W. Hinkley, ritualist ladies, and I never before met two f more energy and perseverance. They first for each of the churches, and, when refused, r the school-house; and when they failed ey engaged a hall in one of the hotels. They ith pencil, wrote out handbills, and put them nd town, and notified almost every one in the by word of mouth. When the evening of re came the rain was falling in torrents, but standing the hall was well filled, and I think ral cause has been inaugurated in Grafton.

adies now propose to hav lectures there at e a month, which fact I desire to bring to tion of our Liberal lecturers. I hope Mr. ellogg, who livs not far off, will soon visit advertised to speak in the opera house in morrow (Sunday) evening, and our Liberal e at work to-day to make it a success. ER written to President Williams, of Yale, Watts, has just been discovered, in which he ring to the doctrin of the Trinity, "All the ns I hav yet seen do still leave great darkness upon it." Although the old man had great faith and firmly believed in the Trinity, he could not reconcile it with reason, and could only hope that light would break in upon him when "Christ's kingdom" came. That contingency not occurring in his day, he went to his grave without knowing how three could be one. A good many men will go down before that "divine" mystery is solved. What a pity God could not hav been a little clearer in his mathematics; or rather, what a pity it is that intelligent men will muddle their brains over the idiotic salvation scheme of barbarous ignorance!

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 71.

819. Again, Jesus is said to have given these commands: "Therefore I say unto you, take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Behold the fowls of the air; they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns. Consider the lilies how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin. Take no thought, saying, what shall we eat? what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed? Take therefore no thought for the morrow; for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I am sure no pagan teacher ever gave such foolish instructions, and never laid down a code of rules so utterly subversive of human prosperity and well-being of life. If men and women took no thought for the morrow; if they made no provision for the future; if in youth and the days of their strength they provided not for old age and debility; if in summer they laid up no stores for winter, when nothing can grow, they would not only be reduced to the lowest degree of savagism, but they would absolutely perish with the severities of a winter climate, or starve to death for the want of food. What makes civilization superior to savagism is the foresight, the provision for future needs, the cares of parents for the coming needs of their offspring; the consideration of the necessities of coming generations. Without this wise preparation for the wants sure to arise we would be reduced to a wretched degree of mendicancy, starvation, and death. I submit that the fowls of the air and the lilies of the field are very poor models for men to pattern after—the first have to migrate at the commencement of cold weather to a distant southern clime, and the latter are killed down to the ground and every part of them that is exposed to the winter frosts is utterly destroyed. It is most absurd to teach that men should make no more provision for the approach of winter or the needs of the future than birds and lilies. The assertion that to-morrow will take thought for the things of itself is without truth or meaning. To-morrow makes no provision for anything, any more than the winter provides food and clothes for those who have followed Jesus's instruction and taken no thought for it.

820. In another place Jesus said: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I come not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his household." I cannot believe such a mission to be a good one. Whoever comes to spread dissension and quarrels between members of the family, between different families, and between nations—who comes to destroy peace and send the sword, bloodshed, and carnage—has certainly a very bad mission, and had far better not come at all. But judging him from the rigor and bloodthirstiness with which the followers of Jesus have used the sword and sent war, carnage, and wretchedness over the face of the earth; in view of the millions whose blood has been spilt by those who profess to follow him, of the millions of wives who have been made widows by those who claimed to do his bidding, the unnumbered millions of infants and children that have been rendered fatherless orphans by the admirers and worshipers of Jesus—it would seem that he had accomplished what he undertook—to destroy peace in the world, to send contention, war, and bloodshed, and that he had caused deadly feuds between brothers and sisters, between parents and children, between neighbors and friends, and between nations and peoples. Far better would it have been if such a bloody religion had never been preached or never been known in the world. I am sure none of the good old pagan sages and teachers ever taught such a bloody doctrine, or ever sent war, bloodshed, and carnage over the fair earth. This very fact shows the superiority of their morals and religions over those of Jesus.

821. On another occasion Jesus commanded his disciples to provide themselves with swords, and so earnest was he that they should be in possession of this bloody, life-destroying weapon, that he enjoined them, if they could not otherwise obtain the deadly weapon, to sell their garments and buy one. Swords they must have, whether they had a coat, or shirt, or not. Why should he be so persistent that they should have swords, unless it was to use them, to shed blood with them, to take life with them? If he did not mean this, his commands were foolish and meaningless. I insist that none of the old pagan sages ever taught such a horribly repugnant doctrine. None of them tried to destroy the peace of the world. None of them tried to induce men to provide themselves with deadly weapons, and with them to spill the blood of their fellow-beings. There is no question but what the introduction of Christianity in the world has been the cause of scores of millions of lives being taken, of scores of millions of wives being made widows, and hundreds of millions of children being turned upon a cold world without their natural protectors. No other religion in the world has such a bloody, murderous record! No, not all the other religions combined can equal it.

822. We read of Jesus taking with him on the Sabbath his disciples, and straying into a corn-field not his own, and plucking the corn, and authorizing his fellows to do the same. This was breaking two commandments at the same time—the first, not keeping the Sabbath holy. In the Old Testament we have an account of a man being put to death for simply picking up a few sticks on the Sabbath; Jesus did far worse than this, and deserved death more. Second, he took what did not belong to him, and that is stealing. The command is, "Thou shalt not steal." I am quite certain none of the old pagan sages would have set such an example.

823. In one place Jesus says that to be bathed in his blood washes away all sin; but in another place he contradicts this statement by declaring that those who speak against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven in this world nor in the world to come. One of these two statements must be a falsehood. And in this connection I am reminded of a heavenly tale written by a monk of the sixteenth century, illustrating the difficulties in fulfilling both these conditions laid down by Jesus. The account is reported by Coolridge; it runs in this wise: On a certain occasion a Christian, who fully believed, died; but, unfortunately, he had sinned against the Holy Ghost. When he went up to heaven's gate and wished to gain admittance, Peter, the gate-keeper, hesitated about letting him in. "I don't know," said he, "that you belong in here." The man replied, "I am a Christian, and believed in Jesus." "But," said Peter, "some of your conduct has not been quite up to the requirement." Just at this juncture the Son, who happened to be standing near, turned to Peter, and said, "Let the man come in; he has been washed in my blood." But, as bad luck would have it, the Holy Ghost was but a short distance away, and he resolutely spoke up and said, "That man cannot come in; he has sinned against me." Whereupon Jesus turned to the third member of the firm and remonstrated, "But don't you see, Holy Ghost, that I said that whosoever is washed in my blood, his sins shall be forgiven?" "Yes, yes," said the Holy Ghost; "but you also said that whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven, and that law must be observed. The man cannot enter." At this Jesus shrugged his shoulders, and, with compressed lips, said, "This is an outrage! It is a pretty state of things, indeed, after all I passed through, that my friends, who have been washed in my blood, cannot come in. If my friends are not permitted here I will not stay here myself." "Just as you please," coolly replied the Holy Ghost; "go, if you wish to." "I will speak to my mother about it." He soon met the Virgin, and told her how the Holy Ghost had treated him, and that he was going to leave. Like all affectionate mothers, the Virgin immediately took sides with her son, saying he was in the right, and if he went she would go too. Jesus then saw his disciples, told them of the row that had taken place, that he and his mother were about to leave, and he wanted them to go also. They promptly replied that they had faithfully followed him so far, and that they should continue to do so; wherever he went they would go also. Then he told them to see all they had converted, and all that the converts had converted, and get them to go along. He gave Peter a hint to see all his successors, the popes of Rome, and all the bishops, and get them to join the army of revolt, and they would run a strong opposition business. Peter said he would attend to it, and the result was all who had followed the Son and had been washed in his blood, and all who worshiped the Virgin, agreed to leave with them. In this way heaven was about to be seriously divided, fully half going off to set up by themselves. Soon the intelligence reached the ears of some of the higher angels, and they became very much alarmed, and said one to another: "This is a very bad business. If the Son, and the Virgin, the apostles, and the popes and bishops, leave, it will be too dull for us to stop here with the Holy Ghost and a few more, and we cannot stand it. Something must be done to stop this quarrel; what shall it be?" Gabriel said he would send for Joseph, the old carpenter, and see if something could not be done to mend the rupture. Joseph was duly consulted, and he thought he could see the contending parties, and show them the folly of such a quarrel, and get them to make up and be good friends again. And, to make a long story short, he saw both the Holy Ghost and his step-son, and told them that they were carrying this thing too far, and that they had better each yield a little, and have no division. Being very persuasive, he induced them to be good friends again, and the Holy Ghost graciously thought perhaps the man did not really intend to say much against him, and he would consent that he might come in. This peace-making service on the part of Joseph was not only duly appreciated in heaven, but by the faithful on earth as well; and after the pious monk made the matter known a large sum of money was raised to build a splendid church to Joseph. I cannot vouch for the truthfulness of the story, but it can at least be seen how bad it might be to have two laws, one conflicting with the other.

JAMES H. KNOWLTON, of Wheaton, Ill., gave the following reasons in his will why he did not wish any prayers said over him: "Sickness and disease hav the great portion of my life attended me with great fidelity, and I hav suffered much from pain that will cease, and when it does I urgently request that no prayer be made and that no sermon be preached or delivered over my remains by any one who professes to believe that there is an all-wise, all-powerful, and infinitly just being, who now is and always has been abundantly able to prevent human suffering and all wrong doing, but who does nothing and never has done anything to stay or diminish either."

Shall Freethinkers Swear on the Bible?

Our friend Henry Fuchs, of Sacramento, Cal., writes us as follows:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Two articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER—in your issue of January 7th, page 1, column 4, ("It is understood that Mr. Bradlaugh will appear," etc.); page 10, column 3, ("An Agnostic in Court")—involve the question of swearing on the Bible, one in the British Parliament, the other in a United States county court.

Now, this being a state law, I cannot see why a law-abiding citizen should not so swear. A Freethinker will tell the truth whether he swears on anything or not; therefore it does not matter whether he swears on the Bible or on a mule's tail. There are a number of laws which we do not consider good, but, nevertheless, we hav to take the consequences of breaking them.

A word from you, Mr. Editor, would certainly change the current of this false interpretation in swearing matters.

The above involves more than at first sight appears. First, it contains an error of fact. The article "An Agnostic in Court" has reference to an occurrence before a Canadian judge, not in a United States court, but geographical location does not affect the principle. It may at the moment seem of little importance whether an Infidel allows himself to be the victim of superstition, yet in the long run it is always best to protest against it. It is argued by all Freethinkers that the state should hav nothing to do with the church, yet every Bible that cumbers the court room is an evidence that the state is to that extent a partner of the church. It is going to take a good many protests on the part of unbelievers to remove this rag idol; and the sooner it is begun and vigorously kept up, the sooner will the state be separated from superstition.

The pains and penalties of perjury are quite sufficient for the purposes of the law. The Bible never kept a man from lying if he was inclined that way. A great many men hav been convicted of perjury, but we never heard of an Infidel who refused to take his oath upon the Bible being among the number. The policemen of this city afford a good illustration of Bible swearing. They are nearly all Irishmen, consequently nearly all Catholics; yet they tell an enormous number of lies in court. The Bible exercises no restraining power over them.

Mr. Bradlaugh's manly protest against swearing by a God he does not believe in has almost revolutionized English parliamentary methods. Even if he does not succeed in getting an affirmation bill passed, he has done an incalculable amount of good in calling public attention to the fact that there are thousands of people who reject the Bible both in court and out, and he has brought so much nearer the day when the law and the church will be no longer partners. The disestablishment of the English church will be the easier for the efforts he has made. In that way he has done a great good. Let every Freethinker in this country follow his example, and the years that the Jewish idol will disfigure our courts will be few. If we differ from our friend Fuchs, it is because we look farther ahead. We see, as President Madison said our revolutionary fathers did, "all the consequences in the principle, and avoid the consequences by denying the principle;" and with him we add, "We revere this lesson too much to forget it."

About Paine's Lithograph.

The orthodox people are getting very particular lately. They even question such small things as the genuinness of the portraits of Freethinkers, as the following card shows:

JACKSON, MICH., Jan. 22, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of the lithographs of Paine, Ingersoll, and our old hero, D. M. Bennett, and am well pleased with them. I can easily understand how you obtain the portraits of the last two, but am at some loss to know how you come to get a correct likeness of Paine. I was asked the question by a friend of the orthodox persuasion, and had to take a back seat, as I was not aware of his having had any likenesses taken during his life. Please post me and others through THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully, G. M. STANLEY.

The lithograph was taken from an oil painting by Jarvis, now belonging to Mr. Mendum, of the Investigator. It is the same as hangs beside the pictures of Voltaire and Kneeland in Paine Hall. The most carping Christian critic can find no fault with its authenticity. It may be a matter of news to some Christians that oil paintings and portraits are no new things. But we can assure them that over the life of Paine there hang no such misty doubts as enshroud the career of Jesus Christ. We hav seen hundreds of portraits of the latter imaginary individual, and no two were alike. If he existed at all he was a Jew, and consequently rather dark, like most orientals. Yet the great painters hav always delighted in making him a blonde. The most "authentic" picture of Christ represents him as a negro infant. By the way, how do our orthodox friends—especially the former slaveholders and their northern clerical supporters—like the idea of being "redeemed" through the merits of an African who, thirty years ago, might hav died under the lash administered by their own hand instead of upon a cross?

An "Original Quotation."

A friend of ours way down in Maine has been to church, and he wants to know where the preacher gets his texts. He is in trouble and desires us to help him:

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: To-day, while listening to a very earnest sermon by a young minister, I found my scriptural knowledge, which had been cultivated with diligence for many a year, put to a decided shame (as it seems to me at any rate). He gave a quotation thus, "I am the God full of paps," and repeated it several times, then urged his hearers to come to God that they may never more hunger or want. I cannot find the quotation at all in the Bible, and am inclined to suppose it a marginal rendering of some passage. Can you enlighten me? The passage is rather funny withal, for some young girls in the audience were so excited by it as nearly to burst their costal bands. It was wicked in them, though. An Infidel on his death-bed once said that the Christians eat their God. Now it appears that some of them think they can suck him also. That is the inevitable conclusion from the above. The preacher also said, "It matters not how moral you are; it matters not how generous, nor how pure, if ye believe not in the son your portion will be everlasting death in the place where the worm never dieth, and where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

Yours, CABALIST.

We can do nothing for our correspondent. The preacher has got us on the pap question. Like "Cabalist," we hav sometimes read the Bible, and furthermore we possess a very complete concordance. But neither our own researches into the "word" nor the labors of Mr. Cruden, M.A., throw any light upon the interesting text quoted by the Portland preacher. We spent a good portion of last Sabbath in overhauling the "Holy Scriptures" for the text, but, alas! our labor was in vain. If God is full of paps, he don't mention the fact in our copy of his word, and our copy is as good as anybody's copy. In such matters we hav the best, because we want all the light to be obtained. If any of our readers know where the text is they will oblige our friend and ourselvs by putting their finger on the place and holding it there till we can mark it with a big blue mark; otherwise we shall hav to apply to the preacher, and we would regret exceedingly to disturb the man of the papillary God in his mystical lucubrations. He needs all his time to originate such beautiful passages.

But when the young preacher gets down to the Christian creed, that good works and clean lives avail nothing, we can tell just where he gets his authority. He gets it from the New Testament. He gets it from the teachings of Christ himself, and from the words of the apostles. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned," is ample authority. Faith is all that is necessary. A believer can hate his father and mother; he can stone to death the unbeliever; he can kill every witch he finds; he can slay his brother and outrage his sister; he can do all these and a thousand other heartless yet godly and Christian deeds, and still go to heaven because he believes on the "Lord Jesus Christ." The unbeliever may be the best man in the world—generous, honest, pure, and noble in all things—yet for his simple unbelief he must go to the everlasting torture prepared by God.

The beauty of such a system is too obvious to need pointing out.

Colonel Ingersoll.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Some gentleman is attempting to show that Col. Ingersoll stole the beautiful words that he delivered a short time since over a child's grave. This gentleman produces a poem, or part of a poem, purporting to be the original from which he claims that Col. Ingersoll plagiarizes, but he pretends he cannot remember the name of the author of the original. This poem was constructed by taking a few of the touching lines from Col. Ingersoll's oration and distorting them into such a shape as to make them, while they bore some resemblance to his, appear as if coming from the pen of another person. In this the gentleman accomplished his object; for, with the exception of that part of it stolen from Mr. Ingersoll, the rest, which is this poet's own production, is as poor in thought and as steril in beauty and rhythm as it is possible to conceive of, even though coming from orthodox mediocrity. The sentences which this mixture of envy and mendacity steals from Ingersoll, battered and bruised though they are, shine in the midst of his trash like a broken necklace of diamonds among garbage. Was Col. Ingersoll's tribute over his brother's grave stolen from the same author whose name this man has been so unfortunate as to forget? Were his tribute at the Grant banquet at Chicago, his matchless oration to the soldiers at Indianapolis, the thousands of other beautiful and tender things that he has said, also stolen, or were they begotten of his own brain? If these others, never equaled by pen, were written by some one else, his name would be on the lips and in the hearts of millions, but the world acknowledges them to be Col. Ingersoll's. Then why should such a man steal from one who has never written well enough to be remembered? The fact is, were Col. Ingersoll to steal from the best of them, he would simply be patching his broadcloth with shoddy. It would be like a bird of paradise completing the beauty of his plumage with feathers from the turkey buzzard—like a rose stealing its perfume from decaying offal. The orthodox feel toward Col. Ingersoll about as the gas men feel toward Edison; and what they say, either concerning him, or anything, corresponds in brilliancy with what he says about as the gas corresponds with the electric light; and Col. Ingersoll troubles himself about what they say in the same degree that the electric light cares for the envy of the gas. They are too low, and he is too high, to allow of anything else on their side but envy, or anything else on his side but contempt. The eagle, wheeling in the sky with the sunlight flashing on his wings, heeds not the envious cackle of the barnyard fowls a mile beneath him. I. C. B.

These charges of plagiarism against the colonel are absurd. He has no need to steal other men's thoughts or language. But his Christian opponents are not so guiltless. The man who stole his paragraph on temperance was a most atrocious literary thief. He not only took matter from Mr. Ingersoll, but appropriated liberally from others. What he did not get from the colonel he got from Dr. Gunn, as is shown by the following note:

ALTOONA, PA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: That portion of a temperance speech of which Colonel Ingersoll disclaims being the author, can be found on page 111 of Gunn's "Family Physician," a book written by Dr. John Gunn, and published in Cincinnati about twenty ago.

Yours truly, W. S. BURNS.

So much for that charge.

Another.

BENEZETT, PA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Being also a seeker of truth, I would like to ask you a question for the benefit of myself and a few Liberal friends.

A few days ago I had a conversation with a man in reference to R. G. Ingersoll, in the course of which he stated that he had lately met and conversed with a son-in-law of Ingersoll's, who stated to my informant that Ingersoll did not practice at home what he advocated and preached abroad; but, on the contrary, instructed his family in the Christian doctrin in its fullest orthodox sense.

Now neither I nor my Liberal friends believe the statement; but as a few Christians were present and heard the statement, it gave them great satisfaction, owing to the fact that this man is one of the most prominent church-members in this county, and also a citizen of considerable prominence.

I trust that you will not treat this question with silence. I would ask if the above statement, so far as you know, is true. I would be be greatly pleased to see your answer in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and shall certainly spare no pains in circulating it. I am the only subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county

Yours fraternally, L. D. HAWLEY.

The charge our correspondent mentions is almost too ridiculous to demand serious notice. We assure our friend that Mr. Ingersoll practices what he preaches. The story is about the same kind of a yarn as that started by a Canadian paper to the effect that one of the colonel's daughters had joined the Presbyterian church. It seems that when Christian editors hav nothing else to do they invent some falsehood concerning Mr. Ingersoll or some member of his family. In future, whenever our friend hears such statements, he can safely tell his Christian friends that they are misinformed, and ask them for proof of their charges.

Around the World.

We hope there will be no cessation in taking shares in the Round-the-World journey which Mr. Bennett is now engaged in making. The expenses of the trip will be close upon $3,000, and the cost of the books, with their illustrations, will not be less than $1,500 or $2,000. So his friends who hav sent him away will see that many more names are necessary before the bare cost of the undertaking is paid. The idea is that the work shall be a sort of joint enterprise, the people contributing the money and Mr. Bennett giving his time. It is not fair to ask him to giv the year necessary to make the circuit of our globe and pay for getting out the books in addition. And, besides, he is not able to do it. The work will be dedicated to those advancing the $5's, and their names will be enrolled in the first volume, which is being forwarded at the rate of thirty-five or forty pages per week. It will take until about March 1st for it to be finished, and until that time the starry roll of honor is open to those who want to be pioneers in getting the truth. There has been plenty of books of travel written, but all hav catered to some pious church prejudice, and so far as telling the actual state of affairs existing in the "Holy Land" and the orient, were worth no more than what they would sell for as waste paper. Those who hav read Mr. Bennett's travels in Europe, written last year, will agree with us that his descriptions are faithful portraits of actual facts. He tells everything that he sees, and he has a shrewd way of seeing everything that is going on around him. His letters so far hav been marvels of descriptiv writing. The work, we feel sure, will be greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav, and we want all our friends and their friends to aid in disseminating it. There will be over one hundred and fifty full-page illustrations of scenes described, besides many smaller cuts. These will add greatly to the interest of the work, and with the faithful and close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light. It will be as good as making the journey. And in order to pay for all this we shall keep the list open yet awhile longer in the hope that many more will yet send in their names. It isn't exactly square that the eleventh-hour laborers should get as much as the early workers; but if that is divine justice, poor fallible human beings can not be blamed if we giv the ones who subscribe now just as fine books as those who subscribed to send the editor off. We can call it that the first sent him away and the last bring him back. The Round-the-World List for the first volume will be open until the last of the present month.

WE can supply a limited number of copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing Ingersoll's answer to Talmage's tirades.

OWING to the great number of Paine celebrations held throughout the country on the 29th ult., and our desire to publish as many of them as possible, we encroach upon the "Letters from Friends" to a great extent. Under the circumstances, we know our friends will pardon us for so doing.

Liberal News.

MR. AND MRS. BLISS are mourning the loss of a daughter. She was their little "Sunshine."

FEBRUARY 12th Mrs. Clara Neymann will lecture before the Society of Humanity, at Science Hall, on "Woman's Mission in the Service of Humanity."

O. A. PHELPS starts from Colorado about February 15th for Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, and Nebraska. Liberals desiring his services may address him at Kansas City, Mo.

"CEPHAS" writes to the Banner of Light that "Ingersoll surrenders every time he preaches a funeral sermon." Ingersoll never denied immortality. In nearly every one of his lectures may be found a hope for, but not a belief in, a future life. His heart would like one, but his reason cannot find it.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Banner of Light says of Mrs. Colby, who is lecturing this month at Frobisher Hall, this city, that "her orations at Erie, Pa., are remembered by the people. She lifted some of the sectarians out of their seats, and there was a burial of creeds after the discourse was over."

THE Christian regents of the Nebraska State University played a sharp and dishonorable game with the three Freethinkers in the board recently. When the illness of one member left the bigots in the majority they expelled all the Infidels. This dishonorable procedure is in keeping with all the acts of the pious against Freethinkers.

W. F. JAMIESON closed an engagement in Mauston, Wis., four lectures, and a public castigation of a reverend calumniator of Paine, a Rev. Mr. Brown, in Opera Hall, Feb. 1st, as announced. He has an engagement at Escanaba, Mich., for ten lectures, Feb. 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th. Address him for lectures as usual, at Albion, Mich.

MRS. LAKE spoke at New Boston, Ill., January 26th and 27th; at Burlington, 29th, and February 5th; at Ft. Madison, Iowa, 3d. At Burlington she has organized a League; officers, Wm. Ellery, president; Cornelia Boecklin, treasurer; Max Stempel, secretary. She speaks at Durand, Ill., the last of February. Parties wishing her services in Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan during March and April, may address her at 164 Ashland avenue, Chicago.

THE Sun says that the Liberal League of St. Louis had to call on the police for protection against several members of the Young Men's Christian Association, who attended the meetings and interrupted the speeches with such exclamations as "Blasphemer," "Fool," "Liar," and "Lord pity him." The Leaguers should hav taken those young idiots and thrown them head first into the street. The gospel of peace is well enough, but when Christian rowdies invade the gatherings of Liberals they should be taught a lesson, and it takes something besides soft words to penetrate their thick skulls.

GEORGE R. WENDLING, of Chicago, in a lecture last Monday evening in Brooklyn, said that avowed Infidels sowed irreverence and reaped disrespect. Tom Paine never would be anything else but "Tom," even if a hundred monuments were erected to his memory, and fifty million Americans would never know Ingersoll by any other name than "Bob." He did not take the trouble to state how it happens that Franklin was and still is referred to as "Ben" Franklin; Lincoln is spoken of as "Abe," Blaine as "Jim," and Cary as "Sam;" nor why it is that fifty million Americans will never know Cook by any other name than "Joe."

THE Liberals of Liberal, Mo., celebrated Paine's birthday in an appropriate manner. "The hall," says the Liberal, "was most beautifully decorated with flags, mottoes, names of distinguished men in evergreen moss, and portraits of different men. The most prominent, of course, was the picture of Thomas Paine over the center of the arch above the stage, arranged among flags festooned and beautified with tastefully arranged flowers and evergreens. On the right was the picture of R. G. Ingersoll, and above it in moss-work set in sea-shells the word 'Love.' On his left was the portrait of D. M. Bennett similarly arranged, above which was the word 'Truth.' The portrait of Washington on the west side of the hall was decorated with flags, and that of Garfield on the east with the flag of our country arranged with crape. Humboldt was in living green, and the name of Voltaire was dressed in moss-work. Elegant stage scenery, just completed by S. P. Davis, brought out the whole scene in grand relief. It is needless to say all of this decorated work is attributable to the ladies of Liberal."

THE first of a proposed series of parlor meetings to consider the subject of heredity and prenatal influences was held at the office parlors of Dr. E. B. Foote, 120 Lexington ave., on Thursday evening, the 26th ult. After the reading of the secretary's and treasurer's report, Mrs. E. B. Foote read an interesting letter from Mr. Loring Moody, of Boston, intended for this meeting. Then followed letters which were written to the Heredity Convention, but which, for want of time, were omitted on that occasion. Among the most entertaining were one from Rev. Phœbe Hanaford; one from Mr. Charles. W. Gardner, of Portsmouth, N. H.; from Rev. Robert Collyer; from Mrs. Caroline B. Winslow, M.D., of Washington; from Mr. Alfred H. Love, of Philadelphia; from Mrs. Ellen H. Sheldon, Washington; from Mrs. Abbie Knapp, M.D., Michigan; and from J. C. Jackson, M.D., Dansville, N. Y.

The discussion turned mainly on the subject of the temperaments and their influences on the physical and mental stamina of children. Dr. Reuben Garter, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Dr. Foote, Dr. Sarah B. Chase, Mrs. Cynthia A. Leonard, Mr. S. P. Putnam, and Mr. Ryerson presented their respectiv views. Two parlors were well filled with an interested audience, and it would seem as if these meetings had started out with a fair promis of success. The next meeting will take place on the last Thursday evening in February at the same place.

Dalliance With Danger.

All phases of progress in all countries show that of all things requiring vigilance liberty is chief, yet receives dalliance instead.

While sketching a fraction of my regret and wonder that the majority of Liberals are so slow to grasp the knowledge that their privilege to speak and act from convictions of right requires earnest resistance to wrongs, even at this point of the crisis, when all shades of tyranny combine to crush the last we possess of liberty—while contemplating the hard task of repeating sad facts that are patent to clear minds—the last TRUTH SEEKER brings the brave Mrs. Lake's encounters with the same indifferent loitering among snares laid by foes, the same giving of means, time, and power to rites and customs, the observance of which givs all influence, too, helping the church rob the cause of truth and its brave advocates, with the craven and reckless adherents. It is a moral palsy calling for "innovation." When we wish a respit from usual labor, time can profitably be given to progressiv work or innocent amusement. Freethinkers and Spiritualists might quickly lay away Christ-mass, fast, and thanksgiving to Bacchus, on the shelf, with the old homage to Venus and her paramours. West, East, everywhere, the great body of lovers of liberty are sleeping over dangers shaping to engulph them simply for "business interests" and "popular standing," supposing others will defend liberty, though their weight be thrown against it. The facts are, they must dicover their fallacy, and arouse to counteract their traitrous coherence with malignant opposition, before our nation can be safe. And women should be activ as men, and organize for special culture; they hav even more rights to contend for, and remaining in the old ranks is more damage to the general cause and their particular interest in it. Their subjection makes slaves of all men, half of whom are tyrants. While education is the great secularizing lever to be moved long and patiently by agencies not yet operating, there are many of both sexes now feeling oppressiv schemes and seeing the situation, yet failing to note the proximity of danger or to trace relief to their own efforts, redoubled by being bestowed on organized forces. Mrs. Lake should be aided by hundreds who will stir the dozing thousands to patrionism, that dare protect what they hold most dear. The "standing" now valued and paid for by the surrender of purse and principle, the lucrativ "business" further bartering honor, will look like poor pottage contemplated in a face-to-face contact with abject submission, or with fines, gags, and cells. If for truth to human welfare, slander, and despite be meted out, we can better repel them in our strife for justice than tamely succumb, or be mocked by sham courts.

Popular respectability developed by church usage is so venal and false that honest natures should scorn to accept it on the terms of conformity. A just course by all who lean to liberty's side would sooner expose and transform old varnished corruptions than is imagined. It is blindly selfish to feel what is often said, "craft and greed can't be uprooted in my day, and I'll not rack my brain with the trial." How much wiser to say, The claims of posterity on my example and influence shall be balanced by my purpose to bequeath as little oppression and as much justice as possible!

Because state tyranny is infused through state measures where hard to reach, it is freedom's worst foe, and must be resisted in its quiet as well as daring aggressions. And because as fully blest with social measures where not so environed, it can be affected, as well as affect the masses. Those seeing the thrall thrown around its victims, the psychology disabling responsibility, hav some chance to interpose, should openly demur and stand aloof. A line of Liberal labor should encourage those who hav outgrown their place and those who hang on the order of ceremonies for selfish objects to turn to themes their highest growth can reach, and help the cause that helps the world. I see the difficulty of the labor, when the wealthy church has such control in common affairs as to hold in mute compliance people who never believed in it, but know its stupidity and guile; and when mercenary Spiritualists can be induced into its service. But steady effort tells on an institution whose only defense is force, and only strength is unopposed sway. Here is a symptom showing it realizes its vulnerable composition; it readily senses Liberal element, is startled by its approach and weakened by its action, so great is the disparity and antagonism. Though its power has been centuries accumulating, its factors are such broken, brittle, untempered materials that all its claims and compartments are shattered by a short argument, a rational idea of nature, or a fact of history. Hence the care in past ages to destroy reasoners and their books; hence present strife to hurt the influence of great minds and stop the spread of advancing science. No clearer proof is needed of the merit of persons and books than its raid upon them. Nothing could more plainly tell the freedom-teaching mission of THE TRUTH SEEKER, or the good culture supplied by Dr. Foote's Health Monthly. If the doctor's "Medical Common Sense" had not been an excellent educator it had not been feared, hated, and fought. The best part of the conclusion is, its fear and persecution evinces its fallible nature. Perseverance in the reforms comprised in Liberalism, physiology, and hygiene will disintegrate its material and liberate its intelligent and well-meaning subjects sooner than its present power implies. But unabated action is requisit, and can be afforded better than aught else. We'll rest and not retire. Gained ground is to stand on till not a slave stands on the planet. Much talk and time must be given, and all the money not needed as competence, being not transferrable to the next sphere, is in demand. Now the Liberal Leagues are in accord, well officered, and, aside from the members, Man to assist them to multiply and prosper by uniting with them and resisting the measures of enemies of progress.

Reformers should carefully note the article "A Movement in Favor of Ignorance," by C. L. James, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 28th. Instead of coloring with anxiety or sensational facts, he has given a mild and impartial view of the movement which has been long developing, and is nearer critical measures than apparent features reveal. Mr. James thinks "the scheme can't succeed," probably because he trusts strong enough "positions will be taken" to rebut it. That will depend on how generally the scheme is seen, exposed, and repelled. The little opposition already made only stimulates it.

M. E. TILLOTSON.

Scraps from Reuben Dailey's "Moral Code."

1. Be moral men and women. Now what does that include? Much; indeed, everything. If we are moral we will do no wrong. We can be guilty of no dishonest act toward individuals or government. Honesty includes industry, because every man owes to the world a return for that which he uses in the maintenance of his life, as also it includes a willingness to pay a fair price for a fair article at all times.

2. I would recommend that each person take an interest in the charities and philanthropies of the day and manifest a willingness to bear equally the burden of the support of the unfortunate and deserving poor, as the widow, the orphan, crippled and blind.

3. I would recommend that each person show a neighborly disposition at all times, giving a practical recognition of our foundation principle that all men are created free and equal.

4. I would recommend kindness to those whom the world recognizes as our inferiors financially and socially.

5. I would recommend courtesy to all, kindness to the unfortunate, and a general conduct in life that inspires the lowly to approach us in confidence of kind treatment.

6. I would recommend that each man and woman try to keep order in their house and perform the functions of ruler of the home with quietness, kindness, moderation, and wisdom; to study the comfort of home and keep it clean, in good repair, and orderly.

7. I would recommend attention to personal appearances. We should be elegant if we can, but never fail to be clean and decent. Above all, our children should giv constant evidence of attention to their personal comfort and neatness of attire.

Liberty, Science, and Humanity.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

THE INFINITE AS GOD.

It is evident enough from what has been said that neither the Cosmos, nor any part of it, is ever again to become the God of scientific people. This is generally admitted; but may not THE INFINITE, which is supposed to extend beyond the Cosmos, be the God, or the chief dwelling-place of a spirit-God, or be personified as God in some way. Can this be so? Can the Infinite, or any conception of it, be the unity, solution, and guide of intelligent people in this and future ages?

To this question Theology answers, Yes; and modern Science, No.

The Scientific verdict on this issue is undoubtedly the Agnostic. Our fifth subjective harmony must then read thus:

V.—THE INFINITE, BEING FROM ITS VERY NATURE BEYOND THE RELATIONS BY WHICH MAN CAN HAVE ANY KNOWLEDGE, IS UNKNOWABLE TO HIM; AND ALL BELIEFS AS TO IT ARE IDLE IMAGINATIONS, UNVERIFIABLE, AND THEREFORE USELESS AS THE SOLUTION AND GUIDE OF HUMAN LIFE.

The line of thought which has brought modern Science to this conclusion is the law of the relativity of all human knowledge explained in our first lecture. It may be followed from Hume to Kant, from Kant to Sir William Hamilton and Comte, and thence to Dean Mansel, Spencer, Huxley, Haeckel, and to Liberal scientists generally.

It may be granted that the Infinite is the necessary third factor of the world, which is always thought of as a trinity, viz., as Man, the Cosmos, the Infinite—

Yet there is no alternative but to consider the Infinite as but the continuation without limit of the Finite. To find the Infinite we extend matter, with its inference, space; and force, with its inference, time. All of these may be reduced to our ultimate idea of power, or resistance to motion, as common to all. Thus we conceive the Infinite as the power we know, but as limitless and unconditioned. We cannot think that there is a limit to matter, nor to force, nor to space, nor to time; nor to power, as the sum or simplest conception of these. We feel that there is always a farther on—never an end or vacuum. Thus in our Classification (on p 12) the Infinite appears in the Emotional or upper division as the Plenum or the Infinite Power. In the Activity or Will division below it, there is vacancy, for we can hav no relation nor do anything in regard to the Infinite. In thought, or the Intellectual division, we can merely think and question as to what lies beyond finite space, or the Cosmos, as illustrating the freedom of our thought, and so it is marked. So with the senses, in the lower division. Man, by the aid of the telescope, can only say as to the practical infinity of space that there is always a farther space beyond.

The feelings of awe, wonder, and reverence toward and in regard to the Infinite Power Science sustains and cherishes—nay, unspeakably increases; but for more it sees no warrant! It is the declaration of the limitless, and of the freedom of the human soul, and as such is of inconceivable value. It is the necessary and inevitable foundation and background of knowable existence, and of our human consciousness. To seek to make it more, or other, is to make it less—is, in fact, to deny and to destroy it. "Feeling is all," says Faust. Let no one dare to hide it by words, or names, or symbols, or personifications. Excusable these may be in a Fetich worshiper, but in proportion to the progress of mankind these idols and symbols of the imagination drop out of sight and use. They are seen to be nothing more than the reflecting of man's own nature upon the Infinite, obscuring and falsifying it. The cruder form of this personification business was ridiculed by the old Greek Xenophanes, who allowed to the lower animals, in this lively manner, the same privilege of personification that men indulge in who call it "religion:"

"If sheep and swine, and lions strong, and all the bovine crew,
Could paint with cunning hands, and do what clever mortals do,
Depend upon it every pig with snout so broad and blunt,
Would make a Jove that like himself would thunder with a grunt,
And every lion's god would roar, and every bull's would bellow,
And every sheep's would baa, and every beast his worshiped fellow
Would find in the immortal form, and nought exist divine,
But had the gait of lion, sheep, or ox, or grunting swine."

In these imaginations of the Infinite every people ridicules those below and reverences those above them. The very Greek who furnishes the above ridicule proceeds to do the same thing, only in a higher form, by adding these lines to the foregoing:

'There is one God, supreme above all gods and men that be;
Not like a mortal thing in shape, nor like in thought, is he.
All eyes, all ears, all thought is God, the omnipresent Soul,
And freed from toil by force of mind, he moves the mighty whole"

That the Infinite cannot be considered as two, or divided, is plain enough; but who knows, or dares to add, the last two lines quoted? They are but contradictions of the two lines which precede them, and are as glaring as anything the poet has ridiculed above.

Our Greek poet presents only the more refined form of Anthropomorphism in the last two lines. He is merely trying to retain the falsehood of personification while hiding and denying its grossness. All this, no matter how far refined, is equally inconsistent. An infinite Person is an infinite contradiction.

We have seen no exception taken to Prof. Fiske's showing that our word "God" is but an old form of the name of Odin, the Personal Hero and Deity of our savage Scandinavian and Saxon ancestors. (See Fiske's "Myths and Myth Makers.")

What justification can there be for describing and limiting the Infinite by the name of this "heathen" mead and blood-drinking barbarian.

Intelligence is foresight, the adaptation of means to ends, and is thus the denial of the infinite Power and Knowledge. The infinite Love and Mercy deny the infinite Justice, and the creation of the Devil; and so each attribute is the denial of the other. So of the Trinity, the begetting and death of a son, etc., etc, are all denials of the Infinite. We have been taught to wonder at the ridiculous stories of Polytheism, but they are rationality itself in comparison to Monotheism. Its limited deities were only larger—not infinite men, and they loved and hated and quarreled as best they could. Monotheism condenses all of their contradictions and limitations into one and then contradicts them all by adding the conception of the infinite unity. It is for this reason J. S. Mill, in his essay upon Theism, in order to make any showing for it, was obliged to imagine a limited God or Demiurge as creator of the world, who did, not as well as he wanted to, but the best he could. But this, of course, was in substance a return to Polytheism, for it left invincible and opposing powers, that is, real Gods outstanding.

There is something too absurd to argue, now that Biology has become a science, in the conception that the Infinite is or can be an animal with eyes and ears and brain; and yet without these even Lucretius asked how could there be thoughts or design. How can the unlimited have laws and limitations? How can there be an animal conceived of without these? There is no proof that the Infinite has any animal faculties. Unfortunately, a scientific contradiction or difficulty is not gotten over by calling it a "mystery."

As in the case of the Cosmos, the deanthropomorphization of the Infinite has rendered absurd all attempts to attribute knowable animal, human, or Spiritual properties or faculties of any kind to it. There is a final divorce of personality from Infinity.

Notes of Travel by E. C. Walker.

Through the mingled sunshine and storm of an Iowa December I hav been meandering through portions of the counties of Buchanan, Delaware, Dubuque, and Jones in search of the truth and truth seekers.

At Quasqueton, a pretty little country village in Buchanan county, snugly nestled down beside the murmuring Wapsipinecon, and undisturbed by rumble of cars or scream of locomotiv whistle, I found Laura Walker and the little ones awaiting the arrival of the household goods, when housekeeping would be commenced anew, but with the inspiring impetus of an independent life-work to cheer and inaugurate the little matron, she having now commenced the study of medicin in earnest. Not any system of drug poisoning, but nature's methods of healing and rebuilding and magnetic rejuvenation.

Outspoken Liberals are not very plentiful in Buchanan county, but Dr. D. C. Hastings has done very much to humanize and broaden these people whom he has lived among for so many years, and, in spite of his radicalism, he has conquered for himself a warm place in the affections and esteem of his neighbors. He has been true to his sincere convictions, and already the crop from the seed he has sown amid storm and rain is whitening for the harvest.

Manchester has a large Infidel element, but it sadly needs electrifying. There are a few good workers, but the masses here, as elsewhere, hav inherited so much from the church that they do not often think of the future in its relation to the work of the present; they do not see that every stone which they might but do not remove from the highway of humanity is a "rock of offense" left in the pathway of their children. Of course these remarks do not apply to such as V. Schelling, J. Van Antwerp, H. S. Walter, G. R. Buckley, and C. W. Mead. Winchester should be made one of a "circuit" for some good speaker.

At Earlville I met N. W. Clark, Charles Schucert, Peter Hess, F. Werkmeister, and R. Zimmerman, of my old acquaintances, and made the acquaintance of Alonzo Heeley, J. Richardson, J. Hutchinson, and George Stahley.

My next halting-place was Farley, Dubuque county. Here orthodoxy has lost about all its selfishness—thanks to the serene courage and earnest work of H. Gilmore.

I met, also, G. F. Barker, R. C. Merrill, L. Miller, and C. A. Joseph. Freethought is growing right along here, owing to the conscientious devotion and hard work of these and others of our comrades. I was kindly entertained by Bro. Gilmore and family, and to Bro. Miller I am also indebted for help and cheering encouragement. Would that every town in our state had as many go-ahead Liberals as has Farley. The church has received many a hard shock here, and she will be surprised more than once again. I had a little confab with the "city" marshal upon the subject of licenses. That functionary, like most other henchmen of the state, had no higher conception of right than that entertained by the masses—whatever is "law" is right. According to this view—and it is the view of nearly all—we are bound to always obey law, even a fugitiv slave law. Comment is unnecessary.

Monticello sadly needs a revival of Liberalism. With probably scores of heretics within its limits, our Liberal papers are not taken, with very few exceptions. John Blanchard, H. W. Gill, Dr. Henry, Dr. Millett, and Henry Wright I found interested in progressiv thought. Mr. Blanchard is editor of the Express, and has a fine library, but he needs to become better acquainted with the Liberal movement of to-day, that he may not so unjustly condemn some of our best workers. Monticello has been quite favored in its clergymen, and so I found quite a demand for "The Crimes of Preachers." Personal acquaintance always makes us interested in such statistics.

But Anamosa, with the penitentiary, is not far away, and so the Monticelloites do not worry as much as they otherwise might over clerical escapades. Anamosa is famous for its beautiful stone and excellent brick, and is a pretty town, because of them, probably. Here we hav some good workers, notably Mrs. M. E. Preston, Nelson Potter, Israel Fisher, and B. F. Shaw, state fish commissioner. To friends Potter and Fisher I am under great obligations for kindnesses most cheerfully bestowed. Mr. Potter is a relativ of A. L. Potter, of LaMotte, and, like him, is a Liberal all the way round and clear through.

In nearly every town in which I stop I am told by a friend that the place is the most bigoted and intolerant of all places. Of course they cannot all be right, but I am inclined to think that Wyoming, Jones county, is as near heaven as any town in the state, if proximity to heaven is indicated by the numbers and virulent orthodoxy of stiff-backed Presbyterians and whooping Methodists, cant, bigotry, and intolerance. It does not seem to know that the devil is dead and the fires of hell are put out, Freethought growing, and science kicking at Jehovah's chamber door. Whoso does not pay his tithes regularly in Wyoming may look out for northers—no, I mean a sirocco. He'll hav a time of it anyway. But Wyoming may yet be saved. There may not be ten Freethinkers in the town, but there are some splendid ones in the country round about. I stopped over Sunday and had a grand visit with Mr. and Mrs. Abner Kimball and their sons and daughters, and son-in-law, John Conway. Here is a family whose household gods are none of the old heathen Christian deities, but the fair, sweet angels of science, art, and Freethought. There is no concealment of unpopular opinions here, but the Liberal and Spiritual colors fly bravely in the breeze of friendly discussion, and from the walls of parlor and hall lithographs and photos of distinguished Freethinkers and scientists are prominently displayed, and untiring industry and deft fingers hav fashioned many a beautiful ornament from nature's varied productions for the gratification of the esthetic faculties. No "In God we trust" or "God bless our home" mottoes giv the lie to the principles professed, and one instinctivly feels when he enters this abiding-place that he is in a secular home. I shall long remember this bright oasis in the dreary desert of apathy, indifference, and selfishness through which I hav journeyed in my wanderings. May such centers of progressiv thought and life increase and multiply as the gospel of naturalism spreads among the people.

I must not forget to mention our fearless young friend, Geo. Gilbert, a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and North American Review.

The Iowa division of the Illinois Central Railway some five weeks ago put on three regular Sunday trains, which certainly is a great accommodation to the traveling public, and a step in the right direction, which will be appreciated by all save the real godly. Other through lines will soon be compelled by the force of competition to do likewise, and we may soon look in vain for the familiar "except Sunday" when examining Western railroad time-tables. And thus will "the Sabbath" get another terrible "break," and people visit their friends on Sunday instead of listening to the recital of Joshua's exploits.

A Characteristic Letter from Col. Ingersoll.

All of the honest and truthful members of the orthodoxy who know anything about Col. Ingersoll personally, are forced to admit that so far as his life, his character, and his habits are concerned, they are above reproach; that in his own family he is a model husband and a model father; that his home is one in which there is a perpetual reign of sunshine and joy, and that as a citizen he is one of the most kind-hearted and benevolent of men.

We recently, however, clipped from a good, pious, sweet-tempered, Golden-Rule-observing, orthodox paper, some very savage assaults upon Col. Ingersoll's private character, said to hav been made some time before, by a couple of Chicago clergymen, at a ministers' meeting in that city. The charges bore on their face evidences not only of untruthfulness, but of bitter malignity. Thinking that possibly Col. Ingersoll might not hav seen these charges, we clipped them out and sent them to him, accompanied by a brief letter, in which we stated to him that while he is personally respected by the masses of the people, and by the masses even who are still tied to the churches, yet there are some clerical bigots who would evidently crucify him if they only had the power, and who, feeling that something must be said by them to offset the sledge-hammer blows that he has given to some of their pet dogmas, hav made themselvs believe that they are entirely justifiable in attempting to blacken and besmirch his private character, even when they can only do so at the expense of truth. In reply to that note, Col. Ingersoll recently sent us the following characteristic letter:

COL. INGERSOLL'S LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3, 1882.

MY DEAR MR. MITCHELL: Much obliged to you for your letter of the 29th. The clippings you sent me appeared in the papers two or three years ago. I had a correspondence with one of the ministers upon the subject, and convicted him of having told a falsehood. These ministers were really not worth noticing. I had delivered a lecture in Chicago that the clergy could not answer. Fifteen or twenty of them tried, and yet the people, speaking through the principal papers of the city, decided that the replies were entirely unsatisfactory. This aroused these particular preachers up to the lying point.

As they could not answer my arguments, they did the next best thing—they attacked me. They could not lie so as to answer the points I had made, because, as a matter of fact, there is no logic in lies.

As lies cannot hurt logic, they used them to destroy, not the logic, but the logician. I can always tell when my arrows hav reached the heart of superstition. If the points I hav made cannot be answered, then my character gets bad, as my arguments get good. I presume if I were to make a weak speech, my reputation would be excellent.

Of course my reputation has nothing to do with the question, one way or the other. Admitting that I am the worst man in the world, still there is some doubt about the general deluge. If it should be proved that I am the unfortunate possessor of all the vices, still some people might hav their doubts about the whale's having swallowed Jonah. And should I be so unfortunate as to die in the penitentiary, even after that some folks might say that the doctrin of the trinity was mathematically absurd.

I hav no time to answer all the attacks made upon me; and if I had, I might be engaged in better business. There is an old saying that he who takes medicin every time he feels unwell will soon ruin his constitution, and that he who defends his character from every attack will soon lose it. I hav been charged with everything; but what has that to do with the existence of the supernatural? Suppose all these charges to be true, is the Bible then inspired; and is an eternity of pain the lot of nearly all the sons of men?

A very good story is told of Sidney Smith. He was conversing with a young man, who it seems used a great deal of profane language. After a while, Mr. Smith said to him, "Let us admit, for the purpose of this conversation, that everything in the universe has been thoroughly damned, and go on with the discussion." So I say to the ministers, "Let us go on with the discussion." No matter what I may hav done, and no matter what I may do, gentlemen, be kind enough to answer what I say.

Most of these gentlemen claim that they love even their enemies. In order to get a little practice, so that to love enemies will at least be comparativly easy, would it not be well enough to commence by treating those decently who are not their enemies? I do no not ask their friendship. I do not want their praise. I hav only one request to make of the clergy of the whole world, and that is that they will not tell falsehoods about me. There are two things I would like to hav them stick to—one is the subject under discussion, and the other is the truth. Until I read some of the attacks that hav been made upon me, I had no conception of the malignity of the modern churches. They do not seem to care for the consequence of their acts. They are willing to malign men, women, and children. They hav no respect for the feelings of others. They are perfectly willing to wreck the life of any man who has the courage to express his honest thoughts. They would be delighted to see his wife in want, and his children clad in rags. They would repeat with infinit unction the prayer recorded in the 109th Psalm. With folded hands and upturned eyes they would say to God:

"Let his children be fatherless and his wife a widow. Let his children be continuously vagabonds, and beg. Let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places. Let there be none to extend mercy unto them, neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children."

Of course, there are many exceptions. There are good, honest, self-sacrificing men in the pulpits and pews; but, judging from my experience, I would almost hate to say how few.

Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

A Letter to Mrs. Slenker.

DEAR MADAM: Our attorney-general was out to see me yesterday, and in the course of our conversation he made the assertion that the Bible was not read in the public schools of any of the states. If such is the case I hav been wrongly informed. I am satisfied that you are fully able to giv us a correct statement in regard to the matter. So I hope you will do so in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. If you can, giv us the number of the states wherein the Bible is read in the public schools. I wish to show your statement to the learned limb of the law. Hoping to see a statement from you at the earliest opportunity, I remain, Yours respectfully, J. S. MARTIN.

REPLY.

To say that "the Bible is not read in the public school of any state" is a great mistake. Right here in Snowville—a little town of two hundred inhabitants—one that boasts of a fine public library and several large private libraries, a first-class school, a ladies' reading club, a Masonic hall, a Good Templars' lodge, and a Campbellite church that nearly runs them all—the school-teacher, who is a preacher of this dipperite fraternity, uses the Bible as a school-book, and if there is a single state in the Union where the Bible is not (in some part of it) read in the public schools, I am totally unaware of it. I hav lived in New York, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Virginia, and in several different places in each state, and always found the old Jew book used as a school-book; and, indeed, when I was a Yankee schoolma'am, I had to allow it read in my own school in many districts, but generally managed it so that it was gradually and imperceptibly dropped; and therefore when it ceased entirely to be read no notice was taken of it.

Now, with my present convictions of the bad influence of the volume, I could not consent to allow it read in any school where I was teacher, unless I was free to expound its meanings according to my own reason and judgment. I am satisfied that the book, as now read, is really making more Infidels than Christians, even in our public schools. Children are, in this age, taught to reason, analyze, and compare. They are taught science, philosophy, and practical knowledge; and when they read of a flat earth, of men made of dust, of serpents that talk, of its taking more time to make our little earth than all the suns and stars, and of a small ark holding such a multitude of animals and their food for so long a time, and the ten thousand other myths related in the old myth book, they compare the statements with natural history, geology, and philosophy, and declare there must be something wrong. They read of God, devil, ghost, and the "son of God," and reason that none of these are now manifested to the perceptions of people, and so doubts as to the correctness of the pious old school-book creep into their minds, never more to be eradicated. Wherever I hav known of prayers and Bible-reading in schools, I hav noticed many of the scholars who prefer being late to listening to the monotonous humdrum.

A little more work, brother and sister Liberals, a little more patience, and we shall see the Christian myths placed with all the millions of other myths of antiquity. All we hav to do is to keep right on teaching science, truth, and real knowledge, and then legends, fables, and fictions must be ousted. In science theology

"Hath met a plain-faced foe,
Lacking in subtlety and outward grace,
But with an eye that pierceth through the veil
Of mystery the conquerer holds up
To daze men's sight, and with an arm that makes
A mortal wound at every blow it strikes,
And with a stride that moves but slowly, true,
But never draweth back, and with a heart
That dareth all, so that it find the truth.

. . . . The veil is rent in twain;
Serene-eyed science standeth in the breach;
The holy place, forbidden unto men,
Unknown and unexplored, yet held in awe,
Proves but a vacant chamber. One step more,
Another blow like that which rent the veil,
And through the very wall light shall come in."

Paine Celebrations.

BURR OAK, MICH.

The Liberal League of Burr Oak, Mich. (No. 167), on Jan. 29th celebrated the 145th anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine, that grand patriot, author, and hero who fanned into quickening fires the sparks of liberty that were smoldering within the breast of our revolutionary fathers, and who, with his master pen, nerved them to strike for freedom and independence; and who, in that long night of revolution, at times when disaster and despair threatened to engulf the mighty Washington and his little army of heroes, when the bright star of American liberty grew dim and almost faded from sight, was found writing by the dim light of the midnight camp-fire words that, when read to the bleeding, starving soldiers, restored their lost energy, aroused them to the performance of deeds of greater valor, caused them to endure hardships more severe, and to swear by their burned and wasted homes, the wives of their bosoms, and their helpless little ones, to fight until they gain for America her independence, or until the last murdered patriot should sink into a hero's grave.

We held two meetings, one in the day-time and one in the evening. By invitation of our League S. D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich., was with us on the occasion. Although the day was pretty cold, we had a fair-sized audience at both meetings, who listened with rapt attention to Mr. Moore's able and scholarly exposé of the Christian religion. I cannot refrain from saying that he is a live Liberal of pleasing address, whose earnest words cannot fail to impress his hearers with the honesty of purpose with which he pleads the cause of truth and justice. After Mr. Moore's address in the morning, the writer, one of our League members, pronounced a eulogy on Thomas Paine, which was followed in the evening by our secretary, A. H. Thurston, in the same strain, together with another able address by Mr. Moore, and some appropriate remarks from our president, Mr. E. E. Campany. We closed at a late hour our meeting, the friends separating, feeling happy and glad that they had attended. Yours for the cause you are so ably and fearlessly maintaining,

S. K. THURSTON.

PITTSBURGH, PA.

Yesterday Maltby Hall, on Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, was gaily hung with evergreens and decorated with mottoes and portraits, as an eager throng filled the house, seemingly anxious to make amends for popular delay in doing justice to one of freedom's martyrs.

The occasion was the one hundred and forty-fifth anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. Just back of the rostrum hung an excellent portrait of the author-hero, flanked on the right by that of Colonel Ingersoll, and on the left by Lincoln and Garfield. The mottoes were happy selections from Paine's "creed," as laid down in the "Age of Reason."

The bright, earnest faces of the intelligent audience showed plainly that they were expecting a realization of Charles Mackay's couplet,

"Ever does truth come uppermost,
And ever is justice done," and the enjoyment of "the fellowship of kindred minds," and they were not disappointed. The committee of arrangements of the Liberal League, Messrs. Staley, Schade, and Grundy, had made ample provisions for their entertainment and edification. A varied program of addresses, music, recitations, songs, and toasts had been arranged, to conclude with a banquet at the finest restaurant in the city.

Mr. James E. Emerson, of Beaver Falls, Pa., was the first speaker. He gave a masterly rêsumé of Paine's life and services; dwelt upon his literary achievements, his patriotism, his modesty, his moral courage, his magnanimity, his honest expression of unpopular opinions and constant fealty to his highest convictions of truth in death. After vindicating Paine from the aspersions of his enemies, Mr. Emerson concluded by saying, "The 'Age of Reason' has never yet been met by other arguments than slander, and it never will be squarely met by the orthodox church."

After some excellent music by the band, Prof. William Seymour, of Philadelphia, Pa., took the stand, and paid a glowing tribute to the genius of the man who was despised and defamed by the ignorant bigots of the age in which he lived, but honored and loved by such men as Franklin, Washington, and Jefferson. The professor contrasted Paine's creed with the popular theology of the day, very much to the disadvantage of the latter.

At the close of Prof. Seymour's remarks the public meeting of the League adjourned, and it was transformed into a social.

The afternoon was spent very pleasantly, the entertainment being varied by an address of welcome, by Mr. Thomas Grundy; "The Maid of Midian" (recitation), by Mr. Dovey; "Why should the Spirit of Mortal be Proud?" by J. E. Emerson; music, songs, etc.

At 7 o'clock, as announced, the company adjourned to Reineman's restaurant, where a sumptuous repast was spread for the express purpose of filling an aching void (for Liberals, ladies as well as gentlemen, do get hungry), which having been discussed to the satisfaction of all parties, toasts were in order.

"Thomas Paine" was responded to by Mr. W. Scott Douthitt; in closing he said, "The duty of every lover of truth, and the object of our celebration, is to raise his memory from the grave of calumny in which bigotry has buried it for so many years."

"Voltaire" was responded to by Mr. J. E. Emerson, who said: "He battled against tyranny in every form, and feared neither priest nor king. Reason destined him first for her poet, second for her apostle, and last for her idol." Prof. Seymour paid a neat compliment to "The Press;" Mr. Emerson eulogized "The Ladies," and Thos. Grundy did justice to "The National and Local Liberal Leagues."

The occasion was one long to be remembered, and if the faith of our Spiritualistic friends is not altogether in vain, Thomas Paine last Sunday looked down from the higher spheres and said: "Republics are not always ungrateful." HARRY HOOVER.

Pittsburgh, Pa., Jan. 30, 1882.

LINESVILLE, PA.

The 28th, 29th, and 30th of January were gala days for the Linesville Liberal League. For several years past the Liberalists of all shades of opinion hav celebrated the dêbut of the Author-Hero of the American republic on to this mundane stage. Each celebration has excelled all others in earnestness and enthusiasm. The late celebration has beaten them all.

Last year it was asserted, and I think firmly believed, by the Christian portion of this community, that we were to hav the last celebration "the worshipers of St. Tom Paine" (if you will indulge me in Elder Braden's peculiar classic) were ever to enjoy. Elder Clark Braden, assisted by the home clergy, was to annihilate the last vestige of Liberalism. When the meeting proved to be the largest one ever held in this place, they said, "No wonder it is large; you had Elder Braden and the Christian ministers to call out an audience."

This year the ministers and the church determined to ignore us to death. They would not countenance us; now we would hav a failure sure. They carried out their part of the program to the letter, so we did ours. The roads were in such a condition that it was almost impossible for people to get here with teams, so many Liberals within ten miles staid at home; nevertheless, our success was greater than ever known before. We were compelled to adjourn from our own hall to the opera house, the largest hall in the village, and, notwithstanding an admittance fee was taken at the door to keep uninterested persons away, the seating capacity of the hall was insufficient to accommodate the audience.

The speakers were A. B. Bradford, J. H. Burnham, J. A. Wright, O. P. Kellog, Mattie E. Hull, and the writer of this. Every speech, except one or two of the writer's, was terse, pointed, and eloquent, and received with enthusiasm. Our Liberal League received about forty new members, and others went home determined to form new Leagues in their vicinity. Especially deserving of notice is Mr. Bradford's discourse on the Old Testament saints as canonized by Paul in Hebrews xi. If they were what he proved them to be, the world were better filled with devils.

Mr. Burnham delivered the regular Paine memorial discourse. It was a masterpiece of eloquence, logic, and new thoughts on an old theme.

J. A. Wright, of Youngstown, Ohio, is a mechanic who has recently been called to preach the gospel of Liberalism. He is an earnest student, deep thinker, and close reasoner. His neighbors call him a splendid fellow.

Some of the leading daily papers of this vicinity were represented. The Erie Dispatch sent a pious cuss to report for its columns. In his report he says:

"The three days' celebration of the 145th anniversary of Tom Paine's birthday, by the Liberalists, Freethinkers, and Infidels of northwestern Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio, closed to-night with a grand ball at the opera house. The attendance from various cities and townships within a radius of several hundred miles was large, and the Liberalists are congratulating each other upon what they call a gigantic success. Hotels and private houses hav been taxed to their utmost to accommodate the hundreds of visitors to the convention. The craft of the Infidel was seen in the action of the Liberal League of Linesville, which, at great expense, brought together five ex-ministers of the gospel to preach against the plan of salvation by the cross of Christ. These ministers, all eminent scholars, powerful in debate, and clergymen of many years' standing, made a big team for the clergy here to contend against, and although the League has induced many people to renounce the pure religion of Jesus Christ for the uncertain and damnable rocks of Infidelity, the success may only be temporary. When the glamour shall hav worn off, when calm reflection and the still small voice shall speak in the silent hours of the night, these poor lambs who hav strayed from the fold into the den of the wolf may experience another change of heart, and find their way back to the churches they hav left for Liberal Hall.

"The Rev. Moses Hull is the leading character in this soul tragedy which is being played here. He opened the convention by announcing a song with 'words by the devil and the tune by God.' Then the beautiful 'Sweet By and By' was desecrated by being sung to blasphemy."

The Cleveland Leader, the leading daily paper of eastern Ohio, also had a representativ here whom it editorially announces as "strictly orthodox." Of course he was in disguise. The only thing we can be sure of is that it was not one of our Linesville clergymen, as they were neither of them present at any session of the convention, and as they are not the kind of men who would report without knowing what they were reporting.

In his Saturday evening's report he says:

"At this juncture fraternal telegrams arrived from the Liberals of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, San Francisco, London, and Paris. They were read by Rev. Moses Hull, who was appointed to draft replies. The following is a copy of what was wired to all the cities:

"The Liberals of eastern Ohio and western Pennsylvania, believing the 'Age of Reason' is here, and hoping in all things to be governed by 'Common Sense,' are determined in any 'Crisis' to unite with the Liberals of ——, and all others, in the defense of the 'Rights of Man.'"

He certainly drew on his imagination for telegrams from over the big pond. True, we received telegrams and replied as above, but none from over or under the sea. The Leader's report has such a sweetly solemn ring that I feel inclined to forgiv its inaccuracies and giv its concluding paragraphs. Here they are:

"Upon opening the Sunday session another of 'God's tunes' was utilized, 'Coronation,' and the Rev. A. B. Bradford delivered an address entitled, 'The Model Saints of the Bible,' the chief aim of which was to destroy Christian confidence in the virtue, honesty, and veracity of Lot, Tamar, Rahab, David, Solomon, Jacob, Abraham, and Guiteau, and others, whom the speaker classed as 'saints of the church,' the latter allusion being a characteristic outrage upon truth and equity.

"In referring to the question of Mormonism the speaker mentioned the large anti-Mormon meeting to be held that night at Erie, Pa., and his sentiments on the question were ordered to be put in the form of resolutions, which were immediately adopted as a text for the guidance of the League. The following are the resolutions:

WHEREAS, Polygamy has insidiously fastened itself as a cancer upon one of the territories of the Union, and threatens to extend its evil influence into others, thus destroying the homogeneousness of our institutions and endangering the peace of the country;

WHEREAS, Polygamy is a Bible institution, practiced by the most eminent of the Old Testament saints—Abraham, Jacob, David and Solomon, all of whom are indorsed as models and exemplars of the saving grace of faith by the apostle Paul, in the eleventh chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews;

WHEREAS, The arguments used by our foreign missionaries long ago, in justifying themselvs for admitting polygamists into the mission churches, as good Christians, hav never been answered, viz.: That besides being positivly permitted in the Old Testament, it is nowhere condemned in the New Testament, but is connived at, if not tacitly approved, by Paul in 1 Tim. iii, 2, where he requires a bishop to be the husband of one wife, clearly teaching by implication that other church-members might hav more than one; therefore,

1. Resolved, That in the judgment of this meeting it is both inconsistent and impossible for the Congress of the United States to extirpate polygamy by law so long as it can be claimed to be, as it is by the Mormons in Utah territory, a religious institution sanctioned in the Bible, and sanctified by the example of 'saints,' whose lives are held up to us as models by the 'inspired' apostle Paul in his epistle to the Hebrews.

2. Resolved, That in view of these obvious facts, the first thing to be done by the American church, before it can consistently file its protest against polygamy, is to disarm the Mormons of their only weapon of defense by declaring the truth that the Bible is not, neither does it claim to be, a plenary and infallibly inspired standard of faith and morals; and that it condemns the polygamous lives of the Old Testament saints as wrong, together with the indorsement of the same by the alleged approval of God in the case of David (see 1 Kings xv, 5), and by the apostle Paul in the cases of the other polygamists who are named and canonized by him in his epistle to the Hebrews.

3. Resolved, That in view of the insidious origin of slavery, another Old Testament institution, and what it cost the American people in blood and treasure to abolish it, it is the judgment of this meeting that Congress, during the territorial status of Utah, has the only alternativ, in regard to Mormonism, either to let it entirely alone, trusting to the general spread of knowledge, and the monogamic influences of our civilization, ultimately to cure the evil of polygamy, or to destroy it immediately and relentlessly by the sword as a political nuisance; since history in general, and the history of Mormonism in particular, proves that the persecution of any religious creed or church as such has only had the effect of making it grow and strengthen more than it otherwise would. The people of the United States, in the exercise of their sovereign power as a nation, hav the same right, in Congress assembled, to suppress polygamy in any state or territory as a political evil, that they would hav to suppress an organization for setting up an independent kingly government on the soil and under the flag of the republic.

"In the evening the opera house was crowded again, standing room not being obtainable at the hour of commencement. The oration to Paine's memory was thrillingly delivered by Rev. Burnham. The thread of his argument was taken up by Rev. Moses Hull, who blasphemously remarked that 'if Tamar and Lot had lived in the nineteenth century, they would now be inmates of the penitentiary.'

"He was followed by Mrs. Mattie Hull, whose talk was chiefly concentrated upon the subject of rearing children to become men and women in the true sense of the word, fit to be heirs of nineteenth century knowledge, and fit to beget heirs worthy of transmitting that knowledge to.

"O. P. Kellog, a well-known Ohio Infidel ranter, was also in great demand at each session of the convention, and his speeches, always highly humorous, were received with great applause. At the close of each session an invitation was given to join the League. On each occasion there was a big rush to sign, notwithstanding the fact that each signer had to put up one dollar as entrance money to paradise (?) through the Infidel gate. Such were the attraction of the blasphemous lecturer, and the enthusiasm aroused, that old and young of both sexes pressed forward in their eagerness to cast off the faith of their fathers, which is the hope of the world, and become Liberals or Infidels. An old churchman, who was present, gazed with the Leader man at the sad spectacle, and remarked, with tears in his eyes, that he had rather died than hav witnessed such a sight.

"All the aforementioned speakers took part in the exercises today, and a fresh batch of 'converts' were gathered in. The meeting concluded this evening with a ball, which, in a social sense, was a highly enjoyable affair, but such a termination is an additional eye-sore to the good Christian people of Linesville. Said one to the reporter to-night: 'It is hellish! It is the incarnation of hellishness! These Infidels are like savages; having captured their victims, they are now indulging in a war-dance over them. God help them! It looks as though they had the bleeding souls of their victims hanging from their belts, like so many gory scalps.'"

One of my neighbors informs me that the Pittsburgh Dispatch also had a report, but as I hav not seen it I can say nothing about it.

In conclusion, permit me to say that Mattie and I came here over one year ago to stay only ten days. We were importuned to stay one year. Now they want us more another year than they did the first. They are laboring, with hopes of success, to raise money to keep us another year.

Everybody speaks well of THE TRUTH SEEKER. May it liv forever. MOSES HULL.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

It is with pleasure we inform you and our friends generally that all went merry as a marriage bell. We could not hav desired better success. A large audience, enthusiastic and appreciativ, attended each session.

Many good things were said, among which is one worth noting. Our lady speaker, Mme. El-D. Louie, gave a most eloquent and able address, which ought to hav been published, in which she fired hot shot into the enemy's camp with most admirable effect. This speaker made reference to the stupidity, or, perhaps, perverseness, of people who persist in calling Infidels Atheists, and referred to Mr. Davidge in the late Guiteau case, who spoke of "Tom Paine, the Atheist," adding that she hoped no reporter present (there were several) would make so absurd a mistake, and then explained Paine's religion. And we are proud to add that not one paper used the term Atheist in their notices the following day—the first time, we believe, that the enemies of Thomas Paine ever spoke respectfully of him. We are indebted to the wit, tact, and courage of a new lady worker in the fold of Liberalism for this reform in the press.

We must not omit to state that the leading ladies of the society gave a complimentary supper consisting of the most choice viands, at which nearly fifty people participated. Yours for progress, B. T.

WASHINGTON.

At the anniversary celebration of the birthday of Thomas Paine in Washington last Monday, Mr. W. H. Burr paid the following tribute to the memory of the great revolutionary patriot:

"For nearly a century the name of Thomas Paine has been the synonym of diabolism. And yet I challenge the world to show a single smirch on his moral character. He was the most secretiv of men, and yet the most conscientious. So secretiv was he that he was scarcely known as an author until he wrote the 'Rights of Man,' in 1791. Paine was then fifty-four years of age. His 'Common Sense,' published in January, 1776, and his 'Crisis,' in sixteen numbers, from December, 1776, till December, 1783, were all anonymous. If his name appeared in any of the many editions it was without his sanction. As an author he was known only under the nom de plume 'Common Sense.' He was fifty-six years of age before he wrote a sentence that would indicate what were his religious views. Nor would he hav written his 'Age of Reason' as early as 1793, if he had not apprehended speedy death by the guillotin. He intended that work as his last offering to the world; and the fact that the first part of it was hurriedly written, with the guillotin impending over him, ought to silence imputation upon the purity of his motiv. His earliest biographers were British tories and libelers. Oldys (a fictitious name) insinuated, in 1791, that Paine was dismissed from the excise office in 1765 for dishonesty, and attempted to adduce evidence that his second dismissal, in 1774, was for dealing as a grocer in smuggled tobacco. The British tory, Cheetham, in 1809, though a miserable defamer, acquitted Paine of the charge in the first instance and dared not indorse it in the second. And yet a recent author has stated in his book that Paine was twice dismissed for smuggling. The charge is baseless and false, as I hav publicly proved. During the last year or two of Paine's service as exciseman he had to continue the business of his deceased father-in-law, who was a grocer and tobacconist, and all the foundation for the imaginary charge is that tobacco and snuff were excisable articles. The cause of Paine's dismissal in either case does not appear. But that it was not for any moral delinquency is apparent from the fact that his superior in office, George Lewis Scott, a former tutor of Prince George III., and co-editor of Chambers's Cyclopedia, first sought to restore Paine to the service, and failing in that recommended him to Benjamin Franklin. Before the year closed Franklin sent Paine to America, with recommendations as tutor or surveyor. I find that Paine did some surveying in America, and that employment as tutor in private families was offered to him on advantageous terms, but whether he accepted the offer does not appear. He also began to write anonymously for the Pennsylvania Magazine, and it is said he engaged to do so for £25 a year; but he certainly made no such engagement at first, as appears by his letter to Franklin, March 4th; and I cannot believe that he was ever paid for his contributions to that magazine. Indeed, I hav recently discovered him again in England in the fall of 1775. What took him back so suddenly? I think I can guess. It was reported that he started the manufacture of saltpeter in America. That must have been a ruse. Saltpeter requires two or three years to be produced artificially. It is a natural product of India, whence Great Britain gets all her supplies. In October, 1775, General Washington had penned up General Howe in Boston. The people wondered why our army did not attack the town. The reason was that the Continentals had not five rounds of powder to a man. This secret Washington told to Franklin in camp at the time. In December following Franklin writes to a friend in Paris, saying, 'We are endeavoring to make saltpeter,' but he wants the merchants to send 'both arms and ammunition, of which the bearer, Mr. Storey, can more fully inform you,' and Franklin incloses £100 to his friend to pay for his time and expenses in promoting that object. Paine at this time was either on his way back to America or had returned. And I hav a right to infer that he had gone on a similar mission just after the breaking out of hostilities, April 19, 1775. Without saltpeter independence was impossible.

"It is said that Paine was intemperate, and some fanatics say intemperance is a crime. In itself it is no more a crime than insanity. Intemperance is a misfortune, but it is scarcely an evil, except from its injurious results. If Paine was ever a drunkard, which has not been proven, his intoxication never harmed either himself nor anybody else.

"He came out of prison in Paris with an abscess in his side and recovering from a fever. Possibly as a sick man he took too much wine or spirits; but during the last seven years of his life in this country he was practically a temperate man, and his death at the age of seventy-two was never charged to intemperance. It is a certified fact that his daily allowance was one glass of rum sweetened at dinner, and he lived at a time when almost everybody drank at least that much, and at a time when writers on temperance said a pint of rum a day was all that any man ought to drink. It has always been presumed that Paine was a poor man. His wants were few, but that he always had a moderate independence I hav no doubt whatever.

"He held public office altogether some fourteen years—eleven years as exciseman, with a salary of £50; nearly two years as clerk to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in America, at a salary, I believe, of $700, which, in Continental money, was worth not more than $250, and one year as clerk of the Pennsylvania Legislature, at a salary of $500, all of which he gave to save Washington's army. He also accompanied Col. Laurens to France, where a loan was procured, which enabled the combined Continental and French armies to defeat Cornwallis at Yorktown, for which service he was never paid by Congress. He did, however, after the war, receive £500 in currency from the state of Pennsylvania, and a confiscated farm from New York, which in the course of twenty odd years got to be valued at nearly $30,000. But this $500 in American currency and the meager proceeds of the farm could not hav supported him abroad for fifteen years, and when he died, in 1809, he left $1,500 in bank-stock. Whence, then, his life-long resources? Whence his moderate independence, which he kept a secret from everybody?

"I will tell you. He spent several years at sea in his youth as a privateersman, and got to be known, it is said, as captain or commodore. He probably left that service with a considerable share of prize money. His conscience doubtless revolted at that piratical but legalized calling, and he resolved to use the unjustly-acquired money in doing good to mankind.

"Let us now turn to Paine's literary work. Before me lie his so-called complete works, in three volumes. They are not much read now, but I find in them more political and religious wisdom than in any other three volumes I ever read. Of his first great work, 'Common Sense,' more than one hundred thousand were sold, all the profits whereon accrued to the colonies, to which he gave the copyright.

"His 'Crisis' followed at intervals through the Revolution, and was extensivly published; but Paine took no profit from either publication. Of his next great work, the 'Rights of Man,' 1791–'92, nearly half a million were sold in England, besides translations in other countries. Paine gave away all the profits on that work. 'In a great affair where the happiness of man is at stake,' says he, in 1802, 'I love to work for nothing.' 'I take neither copyright nor profit,' says he, in 1807, 'from anything I publish.' These three volumes were supposed to be Paine's complete works by the man, now living in Philadelphia, who spent some $4,000 many years ago in their publication. But they are not Paine's complete works. In January, 1872, exactly one hundred years to a day from the date of the last letter of 'Junius,' I announced publicly the discovery, and exhibited the first copy of the book demonstrating that Paine was 'Junius.' In January, 1879, I found an anonymous pamphlet, published in this city in 1803, entitled 'Plain Sense,' which I at once identified as the work of Paine.

"In October, 1880, I discovered in the Congressional library a bound copy of an English weekly paper, entitled The Crisis, published from January, 1775, till July, 1776, part of the same being republished in America, in which I detected the hand of Paine, who, as 'Casca,' contributed about thirty numbers. Among these was an extra number, entitled 'A Crisis Extraordinary,' printed also as a separate pamphlet, which the learned librarian, Spofford, had identified before me as the work of Paine. These contributions by 'Casca,' who was unknown to the publisher, were all in the style of Junius, and in advocacy of the cause of America. Much more may yet be found, I doubt not, of Paine's secret work, and I know the man who hopes to be able to spend five years in the research. 'I am the sole depository of my own secret,' said Junius, 'and it shall perish with me.' But critical analysis, like the spectroscope which reveals the composition of the stars, has discovered that secret.

"The letters of Junius are probably the most vigorous and faultless specimens of human eloquence the world has ever seen, except in the works of Thomas Paine. But what is eloquence without a cause? Junius meant the cause of the people, and so did Paine. Paine alone, of the forty or more writers on whose behalf a claim has been set up, answers to all the characteristics and redeems all the pledges of Junius. Paine, like Junius, peremptorily refused to receive any profit from his work. There is not such another parallel in all time. Indeed, I am not able to discover a single other example. 'I hav lived an honest and useful life to mankind,' says Paine in his last will and testament; 'my time has been spent in doing good, and I die in perfect composure and resignation to the will of my creator, God.'

"Paine and Franklin made this nation. It is not his political work, but his 'Age of Reason,' that is the bugbear in America. And yet the sentiments of 'The Age of Reason' are now enunciated from some of our popular pulpits. But before he wrote a word on religion he was an awful bugbear in England. Writing to Americans in 1820, he says, 'The government of England honored me with a thousand martyrdoms by burning me in effigy in every town in that country.' I think I know as much of Paine's life and works as any living man, and I know of no great historical character who combined in himself such brilliant genius, disinterested benevolence, stern integrity, noble ambition, life-long persistency, and world-wide philanthropy."

CHICAGO, ILL.

A Chicago paper reports as follows the celebration by the Scandinavian Freethinking Society of that city, and the Chicago Liberal League:

"The fifteenth annual celebration of the birth of Thomas Paine was held last evening at No. 228 Milwaukee avenue, under the auspices of the Scandinavian Freethinking Society. About one hundred and fifty persons were present, the sexes being about equally represented, and almost all were of Scandinavian birth. An oil painting of Paine hung above the speaker's stand, flanked by portraits of Ingersoll and other noted champions of Freethought. Mr. Marc Thrane, president of the society, occupied the chair, and introduced Gen. I. N. Stiles, who was received with applause.

"Gen. Stiles complimented his audience on their devotion to the memory of Paine, the patriot, lover of liberty, and champion of Freethought. In all ages, and among all peoples, the man who dared to entertain a belief as to matters of religion differing from that accepted by the great majority had been despised and persecuted. Even at this day a Freethinker was looked upon by the orthodox as a dangerous man. The speaker could not see why all men should be called on to think alike about religion any more than about politics, and referred to the attempt to incorporate the name of God in the United States Constitution, to which he was, of course, opposed. Men knew nothing about God, and the idea of men trying to figure out the attributes of a supreme being was like a couple of musketoes giving their idea of mankind. All the speaker knew of God was that he knew nothing, and didn't believe anybody else knew any more. He was content to liv for this life, trying to behave rightly toward his family and neighbors, and to do right as far as he knew how, and to leave a future life to take care of itself. If, as Paine believed, a great and wise being did exist, it would certainly be safe to trust him for the future. Thomas Paine did as much as any one man to enlighten public opinion in the British colonies, and to render the establishment of the American republic possible and successful. The priestly crew had striven for years to blacken his memory, and had falsely alleged that he was a drunkard and a blasphemer, and had died a horrible death, suffering the pangs of terrible remorse. But all priests were enemies of Freethought, and all they wanted was that men should believe, and pay. And religion that tended to make men better was good, but not a religion that preferred canting hypocrits and praying humbugs to honest men who tried to do right, but could not believe in priestly intercession.

"A feast song, written for the occasion, was sung by a quartet to the tune of 'Greenland's Icy Mountains.' Capt. Langs followed with an interesting sketch of the life and public services of Paine, delivered in Swedish, and Dr. Paoli made a stirring address in the Norwegian tongue. Singing, music, and dancing closed the evening, which was much enjoyed by all present.

"The Chicago Liberal League met at the corner of Madison and Halsted streets last evening, for a similar purpose. The attendance was large, and the occasion interesting. James K. Magie, the president of the League, presided, and the exercises consisted of singing, brief addresses laudatory of the life and services of Paine in the cause of Freethought, and recitations. Gen. I. N. Stiles was the orator of the evening, and, besides paying a high tribute to Paine, gave expression to some of his individual religious views, holding that doubt was the key to thought, and that the foundation of the churches depended upon their ability to make the people believe in their peculiar tenets without thinking, and that if Paine lived in this age he would be behind the times, for, while he believed in a God, the people were now seriously inquiring into that part of the faith. He was followed with poems by Messrs. Stevens and Sloan, recitations by Misses Emma Bishop and Alpha Magie, songs by Mr. Peck, and brief addresses by Benjamin Sibley, Mrs. Mills, Prof. Cohey, and others."

OREGON, MO., Jan. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: At the beginning of the new year, I feel it my duty, after having reviewed THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last six weeks or more, to congratulate you on its management. Such variety, ability, and general excellence in selection of articles and letters published never before hav been surpassed, if ever equaled, in any publication. Not too much of any one—just enough of all.

Yours truly, CLARKE IRVINE.

EASTMANVILLE, MICH., Jan. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find funds to pay for TRUTH SEEKER for the coming year, together with a little more to be used as directed. I wish you all the good luck possible, and hope in due time to hear of the safe return of the traveler to the bosom of his family and his many friends. W. AMIGH.

CARBONDALE, KAN., Jan. 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: For forty-five years I hav been a reader and author of literature and science, hav admired and written many editorials, and can truly say that no one has ever gratified me so much as that I hav just read, "Christianity as a Civilizer," in the last TRUTH SEEKER. It is well worth the subscription price of the paper for one year. The false claims of the Christian system must be exposed, the war must go into Africa, and there this editorial ably carries it. The defensiv position we take is generally appropriate and efficient, while at times the aggressiv is demanded and even made efficient.

"Lay on, Macduff!
And damned be he wh first cries, hold, enough!"

Inclosed I send you stamps for copies, to be sent as directed, trusting the good seed will spring up and bear fruit in the honest minds of the readers. Being powerful, the truth in the hands of its wise, faithful friends must prevail. If crushed to the earth, 'twill rise gain.

The time draws nigh when traders will no longer need to conceal their honest common sense doubts to escape superstitious scorn, and to hold their customers. I am glad to find myself among the honorable seekers of truth and liberty. As I am lecturing to free the mind, it would be gratifying to read letters from this class. As each one of us already free and getting free learns to become more activ in disseminating truth to make others free, life to all will become more reasonable and enjoyable.

W. PERKINS.

MARSHALL, KAN., Jan. 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Liberals everywhere are agitating the question of woman suffrage. Are they not hastening their own ruin by such a course? I think they are, and this is why I think so: Woman has always been the main stay of the church. She has always favored church rule and church persecution, and she favors it still. Giv her the law-making power to-day and we will hav an adopted church to-morrow. Then our religious liberty which we are all laboring for would be like Tom's tune, "Over the hills and far away." This is my view of the situation. I may be wrong, but I verily believe that if women were enfranchised now it would not be ten years before such men as Colonel Ingersoll and D. M. Bennett would hav to "shell out" to help pay the preacher, and keep very mum in the mean time. S. V. MULKEY.

EATON, MICH., Jan. 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I seldom sit under the droppings of the sanctuary, but recently it became my duty to attend the funeral of one of my neighbors. The pastor of the Baptist church of the city was called upon to speak consoling words to the mourning friends, and among the absurd things that he said was that the great plan of salvation to save a lost world was concocted and decreed by the Father and Son long before the foundation of the world that the Son must suffer and die—that there was no other way whereby man could be saved from his sins. Now, it occurs to me if this is all true the other part of the story, the fall of man, must also hav been decreed by the same great author of all things to make the great plan of any effect. I asked one of the leading members of the Methodist church his opinion on this subject. He said that he did not believe anything of the kind. He said that God placed man here and gave him a choice, but did not know which course he would pursue, thus denying the foreknowledge of God. The old saying came into my mind, "When doctors disagree, who shall decide?" The application of the sermon to the deceased, as far as his future destiny is concerned, was to consign him to that everlasting bottomless pit, he, being an unbeliever, never having had his sins washed out by the blood of the Lamb. Glorious consolation to the bereaved widow and weeping children and the aged father, who was thus called upon to part with his only son, the staff of his declining years. When will such mockery come to an end? I, for one, hav requested my family and friends to allow no such nonsense to be performed over my remains. Yours truly, A. ATWOOD.

FARLEY, IOWA, Jan. 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just returned from a short trip into Wisconsin, where I met many Liberal friends, and am glad to report that the cause of Freethought is rapidly gaining ground in the badger state. I had a short visit with one of your subscribers, T. G. Collins, at Jamestown. He is zealous in the cause, and is a warm friend of Mr. Bennett. I think that he will continue to take THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as he livs, for he likes it well. He had the sad misfortune to lose one of his daughters, Mrs. Carl Sweet, on the 15th inst. Mrs. Sweet was twenty-nine years old, the mother of three small children, and, like father, mother, and husband, was a solid Liberal. All the friends being of the Liberal type, no religious services were held. The remains were quietly lowered into the grave, after which the family called at the house of a neighbor and partook of a good, warm supper, and spent the evening there in social converse, interspersed with vocal and instrumental music. I like this much better than the old Christian way of filling the friends with fear of hell and the worm that never dies.

While on my trip I learned of one Catholic church that had lost eighty of its male members, who were excommunicated for joining the Odd-Fellows' order. Their wives also left the church, and do not allow their children to attend. They were all Germans.

The Methodists held a three-weeks' "revival" at Jamestown this winter, and failed to get a convert. The church there numbers eleven members. When the old fogies die off the church will be for sale, for the young people are nearly all Liberals. We are not so well organized in the West as are the Liberal forces in parts of the East, but in almost every village and hamlet there are one or more individuals that are at work circulating our literature, and doing a little talking as occasion offers; and I think we hav reason to rejoice at the strides our cause is making throughout the West.

I will say to the Oregon liar that I hav no knowledge of any such colony in Iowa as he mentions, but "if the truth of God hath more abounded through his (the liar's) lie unto his (God's) glory, why should he (the liar) be judged a sinner?" Go on, brother, lying and slander are the main stock in the Christian storehouse. You hav one consolation, you will never be scarce of stock as long as there are any Christians to peddle it. Now, in closing let me urge every subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER to keep the papers on the move; don't destroy them; don't waste them; but hand them to some one, or mail them to those whom you think will read them. One paper, one article, may change the tide and secure to us a good worker. I hav known several such cases. If any of you hav Liberal papers that you can't use, send them to me, and I will use them as I have indicated. Wishing Bro. Bennett and the paper prosperity, I am, Yours truly, H. GILMORE.

CARROLLTON, ILL., Jan. 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to know if you are acquainted with Mr. Jeremiah Hacker, of Berlin, N. J., and the circumstances surrounding him? I find that he is now nearly 81 years old, with a poor, helpless wife, and no one to take care of either of them; and, also, without means of support. As I believe him to be a worthy old philanthropist, I think it would be a very charitable act to get up a subscription for his benefit, to assist him in getting through the winter. If my memory serves me he is the same man that Mr. Vale used to speak of some forty years ago, when he published the New York Beacon. If so, he has had rather a hard life, and I understand he is now almost without any means of support. Now, Mr. Editor, if you think my opinions are well founded and publish this letter, together with your approbation, you can open a subscription with my name for $10. If you think that I am laboring under a mistake, please inform me.

Sincerely yours, WM. BLACK.

[Mr. Black is not mistaken; Jeremiah Hacker is a worthy man for the Liberals to aid. He is old and without means. He is deserving, and has done a great deal for Liberalism.—ED. T. S.]

A Happy Land.

[Contributed.]

What constitutes a happy land? Where every one is free,
And none shall crouch in fear or to a despot bend
the knee;
Where e'en the weakest proud may walk erect before the strong,
And in the land no right exists that's founded on a wrong;

Where none a million acres holds with vassals at his call,
Whilst 'mong a million toiling slaves there's not one foot for all;
Where none dares claim a right divine his fellow-men to bind,
And superstition has not put its fetters on the mind!

Where none shall say, "By birth we rule, to serve us you are bound;"
Another, "In our sacred book all truth is to be found!"
Where men shall speak their honest thoughts, nor fear the social ban,
And woman will in everything the equal be of man;

Where ignorance and crime shall cease, and education's door
Be opened wide, and priests and kings and war shall be no more;
Where reciprocity will reign, and each one feel there can
No higher thing for worship be than liberty for man!

Where none is called a Socialist who thinks he should be free,
A Nihilist who dares to break the chains of slavery!
Assassin who, of all bereft—friends, children, home, and wife—
In righteous frenzy lifts his hand to take a monster's life!

Say, speak! shall they who faint and choke not seek an atmosphere
Of purer air? They pant to feel the air that we breathe here!
They ask for food and get but steel; for drink, and get but lead;
For shelter, lo! a dungeon theirs; for rest, a grave their bed!

We see a shell upon the shore and pluck it from the strand,
Yet seldom think the thing we hold so lightly in the hand
Once held a life—a being dwelt within this narrow cell;
A stronger power crushed its life and left it but a shell!

Look round the world—the shores of time with wrecks like this are strewn
Of human lives of men like us who only asked the boon
To liv, aye, but to breathe, and in their day in peace to dwell.
With freedom gone, say, what is life? and man,
what but a shell?

O happy land, born of my dreams, where will thy birthplace be?
Where all exultingly can cry, "We feel, we know we're free?"
Yet through the clouds I see the light; ere long the world shall find,
The glorious sun of freedom bursting forth upon mankind!

The Gage of Prayer.

As Satan passed through heaven
From a walk on earth, one day,
The Lord looked up and questioned him—
"Didst hear my creatures pray?"
"Ay, Lord! I heard thy prayer resound
Where'er I listening stood;
But, by my soul! not one of them
Prayed for his brother's good!"

Then looked Jehovah fire and flame,
And spake this fierce decree:
"Who makes a selfish prayer is thine;
The others come to me!"
Then all that night on heaven's walls
The Lord and Satan stood
To see how many sons of men
Would ask a brother's good.

Alas! they watched there many an hour,
And yet there came no sounds;
The poor they prayed for pennies, and
The rich they prayed for pounds;
The ugly prayed for beauty, and
The awkward prayed for grace;
The old ones prayed for youthful looks
To hide a wrinkled face;
The limping prayed for healthy joints;
The red-haired prayed for brown;
The short ones prayed for longer legs;
The long to be cut down;
The brown-eyed prayed for blue ones;
The cross-eyed prayed for straight;
The fat ones prayed for melting down;
The lean ones prayed for weight;
The doctors prayed for sickness, and
The undertaker, death;
The captivs prayed for sunshine, and
The phthisicy for breath;
The maiden prayed for lover's vows;
The soldier prayed for war;
The beggar prayed for horse to ride;
The drunkard prayed for "more;"
The sick man prayed for break of day,
The thief for longer night;
The miser prayed for more of gold;
The blind man prayed for sight.

At last there came a tearful voice
Up to the starlit sky:
"Oh! may my uncle's soul this night Rest with the Lord on high!"
"There's one for me!" Jehovah cries,
"Not so!" the devil said;
He's heir to all his uncle's wealth,
Hence wants the old man dead!"

Just then there came another voice,
In supplicating tones:
"Oh! may the grave be late to close O'er neighbor David's bones!"
"There's surely one for me at last!"
But Satan cried, "Not yet!"
He merely wants the man to liv
Until he pays a debt!"

And so they waited till the stars
Went out at dawn of day;
Then Satan seized his bags of souls
And sped his homeward way.
Upon high heaven's glittering wall
Long had they listening stood,
But not a mortal all that night
Prayed for his brother's good!

Progress.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER,

Sir; There is so much truth and withal so much of prophecy and promis to our country, and, it seems to me, to Utah in particular, and (I think) so much to cheer and comfort the few friends of Freethought and equal rights out here who are watching the little patch of blue which begins to show itself through the dense clouds of superstition that hav hung over this part of our fair country so long, in the inclosed editorial article which I hav cut from the Salt Lake Tribune, that I concluded I would send it to you, thinking perhaps you would deem it worthy a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Respectfully,

WALTER WALKER.

It has been remarked that it is not to religion we owe our liberty to be and do as men, our safety in person and property, our advantages and comforts as civilized beings; it is to invention issuing in the industrial arts. The arts of working stone, bronze, and iron, the invention of movable alphabetical type and of the steam engin, hav made the chief epochs in history, not the founding of new religions. Science is now closely crowding on the heels of industry, but is rather its handmaid than its rival. Society, polity, morality, art, literature, religion itself, hav in all ages followed, not preceded, mechanism. The orators, poets, priests, artists, philosophers, and statesman did not exist as separate classes until mechanical and industrial art had provided means for their support. The superiority of our time is primarily due, not to the greater purity of our religion, or excellence of our poetry, or wisdom of our philosophers, but to the possession of improved tools, which hav enhanced the results of labor, enabled men to liv with more security and comfort, given them leisure, opportunity, and motiv to educate themselvs, and thus, while securing them from invasion and conquest by savage foes, carried them to higher intellectual and moral conditions.

To any one who has closely studied the course of human affairs, progress is the great fact which they illustrate, and its steady gathering of weight and momentum in spite of successiv reverses, until it has come to hav all the characteristics of destiny, or rather of immutable law, operating in human affairs as well as pervading all nature, is exceedingly impressiv. How futil must be all opposition to it, all expectation that it will be arrested, all belief that it is in itself wrong! As De Tocqueville says of Democracy, "The various occurrences of natural history hav everywhere turned to its advantage; all men hav aided it by their exertions, those who hav fought against it as well as those who hav labored in its cause—all hav been driven along one track, all hav been instruments in the hand of God." And Burke, after exerting his god-like powers for years in resistance of progress because it was accompanied by the wild excesses of the mad Frenchmen of '73, as if under conviction that his herculean labors were vain, that he had been contending against the inevitable, says at the close: "If a great change is to be made in human affairs, the minds of men will be fitted to it, the general opinion and feeling will draw that way. Every fear, every hope will forward it, and then they who persist in opposing this weighty current in human affairs will appear rather to resist the decrees of providence itself than the designs of men. They will not be resolute and firm, but perverse and obstinate." Burke might well hav dispensed with his "if" in this magnificent delivery, and had he done so no saying of the Hebrew seers would hav been more truly prophetic. Even in France, which for some years in Burke's time might fitly hav been compared to an eruption of hell, progress at last triumphs gloriously after a century of reverse. The greatest nation that ever existed, greatest in every sense, and still in its toddling infancy, on the noblest field afforded by this planet, is proving the truth of Burke's foreboding and of De Tocqueville's inference from history. In the last twenty years this nation has, in the face of obstacles which made all but the very greatest men faint with apprehension, destroyed slavery, not only within the national limits, but everywhere, and placed the liberty of men under the protection of law in practice as well as in theory, so that reactionary forces can never prevail against it. The sun of progress has dissipated the clouds that obscured its face, it fills all the western sky with resplendence, and, by the power of illustrious example above, it is driving injustice and oppression from its strongholds in the Old World.

A quarter of a century ago this great nation pronounced the doom of polygamy, and every little while it is taunted, by men in Utah, with having pronounced that doom in vain. The great drama or tragedy which has been enacting through these years on the national stage appears to hav been lost on these men. They seem to think that the divine law of progress is to prove abortiv in the presence of this crime against God and human nature. They talk about miracles, about the miracles of the golden plates, and of the establishment of the Mormon church. What is it in comparison with the miracle of the resurrection of a world from the darkness and thralldom of the middle ages, of the religious and political emancipation of mankind, of the founding and growth of this nation? As the glow-worm's spark to the full glory of the midday sun is all they pride themselvs upon compared with what the American citizen justly prides himself upon. They are so shrouded in darkness that they do not even see how the doom of polygamy is silently being effected. In the first place, material progress, the building of railroads, working of mines, and increase of trade, is emancipating the people of Utah. Ten years ago they had to kneel before Brigham Young's despotism or starve. Where now is that despotism? The resident of Utah in 1868, or for some years thereafter, would not now recognize it as the same country, and this applies to the church people vastly more than to business. Business success and business opportunity hav largely opened the eyes of the Mormons to the undesirability and impracticability of continuing their former policy, and to-day their chief organ is daily denying that they ever held certain monstrous doctrins which they hav been compelled to abandon. That polygamy must and will speedily follow in the wake of these disowned monstrosities is as sure as to-morrow's sunrise. This in obedience to the inevitable law of progress, and because of the almighty forces and influences everywhere working against follies and abuses. The immediate cause will be the recovery of men's reason and independence through the improvement of enlarged business opportunities. Twelve years ago Utah was as dead materially as it was religiously, and in both it was the counterpart of Europe before the recovery of the lost arts and the discovery of new arts led to its resurrection from the death of the middle ages. The immense material benefits of railroading and mining to Utah hav done much for her already. They would do infinitly more were her social and political institutions made to conform to those of the rest of this country. It is this that will compel it to be done, and soon.

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories, of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. 3m53

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY

THE
Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN
D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.
(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authorit of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progres and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT conscience dictates to be done, or warns me not to do;
This teach me more than hell to shun; that more than heaven pursue.—Pope.

THE Mohammedans say their Koran was written by God. The Hindoos say the Vedas were; we say the Bible was, and we are but interested witnesses in deciding absolutely and exclusivly for ourselvs. If it be immeasurably the highest of the three, it is not because it is the most divine, but the most human. It does not differ from them in kind; and it seems to me that in ascribing it to God we are doing a double dishonor; to ourselvs, for want of faith in our souls' strength, and to God, in making him responsible for our weakness. There is nothing in it but what men might hav written; much, oh! much which it would drive me mad to think any but men—and most miserable men—had written.—Froude's Nemesis.

IT is by being taught to contemplate himself as an outlaw, as an outcast, as a beggar, as a mumper, as one thrown, as it were, on a dunghill, at an immense distance from his creator, and who must make his approaches by creeping and cringing to intermediate beings that man conceives either a contemptuous disregard for everything under the name of religion, or turns what he calls devout. In the latter case, he consumes his life in grief. He calls himself a worm, and the fertil earth a dunghill. He despises the choicest gift of God to man—the gift of reason—and having endeavored to force upon himself the belief of a system against which reason revolts, he ungratefully calls it human reason, as if man could giv reason to himself.—Paine's Age of Reason.

THE maxim of "doing as we would be done unto" does not include the strange doctrin of loving our enemies; for no man expects to be loved himself for his crimes, or for his enmity. It is not incumbent on man to reward a bad action with a good one, or to return good for evil; and wherever it is done, it is a voluntary act, and not a duty. It is also absurd to suppose that such doctrins can make any part of a revealed religion. We imitate the moral character of the creator by forbearing with each other, for he forbears with all; but this doctrin would imply that God loved man, not in proportion as he was good, but as he was bad.—Paine's Age of Reason.

SOME men, who are vain of their fine feelings, ove themselvs dearly, but hav little regard for the ndividuals about them. They are very polite to extraneous society; but follow them home and see how they conduct themselvs toward their family. Very sad is the story told by the late Dean Ramsay, of Edinburgh, of a little boy who was told of heaven, and of the meeting of the departed there. "And will faather be there?" he asked. On being told that "of course, he will be there," the child at once replied, "Then I'll no gang."—Dr. Sam. Smiles.

MAKE not thyself an underling to a foolish man; neither accept the person of the mighty. Strive for the truth unto death, and the Lord shall fight for thee. Be not hasty with thy tongue, and in thy deeds slack and remiss. Be not as a lion in thy house, nor frantic among thy servants. Let not thy hand be stretched out to receive, and shut when thou shouldst repay.—Ecclesiasticus iv, 27-31.

IT is childish to talk of a devil who tempts to do vil—humiliating to common sense and manhood to fear eternal punishment if we hav done evil—and what grosser superstition has the world ever seen than the Christian doctrin of God, incarnate in man, that we might all hav a better chance of heaven—a better chance, mind you; not a cerainty? and the whole universe disturbed that we might be less unfairly handicapped? No, no, my friends! man is only part of the whole—a unit of the sum, and there is no more value in his life than there is in the life of a fly or an ant, save such as he makes for himself by his higher intelligence. We hav to liv for humanity, not for our own souls. Never let us forget that. Our duty is here—our work is here; we know nothing but life—can prove nothing but matter—and to waste our strength in vague speculations on things that are unprovable is the sorriest use to which we can put it.—Under Which Lord? by Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

"TRUTH," retorted Hermione, disdainfully. "How do you or any of us know what truth is?" "We may all of us know what it is not, if we cease to use our senses," replied Mr. Fullerton. "Is it not a collection of Old World fables, current at a time science was nowhere, when the laws of evidence were not understood; and when men were so ignorant that they could be made to believe the most monstrous lies which the imagination could invent; just as the Breton peasantry of our own day are made to believe in trumped up miracles."—Under Which Lord? by Mrs. E. Lynn Lynton.

IT is the womanly nature of the mythical Jesus that is most admired and venerated. His love, forbearance tenderness, and non-resistance, are all womanly traits, and hav made him the idol of civilization for eighteen hundred years. These virtues hav been exalted and exaggerated, and his manly traits hav been kept in the background, and thus his name has become the synonym for all that is beautiful and god-like. But Infidels are now searching out his manly traits; they are showing up his revengeful, cruel, murderous instincts, his domineering tyranny, and overmastering propensity to rule or ruin! The command to hav his enemies brought up before him and slain is never commented upon by his admirers, because it is not the outburst of a civilized or beautiful womanhood. Calling men "vipers," "Satan," and other ill names, is not a good trait, or the mark of gentle, non-resisting forbearance. No woman would say, "Hate thy father and mother." No woman would send ill-begotten, badly-reared men and women to endless punishment, as the man-nature of this Jesus did; and simply because they did not believe as he did, and were not morally capable of being good and virtuous.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

"ARE you dead, Tim?" said an Irish father to his son who had fallen down a well. "Not dead, father, but spacheless," came up from the depths.

"YES," said the farmer, "barbed wire fence is expensiv, but the hired man doesn't stop and rest for five minutes on the top of it every time he has to climb it."

AT a young ladies' seminary, recently, during an examination in history, one of the pupils was interrogated thus: "Mary, did Martin Luther die a natural death?" "No," was the reply; "he was excommunicated by a bull."

HE was a country young fellow, a little awkward and bashful, but of sterling worth of character. She was a Cincinnati belle and had sense enough to appreciate his worth, despite his awkwardness and bashfulness, and was his fiancee. On a gloomy Sunday evening this winter they were standing in front of the window in the parlor of her home on East Walnut Hill, watching the snowflakes rapidly falling outside. He was not up in society small talk, and, being hard up for something to say, remarked as he watched the snow falling, "This will be hard on the old man's calves and sheep." "Never mind, dear," said she, slipping her arm around him; "I will take care of one of them."

THE WRONG HOUSE.

Not long since a couple were married at North Orange, Mass. The bride's home was in Royalston, nine miles distant; but she had many friends in North Orange, and the brass band took a barge and went out upon the evening of the wedding day to serenade the happy pair.

It was not late when they arrived at the home in Royalston, but darkness shrouded the house, and seeing a cottage brightly lighted a little further on they concluded it must be the place they were in search of; so they approached it noiselessly in order to surprise the happy pair, and having formed in front of the house, struck up one of their most gay and festiv airs.

At the close, a gentleman appeared at the door and asked for the leader.

Visions of creams, pies, and cakes began to rise before them, but instead there was a break for the barge when the leader rushed back and exclaimed in a stage whisper: "Good thunder, boys! get out of here, quick! We are serenading a corpse!"

THE editor was sitting in his revolving cane-bottomed chair when Tornado Tom, the traveling terror of Texas, came in and demanded retraction of the statement that he had swindled an orphan out of $4.

"It's a lie clear through," said the terror, striking the table with his fist. "I'm as good a man as smells the atmosphere in this section."

"Perhaps you are better," said the editor, meekly.

"My record will compare favorably with yourn," said the terror, with a sneer; "perhaps there are a few little back rackets in your life, sir, that would not bear a microscopic investigation."

"O sir," said the editor, visibly agitated, "don't recall the past; don't bring up the memories of the tomb; I know I've led a hard life—I don't deny it. I killed Shorty Barnes, the Bowery boy of New York—hacked him all to pieces with a knife. I hav atoned for it a thousand times. I blew a man's head off at a log-roll in Kentucky, and bitterly hav I repented of my folly. I slew a lot of inoffensiv citizens of Omaha over a paltry four-dollar 'pot,' simply because I got excited. Oh, could I but cheat the tomb of the men I hav placed in its maw I would be happy. But it was all owing to my high temper and lack of early training. I know that I hav been wayward, wicked, and you hav a right to come here and recall those unhappy memories; but it's mean for all that. Nobody with a heart would treat a man like you hav me. Don't leave, stranger; I'll tell you all. I sawed a man's head off with an old army saber just for ——" The Texas terror was down stairs and half way around the corner, while the editor, taking a fresh chew of rattlesnake twist, continued his peaceful avocations quietly as a law-abiding citizen.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE,

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

Notes and Clippings.

A CHURCH adjoining that of the "Holy Stairs," at Rome, is used by the Italian government as a stable.

THE Christians in Russia hav murdered scores of Jewish men, violated hundreds of Jewish women, and ruined thousands of Jewish homes by plunder and fire. After this pious exercise they proceed to sing, "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild," and ask him to pity their simplicity.

COL. INGERSOLL does not mean that it shall be said, after his death, that he turned from Infidelity on his dying bed. His secretary, who writes shorthand, is instructed to take down accurately whatever he may say on that occasion. "There will then be no opportunity," he says, "for any one to put into my mouth utterances contradicting the expressions of my entire life."

A WICHITA paper says: "We would respectfully call the Lord's attention to a poor girl who lies on a pile of straw in the old Nugent bakery building north of the Occidental Hotel. The girl is very sick, and has neither friends nor money. When the Lord gets through with his church fairs, festivals, raffles, and gambling, we wish he would giv this girl some medicin and a nurse."

THE Massachusetts legislature, in 1779, considering that "the manufacture of strong beer, ale, and other malt liquors, will promote the purposes of husbandry and commerce," passed the following exemption act: "Be it enacted, etc., That all brew-houses that produce a hundred barrels of beer annually shall be exempt from taxation or duties five years." And such were the Puritan fathers!

AN effort is being made to organize and concentrate the Republican feeling of England, in order that its united influence may be brought to bear upon the political and social questions of the day; to further the progress of Republican views by literary and platform propaganda; and to encourage and aid the formation of local societies for the same end. A provisional committee has already been formed.

TALMAGE says that "Christianity was to be the pacification of all individual and international animosities." Perhaps it was to be, but it has not turned out so. The Roman empire under the great Cæsar was in a state of settled peace compared with modern Europe. More blood has been shed by Christians in war during the last century than in all the battles fought by the Romans from Julius to Constantine.

THE chances are that Col. Bob will at once proceed to hunt for a good place to hide. Mr. Hugo Preyer is going to lecture on the "Mistakes of Ingersoll." The worst mistake that the able Infidel ever made was to lay himself open to a thing of this sort. Now then he can take down his doleful triangle, and hit it with a curling iron while he sadly sings, "How much the heart can stand and yet not break!" —Great West.

A NUMBER of Israelites of Matamoras wanted to hold religious service in company with some fellow-believers in Brownsville, Texas, and crossed to the latter place with one of the parchment scrolls on which the Books of Moses are written in Hebrew, and which are always used for reading aloud at synagog service. At the custom house on the river they found, to their surprise, that they could not pass without going through the formality of getting the scroll registered, a thing necessary to do, as a rule, with articles which it is the intention to bring back. The Mexican guards, exclaiming that they were "afraid to touch the Jewish God," would not go near it. They showed marked anxiety to get rid of it as soon as possible, and hurried the custodians off; and when it was returned the following week, they again gave it a wide berth.

THE funeral of Joseph Hart, a devoted follower of Paine, took place in Wilmington, Del., and was conducted by Rev. J. B. Parmelee, of the Swedenborgian church. The reverend gentleman startled his hearers by warmly praising the deceased Atheist as a kinder man than most Christians. He assured the Agnostic audience that Mr. Hart would in the next world attain a state dependent, not upon his faith, but upon his life.

AT a salvation meeting in Halifax some weeks ago one of the speakers was a woman. Her language was highly esteemed by the dirty bedlamites who listened. We hesitate to print any part of her speech, but we giv just one period in order to expose these filthy fools and to show what is being said and done in the name of Christianity. "I hav been an awful woman," she said; "I've slept in the arms of a policeman, I've slept in the arms of a soldier, I've slept in the arms of a sailor; but now, bless and praise his holy name, I sleep every night in the arms of Jesus."—London Freethinker.

THE Rev. Mr. Leftwich, pastor of the Tulip-street Methodist Episcopal church, Nashville, has got himself in trouble. Some time ago a little son of Mrs. Cooper fell from a train on which he was stealing a ride and broke his arm, which was afterward amputated. In a sermon Mr. Leftwich took occasion to hold up young Cooper as a model bad boy, and assailed his character in a most merciless manner. Mrs. Cooper feels outraged at the attack on her son, and she and her granddaughter hav expressed a determination to cowhide the minister. Those who heard Mr. Leftwich say he was particularly severe, almost slanderous, in his remarks concerning the boy.

WE learn that the Missionary Baptists (colored) had a sweepstake fight at the Christmas tree distribution. A father slapped his noisy married daughter in the mouth, when her husband pitched into the old man, then a general battle ensued. While one-half the congregation were thus celebrating the natal day of their savior the other half were busy stealing the presents off the sacred branches. And we see by the Clarksville Standard that the colored churches at Texarkana had a similar row; also that the Northern Methodists (white) had a conflagrated Santa Claus. He had covered himself with cotton, which caught fire, and he was severely burned.

IN Spain the workingmen's organizations are taking formidable proportions, and the anarchist journal of Madrid, the Revista Social, contains entire columns in every number announcing the constitution of new sections and trades unions. The Cadiz salt workers hav just united themselvs. In all the industrial centers of Catalonia the workmen of various trades hav adhered in mass to the federation and hav formed sections varying from one hundred to four hundred members. The various branches of the building trade in Madrid are following the example set by others; and everywhere, above all in Andalusia in the midst of the vineyard workers, is this desire of union showing itself.

SOMEBODY from California writes to the New York Sun to inquire what is meant by a "new birth," or being "born again." Mr. Dana is helpless for once, and makes an assignment by referring his correspondent to the following quotation from the Bible: "Verily, verily I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born anew. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the voice thereof, but knowest not whence it cometh, nor whither it goeth. So is every one that is born of the Spirit." The person who can tell any more about it after reading this passage than he could before deserves a reward in this world and the next.

IN one of Connecticut's most thriving cities the church bells became objectionable, principally because the church services were held without any concert of action as to the time of meeting. Action by the Council was invoked in order that the bells might be rung simultaneously instead of jangling at half-hour intervals during the morning, afternoon, and evening. The Common Council passed a resolution: "Resolved, that hereafter the churches that hav bells that are rung, be rung at the same hour for morning and afternoon service." The bell-ringers are puzzled, and are wondering what will be the effect on the Sunday dinners. It is the grammar of this resolution that will make it immortal.

RUSSIA and Roumania are the only remaining European states in which Jewish disabilities now prevail. In some parts of Asia, however, and especially in the Flowery Land, the children of Israel still lie under a prohibitory law which excludes them from participation in any civil rights whatsoever, and prevents them from exercising any trade or profession in the character of Chinese subjects. Jews, however, hav established themselvs in all the Chinese ports under the protection of different European flags, and some of the wealthiest Jewish firms are on the best of terms with the provincial authorities, who constantly giv them the preference over their Christian and Buddhist competitors for government contracts.

THE sermon with which the Rev. George C. Milne astonished his Unitarian congregation, in Chicago, by a renunciation of belief in God or a future life, was a bitter attack on Christianity. Speaking of the general disbelief in a literal hell, he said: "Yet defenders of conservativ theology would do well to guard strongly the gates of hell, for when they fall the chief scourge in the hands of the church has lost its lash. Nay! the system then already totters to its fall; for the foundations of orthodoxy are laid in the bed of hell." As to the doctrin of eternal existence, he admitted its comforting influence, but added: "If I could believe there were a future life, how gladly would I let loose my imagination to picture its possible glories! Not the gentle John himself should beat the air with more eager pinion to reach the gate which I would fain believe opens upon the fields of paradise. But, friends, I cannot afford to deceive you, and so I say that however beautiful the dream may be, the chance of its fulfilment seems to me remote and improbable." He thinks that the churches of a century hence will teach morality for its own sake, and leave the question of a future life to speculation. Mr. Milne was until lately a Congregationalist.

WHEN the mob in Sheffield assaulted the Salvation Army, it was thought that if Gen. and Mrs. Booth were to ride in a carriage at the head of the procession, it might hav a civilizing effect on the ruffians, and soften their wicked hearts. But it was found to be of no avail. Then two more carriages were procured for other officers of the "Army," and these led the way, accompanied by a band of music. There was also a "converted wrestler," a sinewy sort of person who was supposed to hav muscle enough to put down all opposition. But even over all this imposing parade the violence of the Sheffield mob triumphed. Mud, bricks, and decayed vegetables were thrown at the Salvationists to such an extent as to hav a very discouraging effect on them. The "converted wrestler," who was mounted on horseback, and dressed in scarlet, found himself unable to wrestle with the forces of sin. He was thrown from his war horse, and battered so badly that he was carried in a very exhausted condition to a hospital. The probability is that this champion of evangelism will not recover. The police of Sheffield did not furnish any material assistance. They do not sympathize with the Salvation Army, but, on the contrary, regard it as a nuisance. So it is in other British cities.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

The Book of the Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh.—Continued.

CHAPTER X.—CONCLUDED.

21. Peradventure the Scribe ought to feel very grateful that he is permitted to visit the places where Jesus performed such wonderful works as restoring the blind and lame, healing the lepers, stilling the waves, feeding vast multitudes with very little food, raising the dead, and all that sort of thing; and he tries to realize it to the best of his ability. Here on this lake Matthew was called to be a disciple, and he distinguished himself by narrating many things that nobody else ever heard of, and by stating many things differently from his contemporaries.

22. There is little of Magdala now but a few low huts, without windows or chimneys, inhabited by miserable-looking human beings, clad in a single, dirty garment, which hardly serves to cover their nakedness. The rising generation run after the pilgrims and cry, Backsheesh, backsheesh, hoping for a few coins; but this cry is heard nearly a thousand times every day, where the children of the natives are met, and no attention is paid to it.

23. Less than two hours' ride from Magdala brought the pilgrims to the town of Tiberias, an old walled town, toward the southern end of the lake, built by Herod Antipas in the year 20, and by him dedicated to the Emperor Tiberias, after whom also the lake was called. The wall runs down into the lake and was much shaken by the earthquake of 1837. Tiberias was the principal town of Galilee.

24. After the destruction of Jerusalem it became the seat of the Jews. In the second century the sanhedrim was removed here from Sepphoris, and for a long time it was noted for its rabbinical school. Here the Mishna and Masora, the principal traditional works of the Jews, were published. Its subsequent history is merely that of captures by Persians, Arabs, and crusaders.

25. The modern town has some buildings comparatively good-looking, built decently of stone, some two stories high, and absolutely with windows; but the streets are narrow, crooked, and very filthy, with a great abundance of fleas, which have passed into a proverb. A few palm-trees add to the appearance from without.

26. The inhabitants number over three thousand, of whom nearly two-thirds are Jews of the two fanatical sects, the Ashkenazim and the Sepharuim; the former have five synagogues and the latter two. They are beggars, and are supported by alms sent them by rich Jews in Europe.

27. These Jews hold Tiberias to be a holy city, and they claim that when the messiah comes he will emerge from the lake, gather together his people at Tiberias, and march with them in triumph to Safed, a holy city on the top of a high hill a few miles northwest of the lake, where his throne will be established forever.

28. The Jews of the place can easily be distinguished from the other inhabitants, being lighter in complexion and rather more intellectual looking. Many of them dress very grotesquely in flowing robes of calico, and wear large black hats, scarfs, sashes, etc. They look effeminate and half-starved. There are also Mohammedans and Christians here, with mosques and churches. All are supported, in part at least, by money from other countries.

29. The tents of the pilgrims were pitched near the lake shore nigh upon a mile south of the town, where some of the pilgrims availed themselves of another bath in the holy lake. As in the night before, the waves of the lake could be heard as they lashed the shore, easily mingling with our dreams.

30. Half a mile further south, near the shore of the lake, is a remarkable hot spring, where water enough to turn a mill gushes out at the foot of the mountain—which rises rather abruptly—so hot one cannot hold his hand in it, reaching 142 degrees—hot enough to cook an egg. The water is very salt, and impregnated with sulphur and some other substances. If used externally and internally, it would doubtless be excellent in rheumatism and kindred diseases. If easy of access or near some large city, it would doubtless prove a fortune. The fine air, the pleasant lake, with facilities for fishing, combined with the waters of the spring, would make the place very attractive if it could be conveniently reached.

CHAPTER XI.

THE FIFTH VISIT.

1. Hail, young Truth Seeker! said the Venerable Visitor, as he entered the tent. I will not stay to weary you this night; but, after talking for a little while on the subject touched upon at my last visit, will take my departure.

2. I do not propose to point out all the myths mentioned in the Jewish scriptures, nor to call attention to all the impossibilities and improbabilities mentioned in that book; but, in keeping with the line I commenced in my previous visits, I will allude to some of them.

3. I need hardly again call attention to the unscientific character of the first book in the Jewish Bible; to the positive discrepancies existing between the statements there given and the unmistakable teachings of science touching the age of the earth, the order and periods in which life appeared upon it, and the difference in the eras of time between the appearance of the lower forms of animal life and the higher. What I have said upon that subject will suffice.

4. The statement that the sun was not created until after the earth, not until after all the vegetable kingdom had existed long enough to produce leaves, flowers, fruits, and seeds, is too ridiculous and absurd to be entertained by any sensible person.

5. The fable about the creation of woman from the rib bone of a man, and her being the result of an afterthought, when Yahweh found the man would be lonely without a companion, together with the two different ways in which the story is told, is too childish to merit credence.

6. The narrative about a snake of the field being able to subvert the purpose of his maker; about his being able to speak a human language, and to hold converse with the woman, persuading her to do the very thing which Yahweh did not wish her to do, is of the same imbecile character.

7. The claim that a being of infinite goodness and knowledge would create death and eternal destruction in the form of fruit growing upon trees of his own planting, and place them within reach of the ignorant pair of beings he had just made, when his knowledge must have apprised him of the result that must ensue, is too derogatory to the character of an infinitely good being to be entertained for a single moment.

8. The idea of the firmament given in the narrative, that it is a solid substance placed in the heavens to divide the waters above it from those below it, exhibits the most utter ignorance and untruthfulness.

9. That it should require Yahweh five days to create this globe, while he was able to perfect the sun, moon, all the planets, and millions of other suns and worlds immensely larger than those pertaining to this system, in one day, is a proposition entirely repugnant to proportion, reason, and truth.

10. The representation that the sun was made and placed in the heavens expressly for the benefit of this earth is wholly untrue. It is equally as much for the other planets and some two hundred asteroids as for the earth; but the writer of the narrative knew nothing about the planets.

11. The statement that omnipotence became weary with the creation of the world, and found it necessary to take a rest, as a man would after performing a hard week's work, is very derogatory to infinite power.

12. The statement in one chapter that man was made before the animals, and in the next that he was made after the animals, exhibits the untruthfulness of the story.

13. The representation that the creatures deity had made, eating the fruit he had made, should be enough to damn them and their offspring forever, makes the creator no better than an incarnate fiend.

14. The pretense that the serpent class of reptiles walked upright, and possessed the power of speech previous to the curse that was pronounced upon them, is too absurd for serious consideration. Snakes are now, in style of locomotion, and in the food they eat, as they ever have been. They never walked, they never ate dust.

15. The representation that thorns and thistles did not exist until after the curse was pronounced upon Adam and Eve is wholly devoid of truth. They were not created on that occasion.

16. The statement that men used to live to be nearly a thousand years old has no truth whatever.

17. The statement that the sons of God took the daughters of men for wives, and thus produced a hybrid race, half gods and half men, has too much absurdity and falsehood about it to be entertained for an instant.

18. The untruths connected with the story of Noah and his flood need not be alluded to again. Scores of gross falsehoods and impossibilities are connected with it.

19. The claim that because one of Noah's sons made sport of him while he was in a state of intoxication, the posterity of the son should be cursed with perpetual slavery and servitude, represents injustice far more than truth. It was infinitely worse in Noah to indulge in excessive drunkenness than it was for Ham to laugh. If either deserved to be punished, the father was the man, and not the son; besides, it was the worst of injustice to punish the descendants of Ham with perpetual slavery because their ancestor had laughed.

20. The story of men undertaking to build a tower to reach to heaven is without truth or sense; and the fable that God became so alarmed lest the tower would reach his domain that he confounded their speech, and thus introduced many languages into the world, is equally absurd.

21. The statement that fire and brimstone were sent from heaven, by which the cities were suddenly consumed, is wholly untrue. Brimstone exists in the earth, and is not sent from heaven. God burnt no more cities with fire and brimstone three thousand years ago than he does to-day. The story is wholly a fabrication.

22. The assertion that a woman was ever converted into a pillar of salt is a very foolish falsehood. The thing is an utter impossibility, and no person ought to be simple enough to believe it.

23. The frequent talks between God and Abraham, as before remarked, are wholly fabulous. Both characters are myths. If God promised this land to the seed of Abraham forever, the promise has failed signally in the fulfilment. They have not possessed it in two thousand years. The promise, also, that the seed of Abraham should be as the sands of the sea-shore and the dust of the earth for multitude, is equally untrue. They never reached one ten-millionth part of the number of either.

24. The claim that a woman between ninety and a hundred years old became a mother and bore a child is in opposition to the fixed laws of nature, and hence is untrue.

25. It is not true that the seventy descendants of Jacob in two hundred and fifteen years could increase so rapidly as to number three millions of people. It would necessitate that each mother should bear one hundred children and that no deaths should occur. No such increase has ever taken place in the world.

26. The story about Jacob wrestling with God the better part of a night is a crude and childish conception.

27. It is not true that Yahweh ever assumed the appearance of fire in a bush.

28. It is absurd to claim that Yahweh wanted the Israelites to leave Egypt and at the same time influenced Pharaoh to prevent their doing so.

29. The story about a rod being turned into a serpent is without truth. The thing was never done.

30. The claim that Moses produced what are called the plagues of Egypt is without truth. No man could ever do anything of the kind; nor was there ever a god who could do it.

31. The statement that the magicians of Egypt could perform the feats of turning a rod into a snake, changing water to blood, producing frogs, locusts, etc., and do all the other feats credited to them, is wholly devoid of truth.

32. That the Israelites, who were so numerous that they had six hundred thousand fighting men, were moved out of Egypt in a single night, is an utter impossibility. It could not have been done in a week.

33. That such a body of water as the Red Sea should part and wall up on each side, leaving a dry roadway through it, is an egregious falsehood. Water never did anything of the kind. Even if the waters had divided, the slime and deposit at the bottom would have been such that it could not have been a dry roadway.

34. The claim that such a body of people could subsist in an arid desert, even for a week, is wholly untrue. Even if food were sent them, they must still have water.

35. The statement that manna fell daily for forty years, to keep three millions of people in food, is a most extravagant falsehood. Nothing of the kind ever occurred.

36. That a large stream of water, sufficient for such a vast body of people and all their cattle, should burst forth from a rock in an arid desert, where there are no streams, no springs, and never any rain, simply by its being hit with a rod, is too preposterous to merit the slightest credence.

37. The claim that a pillar of fire by night and a cloud by day should for forty years hang around any people is a most absurd one. No such phenomena ever took place.

38. The statements that repeated interviews occurred between Yahweh and Moses, that they talked face to face, and that Yahweh showed his back parts to Moses, are utterly untrue.

39. The assertion that Yahweh engraved two tables of stone, and that Moses got angry and threw them down and broke them, contains no truth. No god ever did any stone-cutting.

40. It is untrue, if the manna fell six days in the week, that it did not also fall seven; and that, if it would keep forty-eight hours at one time in the week, it would not also at other times. Nature does not work in that way. With her all days are alike. The story was written to sustain the observance of the Jewish Sabbath.

41. It is not true that such a people could be on the tramp for forty years through a desert and their clothes and shoes not grow old and wear out, or that those articles should grow with the growth of the children. It requires people of inordinate credulity to believe such idle tales.

42. It is untrue that a people leaving a country as hurriedly as the Israelites are represented to have done should have had with them munificent supplies of gold, silver, brass; blue, purple, scarlet, and fine linen, goat's hair, rams' skins dyed red, badgers' skins, shittim-wood, oils, spices, sweet incense, onyx stones, and a small-sized lumber yard containing boards large enough to make the tabernacle, the ark, the mercy-seat, tables, altars, etc., or that an all-wise God should attach any special value to those things. If that people were able to accumulate such valuable goods and merchandise, including a stock of metals with which to make cherubims of beaten gold, rings of gold, dishes, bowls, spoons, candlesticks, lamps, tongs, snuff dishes, caskets, rings, images, pans, lavers, shovels, basins, flesh hooks, fire-pans, and numerous other vessels and implements, they could not have been held in a very abject state of slavery.

43. It is extremely unlikely that a people who had all their lives worked only at brick-making should out in the desert possess the skill and facilities for executing fine mechanical work, like making images of beaten gold, implements and ornaments of silver, artificial flowers, fine work in linen, ornamentation of many kinds, skilful wood-work, and much more requiring cunning workmanship. All those kinds of work require such practice, experience, and apparatus as the Israelites had had no chance to acquire. The person who wrote that account had but small perception of the probabilities and proprieties of a story.

44. It is not true that Moses burnt the gold of which Aaron's calf was made to a fine powder, which he strewed upon water, and which became dissolved. The thing is utterly impossible, and was never done. Gold cannot be burnt, nor dissolved in water.

45. It is not true that a merciful god, because he had been made a little angry, authorized his people to take every man his sword, and slay his brother and his neighbor, and that in carrying out the order the priests slew three thousand men.

46. It must have been utterly impossible for Moses to speak so as to have been heard by two or three millions of people. Ten thousand are as many as any speaker can make hear in the open air.

47. Aaron and his two sons could not possibly have killed the animals of sacrifice, and burnt them on all the occasions of births, and all other prescribed occasions. They must have amounted to over two thousand per day, and three men could not possibly have done it; neither could the animals for the purpose have been obtained in a desert.

48. That a good god would send strange fire and a plague, and destroy fifteen thousand of his people because they made a trifling complaint, is untrue.

49. It is extremely unlikely that the earth should open and swallow Korah, Datham, and Abiram, and hundreds of their followers, because they were dissatisfied with Moses, and then close up again.

50. It is very unlikely, because the Israelites complained at the manna diet, week in and week out, that he sent fiery serpents among them, and destroyed great numbers of them. Such conduct would be unworthy of any one but a demon.

51. The story of the wonderful visitation of quails, when a wind from the Lord brought them from the sea, so that they covered the earth to the depth of three and a half feet, to the distance of a day's journey in each direction, or thirty-three miles—an area of three thousand four hundred square miles—contains not a particle of truth. No reasonable god, though in a pet, would put himself to the trouble of producing such an unheard-of quantity of quails, only to decay and spoil. In the next place, the sea is a very unlikely place for quails to come from, and the quantity given is far greater than all the quails that have existed for fifty thousand years.

52. But I will detain thee no longer at this time. These things are not new to thee, though they may be to many others. I will resume the subject at my next visit. Good-night.

CHAPTER XII.

SIXTH DAY'S JOURNEY.—FROM TIBERIAS TO NAZARETH.

1. And it came to pass on the morning of the sixth-and twentieth day of the eleventh month, all the pilgrims, the captain of the host, the muleteers —after an extra amount of quarreling—the horses, and asses, and moreover the dog, in good season left the shores of the Sea of Galilee, and wound up a long and steep hill as they made their way to the southwest, even toward Nazareth.

2. It was a long time before they lost sight of the lake, and often did they look back upon the scene which has been so often praised and over-praised. Pious people who visit this country feel it to be incumbent upon them to laud the country and its appearance to the skies.

3. The Sea of Galilee has been by these people greatly over estimated. It is true the sheet of water itself looks about like any other sheet of water of the same size, but the country around it is an abrupt, uncomely, and barren hill on the east, known as the hills of Bashan; while on the west coast there is little else than hills of rocks, though they rise gradually, with a few acres of tillable lands.

4. In the land of Genesareth there are a few small trees, and in a few other places near some spring are small patches of verdure, but the whole landscape surrounding the lake is a treeless, lifeless, barren waste of rocks.

5. When the hills of Galilee are surmounted a better country is presented, and a few square miles of fair farming land opens to view; but as the journey is continued the country grows more and more rocky, and the only plowable land is in small patches among the rocks.

6. Off to the north, in Naphtali, looms up Safed, one of the four holy cities of the land of Yahweh, and claimed to be the place Jesus referred to when he spoke of a city being set on a hill which cannot be hid. As it stands on the summit of a high hill without trees, it is very naturally quite conspicuous.

7. The other three holy cities are Jerusalem, Hebron, and Tiberias. There are about four thousand inhabitants in Safed, of the same sects as those in Tiberias. They hold that the messiah, when he comes, will make his first appearance there, and after reigning forty years will go forth to receive universal homage. They also believe that if prayer should cease to be offered in the four holy cities the world would come to an end. There are also quite a number of Christians in the place, though it is one of the principal centers of modern Judaism.

8. The town is built on terraces in the rocks, which rise in succession one above another. The roofs of each lower tier serve as a path or street to those in the next higher tier. On the highest part of the hill are the ruins of an old castle, built by the Franks during the wars of the Crusades, and regarded as the strongest place of defense against the incursions of the Saracens from the north. In the earthquake of 1837 Safed suffered terribly; the houses were thrown down in the most horrid manner, and large numbers of people were killed.

9. On our right we passed a curiously-shaped hill, rising from a fertile plain, which the Catholics have decided to be the Mount of Beatitudes, where, according to Matthew, Jesus preached his Sermon on the Mount. Another claim makes it also the place where the miracle of the loaves and fishes was performed; but it is all guess-work, at which amusement the Catholics are extra skilful.

10. On our left we passed a modern town, upon a hill, consisting of low, flat, stone houses, and surrounded by a conspicuous growth of cactus (prickly pear), which will grow on the poorest land in the world, and which is here used for fences. Much of it is met that looks to be one hundred years old. Nothing else grows.

11. An ancient well was passed, covered with a large stone having a hole through it for a curb. It looked as though it might have been in use three thousand years ago.

12. About the twelfth hour the pilgrims arrived at Kefr Kenna, a miserable little village, claimed to be the Cana of Galilee, where, according to John, Jesus gave encouragement to wine-drinkers by converting water into wine. The pilgrims alighted and entered a small Christian church, claimed to be built over the identical spot where this feat of divine legerdemain is said to have been performed.

13. A large stone jar, or vase, holding fifteen gallons, is in the church, and is claimed to be the identical jar that contained the water that was changed into wine. If it was full, the wine, if as good as represented, was sufficient to make two hundred people very mellow, especially as they were pretty near drunk before. They have another of the jars used on this momentous occasion in the cathedral at Cologne. Who can doubt these pious claims?

14. It is, however, to be regretted that there is not a unanimity as to whether this was the place where the wine feat was performed. Doctors Robinson and Porter insist that this is not the place where Jesus engaged in the wine business, and they locate it ten or fifteen miles away to the northwest. But they know no more about it than anybody else, and the Scribe goes with the majority in insisting that Kefr Kenna is the true Cana, because he saw the stone jar in which the water might have been stored; and what was it there for, save to be used for wine-making?

15. The disagreements which exist are no more to be wondered at than that John should have been the only evangelist who knew anything about Jesus having been in the wine manufacture; and it does not appear that he was present; and, further, it does not appear that the account was ever written by John, or anybody else who knew anything about it. The whole thing is undoubtedly a fabrication.

16. The pilgrims lunched in an olive grove or orchard hard by, surrounded by a fence of the cactus. The children with a single garment are numerous, and the cries for backsheesh are repeated hundreds of times. This is the case at every village.

17. Lubieh was passed on the left, where are a few ruins and rock tombs in the hill-slopes. It is not known what place was here in olden times.

18. Farther on the homely village of Reineh was passed, which is without historical associations. By the roadside is a large stone sarcophagus, now used for a watering-trough, and here women were washing. Instead of using wash-boards they lay the wet clothes upon a rock and pound them with a smooth stone, occasionally dipping them into the water.

19. Meshhad, supposed to be ancient Gath-hepher, a town on the border of Zebulun, claimed to be the birthplace of Jonah, the son of Amittai, was passed. On the hill-top hard by is a Bedouin wely, a tomb of a sheik, also claimed to be the burial-place of Jonah; but this yarn is about as fishy as is his whale story.

20. At length the hill overlooking the village of Nazareth is reached, from the top of which a good bird's-eye view of it is obtained. It has many good-looking stone buildings used as churches and schools; and a monastery and convent, all built with money sent into the country from Europe. Though standing on the steep side of a white, calky, limestone hill; it is the best-looking village seen since entering the Holy Land.

21. In nearing the white tents, which had already been pitched at the eastern end of the town for the pilgrims, they passed what is called the Virgin's fountain, where Mary is supposed to have gone for her water for making tea and washing dishes when she was quite a young girl and after the days of her espousal.

22. If she lived in Nazareth it is quite likely she went to that fountain for water, as it is the only one in town, and the women still go there in great numbers for all the water for domestic purposes. The Fountain is covered by a low stone building or church, and the water runs through three spouts or outlets; and here the modern virgins assemble to fill their earthen jugs, holding some four gallons or more, which they carry on the tops of their heads, resting upon a cushion for the purpose; and they march off to their homes with their heads and jugs erect, touching not the latter with their hands.

23. The maids of the village gather here in great numbers to do their gossiping and quarreling, the latter being attended to with no neglect of business. They were quarreling most busily, some thirty of them, when the pilgrims passed, as to which were entitled to precedence in filling their jugs or pitchers; and the jars about the water-jars were very jarring upon the Scribe's feelings. The captain says he never visits the place but what the virgins of Nazareth are quarreling as to which shall have the next chance to catch water. They are called better looking than the generality of Syrian girls, but the Scribe saw but few that are pretty.

24. Soon after arrival the pilgrims started out to see the sights of the town, howbeit there are several of a most extraordinary character. First they bent their steps to the monastery, which had about a score of monks under the charge of the French Catholics. One accompanied the pilgrims to the church of the Annunciation, hard by, which is built over the very place where Gabriel called upon the Virgin and made an appointment with her for a visit of a special nature from Yahweh himself, much of the same character as the one Vishnu many hundreds of years earlier is said to have made to the Hindoo virgin Devanauy, and somewhat like another to Maia, the virgin mother of Buddha.

25. The church is well built, costing several thousand dollars in European gold, and is finely decorated with well-executed paintings representing the virgin and her son in various positions and connections. The high altar is dedicated to the angel Gabriel, and before it nearly half a score of monks were chanting some Latin liturgy or exercise, while three or four others were kneeling in the body of the church, going through the performance of prayer, much as do the Moslems in the mosques.

26. Beneath the altar is the crypt, to reach which a dozen broad marble steps are descended. Here is the chapel of the Annunciation, where not only Gabriel made the preliminary arrangements, but where Yahweh himself appeared soon after in propria persona, and attended to the little business which seems to have been necessary to mend up the blunders which he had made in placing the race of man upon the earth.

27. Here on the altar is inscribed these Latin words, Hic verbum caro factum est, which, being interpreted, mean, Here the word was made flesh. The Scribe looked earnestly around to see if there were any representation of the overshadowing act, but though the good Christians have supplied other pictures, including the interview between Gabriel and the young virgin, the most important one, between Yahweh and herself, is not given; and then did the Scribe sagely ask, If not, why not?

28. Here in this chapel, which is a grotto in the rock, are two stone columns, seemingly designed to uphold the solid stone overhead, though there is not the slightest danger of the latter's falling. One of these columns is broken off three feet from the floor, and touching the reason for which it was done different Christian traditions exist.

29. One is that the devil, when he, by his great subtleness, which he had from the beginning, discovered Yahweh's little game, how he was going to have an amorous interview with a comely young Jewish virgin for the purpose of getting a son to redeem the world from the terrible condition of eternal damnation which the defective plans of Yahweh had brought about, by the instincts of pure deviltry undertook to thwart the interesting little interview by bringing down the house, to do which he broke one of the columns, and was about to break the other when Yahweh, or one of his big angels, discovered this devilish piece of business, luckily, in time to prevent the work of the Evil One, and far better than was done at the time when he in the form of a snake persuaded our grandmother Eve to eat a most unfortunate apple. On that first occasion Yahweh and his angels were neglectful of their business and allowed the devil to perpetrate the great mischief without their interposing the slightest obstacle, besides furnishing the snake with the tools to work with, to wit, very tempting apples.

30. But in this latter piece of deviltry Yahweh was too anxious that the interview with the Virgin should take place to admit of a postponement, and he and his angels were more watchful, and would suffer the arch-fiend to break but one of the pillars, in consequence of which only about ninety-five per cent of the human race are expected to be doomed to the eternal roasting. If the other column had been broken, Yahweh might not have been able to hold that desired private interview with the young Virgin, and the other five per cent, of course, would likewise have had to go to hell. Rejoice, ye five per cent, that the second column was not broken.

31. The other legend is the more tame one that it was the followers of the prophet of Mecca who broke that column, to let the house of the Virgin fall, and thus destroy the evidence of the only great deed Yahweh could have performed to rescue that fortunate five per cent who believe from the inevitable fate into which his own ill-advised adventure had plunged them. Whether it was the devil or the Moslems that broke that column must ever remain an unsolved mystery.

32. But inexpressibly solemn feelings came over the Scribe, as he stood there in that grotto, and realized what had taken place there for the benefit of that five per cent, particularly when the ledge in the rock was pointed out where the Virgin had her couch; and with all due solemnity did he ask himself these questions:

33. Dost thou realize, thou doubting one, that it was this very dark place, which thou art permitted to enter, that Yahweh of a truth came down to from his throne in the bright world above the clouds, and that here he actually overshadowed that beautiful young Virgin, whose picture hangs there before thee on the wall, the same as Vishnu overshadowed another virgin; the same as Ormuzd begot Mithra, as Osiris begot Horus, as Jupiter overshadowed many virgins, and begot numerous sons; the same as Odin begot Thor and Balder, and the same as many other gods begot many other sons?

34. Canst thou not here comprehend the mystery of godliness, and the most divine plan by which Yahweh made it barely possible for that five per cent to be saved? Canst thou, in thy darkened state, realize the extreme holiness of the act performed in this dark place, and what joy and delight it must have given to both Yahweh and the Virgin to perform an act that would result in saving five per cent of the great human race?

35. Then did the Scribe meditate deeply, and say: How solemn and awful is this place! How mysterious are the ways of Yahweh! How fortunate for that five per cent that that overshadowing business was so efficiently performed! Let all the five per cent all over Christendom raise their voices with one accord, and bless the overshadowing! Great is overshadowing! Selah! Long live overshadowing! Selah! Whooplah! Hosanna! So glorious for the five per cent!

36. Next the pilgrims were ushered into the chapel of Joseph, which is but a continuation of another apartment of the grotto. It is not supposed that Joseph was in his chapel at the time Yahweh was making that little friendly visit for the benefit of the five per cent, but, like the preceding Joseph, being a pretty good dreamer, he dreamed it all out tolerably straight, though his statement was materially different from the way Luke narrates the interesting episode. Whichever way it was, it was most fortunate for the five per cent, all the same. The worthy priests constitute a goodly share of the five per cent.

37. Again the pilgrims were ushered up a dark staircase in the solid rock, where the Virgin used to do her kitchen work, and which stairs the little Jesus used to tumble down (as all other children do), and bump his dear little nose.

38. Then did the doubting Scribe quibble in this wicked way: How is it that Joseph, being a carpenter—a worker in wood—should have a house dug out of the rock, without a particle of wood belonging to it? And how is it that this cavern can be the house of Joseph and Mary, when the really true one was carried off by holy angels to a spot between Fiume and Terasto, on the coast of Dalmatia, where it rested three years, and was again conveyed, by the same industrious angels, in the night, to the ground of a certain widow Laureta (whence comes Loreto), where a church was subsequently erected, the place being afterward blessed by God's vicegerent, the good pope Sixtus V., to which five hundred thousand persons resort annually, and where, in consequence of the presence of the house, any number of the most astonishing miracles are performed? Yea, the Scribe did pensively ask, How can these things be? But soon these comforting and all-convincing words came unto him, which the faithful so often use, All things are possible with God; and straightway his troubles were assuaged, and exceeding great peace of mind gently stole over him, like the rays of the morning sun, or like the dews on Hermon.

39. Leaving this solemn and holy place, the pilgrims were next led through winding, and dirty, and narrow streets, where is another little Christian church, standing over the identical spot where the good, unsuspecting Joseph had his carpenter-shop, and where the youthful Jesus used to shove the jack-plane. More solemn feelings settled down upon the mind of the Scribe as he realized he stood in the very place where a young god used to make chips and shavings, and sometimes stole away from his work (when his aged step-father was out looking up a job), and played with the idle boys on the streets, making mud-birds, causing them to fly, and performing other godlike feats and sports.

40. Here it was that the aged and failing Joseph would make mistakes in his measurements and calculations, and turn out his work in an unskilful manner; and here the almighty little Jesus would come to his aid, and stretch his work when it was too short, contract it when too long, and alter it over when it was wrong in any way. Truly, Jesus must have been a convenient apprentice to have in a shop where the boss was so liable to blunder.

41. How fitting, said the Scribe, that this modern god should be a good carpenter, and be able to adjust things by stretching or shrinking, and thus help his poor old dreaming step-daddy out of all his blunders! At one time the old carpenter would have lost two years' labor on a king's throne, to say nothing of the value of the material, had not Jesus taken hold of the throne and stretched it to the right length to fill the place it was intended to occupy.

42. Three large pictures were hanging up against the walls of the church and of the side chapel, representing the interior of a carpenter's shop, with Joseph using the broad-axe, or some other tool, as the central figure. Jesus is in the foreground playing with the shavings, or studying a book, while the Virgin is in the background. The Scribe objected to the representations of Joseph, which made him to look young and remarkably intelligent, whereas, according to the story of the apocryphal gospels, he was an old man when he espoused Mary, and good grounds are presented that he was not over-brilliant in his mental acquirements.

43. But there is the little church, there is the little chapel on the side of it, and there are the paintings; and now, if the Scribe and other people cannot believe in the carpenter's shop, they perhaps would not believe though one should rise from the dead.

44. The next wonder to be seen was the rock where Jesus used to sometimes take his grub with the young men of the town, after he was out of his time at the carpenter's trade, or rather after he had concluded to follow some other business as an occupation. The stone is a flat-topped boulder, of an obtuse oval form, about twelve feet in length, eight feet in width, and some two and a half feet above the ground, affording ample room for half a dozen persons to partake of a picnic meal, if they had not too great a variety of dishes.

45. True, there is nothing said in the gospel story about Jesus ever eating in any such place, but that makes no difference. It is not to be supposed that Christians could not be inspired fifteen hundred years later, and discover that Jesus and his young friends used to meet there and take a little bite and a glass of wine together in a friendly, sociable fashion; and, besides, did not the Scribe see a painting on the wall of the little church which covers the rock, portraying Jesus and his companions taking care of a comfortable-looking meal, right there on that very rock? Of course he did; and now let those who wish to be damned continue to doubt. The rock is carefully kept covered with a sacred cloth covering.

46. A Greek church was also visited, where a venerable Greek priest was reading in a loud voice in Arabic some service, with one old man for an audience. This is claimed to be the synagogue where Jesus commenced his teaching. Of course, nobody will doubt that.

47. Another holy place is the Mount of Precipitation, a hill two miles from town, from which, it is claimed, the people sought to cast Jesus down headlong and kill him. This was before he commenced preaching, and he went out from amongst them and took himself to Capernaum, which he afterward made his home. There are some, even Christians, who denominate this a worthless tradition, to which the Scribe is prepared to assent, though he insists that it is just as good as any of the rest of the claims.

48. It will be remembered that, according to Luke, Nazareth became the home of Jesus, immediately after his step-father and mother returned from being taxed at Jerusalem, and even at the very time when Matthew has him in Egypt, whither the three fled to get away from the massacre of the little innocents by Herod, of which cruel and bloodthirsty proceeding Luke never heard anything. It is thought Matthew fabricated this statement, not mentioned by any other gospel writer, that he might claim another fulfilment of prophecy—Out of Egypt have I called my son—which Matthew quoted incorrectly, and which sentence had no more reference to Jesus than it had to Joseph Smith.

49. The town is thought to have some four thousand inhabitants, and they are made up more than half of Greek Christians, with Romish Christians, Moslems, Maronites, etc. The Jews, taking no stock in the Jesus story, do not settle there. The ringing of the church bells, brought in from Europe, give it the air of a place not out of the world. There are also some schools here, one of which is held in a building high up on the hill-side, and is about the finest in the place.

50. The week now being over, the pilgrims look back with not a little self-congratulation at the one hundred and twenty miles passed over by them between Damascus and Nazareth, together with the places of note which they visited. All are willing to have a day of rest.

CHAPTER XIII.

MELCHISEDEC'S SIXTH VISIT.

1. The Venerable Visitor, before alluded to, commenced his evening's conversation by congratulating the Truth Seeker upon the satisfactory performance of the work and the progress made in the journey in hand, after which he went on to say:

2. Among the great improbabilities contained in the Jewish scriptures is that, in the lifetime of Shem, one of the reputed sons of Noah, the earth should become so rapidly peopled, and such advances be made in civilization that China should be filled up, India made replete with inhabitants, Persia the same, Chaldea and Assyria the same, Egypt made populous, and Phœnicia become a nation of power—all of which countries were far more advanced in civilization, literature, and art than were the descendants of Abraham.

3. According to the scriptures, Shem lived more than two hundred years after the time of Abraham's birth, and people are demanded to believe that under his observation, when he and his two brothers were the only men on earth to propagate the race, all those nations became very populous and advanced; that divergent civilizations were established, the different national characteristics of color, features, and manners thoroughly defined, as though they had been in existence ten thousand years. It must not be forgotten that, according to the Bible story, when Abraham went down into Egypt he found the country populous, the king rich and powerful, and the nation enjoying a degree of civilization that could not be attained in a thousand years, and that at this time Shem was still alive. The whole story is utterly preposterous; there is not a word of truth in it.

4. The massacre of the Midianites at the command of Yahweh, if the story is true, is one of the most cruel and monstrous transactions recorded in the pages of history. The alleged reason for it is that Cozbi, a Midianitish woman, had committed adultery with Zimri, an Israelitish man; but the account does not state that Cozbi forced Zimri to commit the crime, and it is quite presumable that the man was as much in favor of committing it as was the woman, and of course was equally guilty. It would seem that the priest Phinehas so regarded the matter, for he thrust a javelin through the bodies of both while in the very act.

5. It would seem that this bloody deed should have ended the matter; but, according to the story, Yahweh could not let the affair rest, but moved Moses to order the murdersome Israelites out to the work of massacre and slaughter in cold blood; in accordance with which the five kings of Midian were slain, and all the men of the nation; the Israelites taking also as booty 675,000 sheep, 72,000 beef-cattle, and 61,000 asses, and all the other valuables the Midianites possessed; and this without a man of the Israelites being hurt.

6. An ordinary person would naturally think this punishment quite severe enough for the crime that had been committed; but when Yahweh's man Moses learned that his men had saved the women alive he was exceedingly wroth and flew into a towering passion. What, said he, have ye saved all the women alive? Kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known a man by lying with him; but all the women-children that have not known a man by lying with him keep alive for yourselves. And then the slaughter of women and children commenced; and from the number of little girls that were saved for the Israelites it is fair to suppose that not less than sixty thousand were thus slaughtered in perfectly cold blood. A more demoniacal act was never committed; and yet the account states that it was done by the command of Yahweh. Can such a story be believed?

7. The most infernal part of the business was the keeping of 32,000 innocent little girls and babes for the use of the murderers and assassins of their fathers, mothers, and brothers, and dividing them out in regular proportion to each tribe, giving the priests, even, their own proportion for Yahweh. It would have been more merciful to have killed the women-children, too, rather than keep them to minister to the vile lusts of murderers and butchers. To say that such conduct was ever commanded by a just and merciful being is the worst of falsehoods.

8. The story of Balaam and his ass is a silly and untruthful narrative. If Yahweh commanded Balaam to go over to the land of Moab to make a prophecy, it was very wrong to send an angel to prevent him, when he was obeying the instructions he had received. The assertion that an ass talked with human language is an absurd falsehood. Asses have not the organs of speech, and they can by no possibility use it; they can only make the horrible noises which thou hast so often heard while sojourning here in the Land of Yahweh.

9. It was also cruel and unfaithful to put Balaam to death, when to the best of his ability he had carried out the instructions that had been given him, and who showed a commendable disposition on every occasion where his name is mentioned.

10. It is hard to believe that a merciful God could for a trifling offense send a plague and destroy at one time 24,000 of his people. It would have been more merciful to have inclined their hearts aright, even if they had dispositions to do what was wrong.

11. The story of the parting of the waters of the river Jordan to allow a lot of bloodthirsty men to cross over for the purpose of slaughtering men, women, and children who were in quiet possession of the land which they had occupied for centuries, is an untruthful account. No river ever parted in that way.

12. It is an idle claim that the manna, which had been regularly falling six days in every week for forty years, should cease all at once because the Israelites had commenced to rob the Canaanites of the corn they had raised.

13. The story that the walls of a city should be thrown down by the blast of a trumpet, or of rams' horns, after being marched around for seven successive days, is without a shadow of truth. Walls of stone are not moved in that way; and were it so in this case, it would seem wholly unnecessary that the harlot Rahab should basely betray her own people.

14. It is very unlikely that the embezzlement by Achan of a Babylonish garment and a wedge of gold should have the effect to make the men cowardly in the sack of the city of Jericho. How the act could affect those who knew nothing about it is a mystery that cannot be explained on any known principles of nature.

15. It is most singular that when Joshua was making his triumphant march into the land of Canaan the men of Gibeon should be able to deceive him and induce him to make an unfavorable contract, when he had Yahweh at his elbow, who gave him instruction and advice in every case of need.

16. The story that Joshua had the power to stop the sun and moon in their courses, or, more properly, the earth in its revolutions, which have never ceased for a moment since it began to revolve, and simply for the purpose of lengthening out the day so that more manslaughter and bloodshed could be accomplished, is one of the grossest falsehoods ever uttered. If the sun and moon stood still for Joshua and his band of cut-throats, they would have also stood still for the rest of the world, and other nations would have known it, and have had some account of it; but none of them knew anything about it.

17. It is equally untruthful that Yahweh cast down great stones from heaven upon the heads of the Canaanites, whom Joshua was overthrowing. Yahweh has no stones in his realm above the clouds, and therefore he could not cast them down. Were it possible for him to do so to an unlimited extent, he could in that way easily have killed the men he wished dead, without himself and Joshua going to the trouble of stopping the sun to lengthen out the day. If the shower of stones had been kept up it would seem quite sufficient. But the whole tale is a silly absurdity. Thou findest a great abundance of stones in this land, but Yahweh did not send them down from heaven.

18. The tale about the bloody career of Joshua in conquering and exterminating Jericho, Ai, the kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, Gizer, Debir, Eglon, Libnah, Makedah, Kadish-barned, Gaza, Hazor, Madon, Shimron, Achshaph, Hormah, Arad, Abdullam, Tappuah, Hepper, Aphek, Lasharon, Taanach, Mejiddo, Jokneam, Carmel, Dor, Gilgal, Torzah, etc., with their kings and people, including the Amorites, the Hittites, the Porrizites, the Jebusites, the Hivites, etc., is extremely exaggerated. Thou canst easily understand how diminutive those nations must have been in this small country, containing less than five thousand square miles, and which, all told, has not five hundred square miles that were ever plowed.

19. Another absurd story is that Gideon should select his army by taking those who lapped water like dogs. In the first place, even if men lapped like dogs, they would be no better fighters in consequence; and in the second place, men never lap in that way. It is only over-credulous people that believe such tales.

20. The blowing of trumpets and the breaking of pitchers would be a very singular mode of fighting an enemy; and whether the men lapped like dogs or not, a valorous foe could not be vanquished by breaking pitchers.

21. The story that Sampson slew a lion with his bare hands, and caught three hundred foxes and held them while he tied firebrands to their tails; that he slew a thousand Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass while they stood quietly and allowed him to kill them seriatim; that he should open a fountain of water in the old ass's jaw-bone; that he should be able to carry away the heavy gates of the city; that his very unusual strength should lie in his hair; that when it was cut by Delilah he became as weak as other men; and that when it grew out again he was able to put his hands around two pillars of a temple and throw it to the ground, killing himself and thousands of the Philistines, is foolish and false, and is a clumsy copy of the fabled feats of Hercules.

22. It is a hard story that the lewd Benjamites should vilely kill the Levite's concubine by cohabiting with her all night, and that her master should then cut her body in twelve pieces, and that this, sent to all the tribes, should cause a bloody war, in which twenty-five thousand Benjamites and forty thousand Israelites should be slain in three days. The whole story is a repulsive one.

23. It is untrue that the presence of the ark of shittim wood should cause Dagon, the idol of the Philistines, to fall over on its face, the same to be repeated the second night, breaking off the head and hands of the idol. Neither would the presence of that old box have the effect to smite the people of Ashdad, Gath, and Ekron with emerods.

24. It is very unlikely that the presence of that same box would cause two young cows, hitched to a cart bearing it, to leave their young calves and go in an opposite direction.

25. It is very unlikely that fifty thousand men should be working in a harvest field, and that because one of them should from curiosity or some other motive raise the lid of the box, a merciful and just God should instantly kill all the men for the act that a single one of them had committed.

26. A merciful deity would not have commanded Samuel to bid Saul go and smite the Amalekites with the sword, with the order to utterly destroy man, woman, and child, including the sucking babes, together with the oxen, sheep, camels, asses, and this for some fault that had been committed by the tribe long before.

27. There is no truth in the Witch of Endor story. There never was such a thing as a witch; and if there were millions of them they could not, singly or combined, raise a man from the dead.

28. It is wholly unlikely that when David was moving the same ark referred to, the well-disposed Uzzah, who merely reached out his hand to prevent the box from falling off the cart while passing over the very rough roads of the Land of Yahweh, was struck dead.

29. It is a very improbable story that during the reign of David as king of Israel he should be able to bring the small nation from a state of barbarism and brigandage, from a condition in which the people had no revenue and no national resources, to possess such extravagant wealth that he could accumulate 100,000 talents of gold, and 1,000,000,000 talents of silver, equaling 4347 tons, to the value of $4,297,700,000. No nation ever raised such a revenue in the reign of one king, much less such a small nation and such a small country, having no manufactures, no commerce, and less than five hundred square miles of land that could be plowed. It is an exaggeration of the grossest kind.

30. It is a most palpable contradiction that, when David was moved to take a census of the people, in one account it should have said that the Lord moved him to the act, and in another account that it was the devil. The two must either be one, or one of the statements must be a falsehood.

31. It is quite too much to suppose that when David numbered the people it should be found that so small a country, two-thirds of the face of which is but mountains of barren rocks, contained a million and a half of fighting men.

32. It is too much to believe of any rational and well-disposed God that, after moving David to take the census, he should become so incensed as to destroy with pestilence seventy thousand men perfectly innocent of the transaction.

33. It cannot be true, if David was a favorite of Yahweh—one after his own heart—that he should culpably commit adultery with a wife of a soldier faithfully serving in his army, and then, after the villainous deed was accomplished, to hide the crime, cause the death of the husband. Such conduct is too base for any honorable man to be guilty of.

34. It may have pleased Yahweh, but it would hardly please a merciful god, to have a man after his own heart unnecessarily torture his prisoners and captives by placing them under saws of iron, axes of steel, and roasting them in brick-kilns.

35. It is very unlikely that the wisest man which the earth has produced would commit the egregious folly of taking unto himself a thousand wives and concubines; and it is singular, too, that a god of purity and holiness should make no objection to such conduct, especially when in almost daily communication with the monster polygamist and sensualist.

36. It is hard to conceive how a wise and good man, who had been deputed to erect a temple to his God Yahweh, should so far forget his fealty as to engage in the creation of magnificent temples to opposition gods of Yahweh, who were his bitter enemies. That wise man seemed to enjoy a multiplicity of gods as well as a multiplicity of wives.

37. It seems strange that a country which Yahweh had prepared for a perpetual possession of his chosen people should not possess trees enough for the timber necessary to build a temple for himself one hundred and ten feet long, thirty-six feet wide, and fifty-five feet high, and that his people should be under the necessity of going to a neighboring pagan country for it.

38. A nation must be very deficient in mechanics and artisans if it could not of itself erect a building of that size. The Israelites seemed to be far more expert at slaughtering their fellow-beings than at erecting buildings.

39. It is hard to believe that one hundred and fifty-three thousand mechanics and laborers, with five hundred and fifty thousand Jewish overseers, should be required to work seven years to erect a building of that size, when fifty mechanics of modern times could erect it in about six months.

40. It must again be remarked that it is totally improbable that a temple of the size named should cost the enormous sum of five hundred million dollars, or that the income of the nation in Solomon's time, with no commerce, no manufactures, and a miserable agricultural country, should amount to eighteen million dollars annually.

41. It is exceedingly strange, if a temple of such wonderful cost and magnificence had been built in Jerusalem, and if the Jews possessed such enormous wealth, that no other nation and no historians knew anything about it. The story is not corroborated by a single contemporaneous historian. The great Greek historian, Herodotus, who lived soon after the time of Solomon, and made two journeys into Syria and wrote full accounts of what he saw, had not a word to say about Solomon's wonderful temple or the great wealth of the nation. If they had existed it is very singular that he did not mention them.

42. If David and Solomon were not absolutely myths, the extravagant stories of their great wealth, prowess, and renown, are at least greatly mythical and exaggerated. They were wholly unknown to other peoples. But I will tarry no longer on this occasion, and, bidding thee good-night, wish thee sweet repose. When the morning arrived the Scribe scarcely realized that he had had a visitor at all.

CAROLINE H. DALL, of Washington, sends to the Index the following hitherto unpublished letter of Thomas Paine's:

NEW YORK, Broome street, May 4, 1807.

OLD FRIEND: I will first explain the direct occasion of my writing this letter, and reserve meums and teums to follow after.

I hav a law-suit coming on in this state [New York] the 20th of this month, May. The occasion of it is as follows:

Four or five men, who had lived within the British lines in the Revolutionary war, got in to be inspectors of the election at New Rochelle, where I lived on my farm. These men refused my vote, saying to me, "You are not an American citizen." Upon my beginning to remonstrate with them, the chief of them (Ward, supervisor, whose father and all his brothers had joined the British, but himself not being old enough to carry a musket stayed at home with his mother) got up and calling out for a constable, said to me, "I commit you to prison." He chose, however, to sit down and go no farther with it. I hav prosecuted the board of inspectors for disparaging me.

I hav written to Mr. Madison for copies of Mr. Monroe's letter to Mr. Randolph, in which Mr. Monroe informs government of his having reclaimed me, and of my liberation in consequence of it, and of Mr. Randolph's answer, in which he says, "The President approves of what you hav done in the case of Mr. Paine." These are necessary, in order to prove falsehood on the inspectors; for the ground they went upon was this: "Our minister at Paris, Gouverneur Morris, would not reclaim you when you were imprisoned in the Luxemburg, and General Washington refused to do it." Morris did reclaim me; but his reclamation did me no good, and the probability is that he did not intend it should.

You and other Americans in Paris went in a body to the convention to reclaim me; and I want a certificate from you, properly attested, of this fact. If you consult with Governor Clinton, he will, in friendship, inform you whom to address it to.

Having now done with business, I come to meums and teums. What are you about? You sometimes hear of me, but I never hear of you. It seems as if I had got to be master of the feds and the priests. The former do not attack my political publications—they rather try to keep them out of sight by silence; and as to the priests, they act as if they would say, "Let us alone, and we will let you alone." My examination of the passages called prophecies is printed and will be published next week. I hav prefaced it with the essay on dreams. I do not believe the priests will attack it; for it is not a book of opinions, but of facts. Had the Christian religion done any good in the world, I might not hav exposed it, however fabulous I might hav believed it to be; but the delusiv idea of having a friend at court whom they call a redeemer, who pays all their scores, is an encouragement to wickedness.

What is Fulton about? Is he "taming a whale" to draw his submarine boat?

I wish you would desire Mr. Smith to send me his country National Intelligencer. It is printed twice a week without advertisments. I am sometimes at a loss for the want of authentic information.

Yours in friendship, THOMAS PAINE.

Communications.

My Critics.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

Herbert Spencer thought it worth while to suspend the publication of his philosophical system to write a long article on "My Critics." Perhaps THE TRUTH SEEKER will allow me to follow his example in a few words. The first word is to suggest that I am trying to present Science as an Integral Philosophy, the parts of which have been worked out substantially by the Philosophers and Scientists of the past and present. From the standpoint of MAN (Humanity) it seemed to Comte, as it has to me and many others since, that all of the great achievements of Science could be coördinated so as to form such a philosophy, and that it must be the basis of man's life, or religion, in the higher and proper use of that word. (See Thomas Paine's explanation of the word "Religion" in his works.)

Now it is evident that this Philosophy can be fairly contrasted with other systems or views of the world only as a whole. When the statement of it which I am trying to make is completed, I shall be glad to compare it with all other views, and to see which is the truest and the best. To such opponents, therefore, as my Universological friend, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, of New York, and my Materialtic-God friend, Mr. Charles E. Townsend, of Long Island, who seem to be thirsting for my philosophic blood, and are daily practicing with their tomahawks and scalping-knives, I would say: Wait until you can know whether the Philosophy and Religion you wish to slaughter do not contain in their integral character substantially all that you can, or wish to, preserve. If this statement, which pretends to be an outline only, is found to be incomplete, it can then be supplemented; but it is useless to tear it down for being incomplete before it is finished. Until then I shall be glad of all the help I can get. Suggestions, sent to me by letter or otherwise, will be gladly received as the work goes on.

Second, in this friendly light I am inclined to regard the letter of inquiries by Mr. J. M. King, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 4th. It seems to me that there should be, and that there is, a substantial agreement among Liberal Scientists as to the inquiries he makes. It is such agreement, existing not so much in words as in logical results and conclusions, that my statement seeks to report. Mr. King speaks of me as "throwing out his [my] dogmatic opinions and speculations as if they were demonstrated facts," and yet he calls me a "deep, logical reasoner."

When Mr. King entertains such inconsistent views about me, it cannot be wondered at that he is confused about my treatment of the difficult subject in hand. The lesson to me is, How can I make myself better understood to those who seem determined to feel all over the house, and who will not or can not find the open door? For instance, he actually quotes a paragraph from me beginning, "Life is a property of protoplasm in mass," and which does not contain the word "germ" at all, and then proceeds to charge me with "organic germs," "wonderful germs," etc., etc. Now I had not used these terms nor anything like them, and his comments show, from all that I understand, that there is no disagreement between us as to them, nor, further, as to my position that life is a property of protoplasm, which is all I asserted. But Mr. King next complains because I state that "there is no proof that life exists" in any of the other sixty-seven chemical elements or their compounds. That is, that protoplasm is the only physical basis of life. Upon that point Scientists are now substantially agreed. If Mr. King thinks that they are wrong, he has only to show life in something besides protoplasm and he will have them and me on his side. But until such fact is shown we must decline to talk about the life and thought of matter, or of the "sexes of atoms." Notice that I do not deny any of those "dogmatic speculations." I merely said, "Much less is there proof" of them. Is it "dogmatic" to wait for the proof? I do not deny anything, not even that the moon is a green cheese, but I wait for the proof; and so I wait for the proof that there is any life outside of the organic world, which is all composed of protoplasm in its varied forms.

But Mr. King says that I leave us (him) in "the dark with regard to the origin of protoplasm." Not so. In every statement I have ever made the hypothesis on the subject sustained by me, in the absence of completed observation and experimental proofs, has been that this wonderful substance is a purely natural product. This is the position taken by Haeckel, Huxley, Spencer, and all evolution Biologists, and I have written much to sustain it, which Mr. King has evidently never seen, or he would not have written these "inquiries."

Mr. King says: "He [I] condemns the Materialistic view in toto, for he says, 'Prof. Tyndall's expression about finding the promise and potency of life in atoms of matter other than protoplasm is entirely misleading. Life is not in matter, it is the action and reaction of protoplasmic bodies, and IN them only is it found.'"

Now is this a condemnation of the "Materialistic view in toto?" Such was not the intention of the passage, but just the contrary. Mr. King seems determined to pervert it into something that should be opposed to him, for he says:

"To assert that life is not in matter, is worthy of a genuine orthodox Christian, dyed in the wool. If life is not in the organisms of matter, it must be hovering around them, like iron filings around the point of a magnet."

This "must be" of his is an amusing speculation for a gentleman who accuses me of being dogmatic. But did I not say that "life was only IN protoplasmic bodies? that it was the action and reaction of them?" I said it was not in matter, or actions of matter, "other than protoplasm."

Now, I defy Mr. King to show me any life that is not in the matter called protoplasm, as I stated. When he does I shall agree with him. I have never, for example, seen a headache without a head, and have never seen a head, nor any other living thing, that was not a form of protoplasm.

The trouble is that Mr. King seems to have no conception of the modern phase of Materialism, which rests upon modern Physiology and Psychology, and which regards life, feeling, thought, soul, etc., not as things or materials or entities at all, but as continuous processes of organic matter, and especially of the nerves and brains of animals and of man.

What I was trying to point out was that the music was in the piano, but not in the matter of the piano per se—that is, not in the matter of which the piano was made. The music was in the matter of the piano as a whole when it was being played upon as an organism by the external force of the player. So the life of protoplasm is its continuous action and reaction to and against the conditions and impinging forces of the world about it. No chemical analysis of its matter will ever disclose the music of a piano, nor more will it the life of a protoplasmic organism. The antecedents, causes, and correlatives of its life are not in matter as such, but in the conditions and forces of the world about it which cause the changes and reactions in it which we call life. Matter is the base and material of the life-process, much as the piano and the air vibrations are of music; but they are not the music. Matter may be said to be the battlefield of the "struggle for existence" which we call life, but it is not the battle or struggle itself, which is a process we call life. Modern Science has set aside the old Materialist and the modern Spiritist notion of life, the soul, etc. It is now stated in science not as a thing material, nor as an entity spiritual, but as a continuous process.

It is because Prof. Tyndall's expression above quoted omits this view that it is misleading, and it has been often quoted and used to mislead in the study of life questions in a way which he probably did not intend.

Mr. Lewes, in his "Problems of Life and Mind," has presented the view above intimated in a masterly manner, and it is the one which corrects the deficiencies of Materialism as formerly held, and makes it scientific. It was in the interest of Materialism, as the only true philosophy and explanation of the material world, that I made this modern view of life a prominent part of my statement. The positive integral Philosophy adopts and includes all there is of Materialism. As to the material world, it makes us thorough Materialists; as to the organic world, thorough Vitalists; as to the social and and moral world, thorough Sociologists; and as to the ideal or spiritual world, thorough Idealists.

It combines each of these worlds into a whole, so that they sustain each other in the order just given; and yet it never confuses the facts, laws, and methods peculiar to each. Mr. King has, I fear, concluded too soon, and too dogmatically, about these things, and about my statement of them. If any one is unable to perceive my consistency at first, he need not rush into print, but write me a short statement of his difficulties, which I will answer, and which may benefit me as well as the inquirer.

Third, the great difficulty in understanding the Positive Philosophy and Religion I find to be this, that the minds and hearts of most people are preoccupied with theories and dreams which they can only half believe, but which they do not wish to relinquish. A childish incident reveals the true difficulty. Our little girl overslept this Sunday morning. When called, she said, rubbing her eyes: "I will tell you how it was, mamma. I did wake, just a little, when people began to stir about the house; but I was having such a lively dream that I tried to hold on to it by sleeping more, but I could only catch bits of it, and I was crying that it was gone, and not true."

Are we to be ever "children of a larger growth," trying to sleep in order to hold our dreams, and crying that they are gone? No! we must arise and tackle the realities of life on the basis of truth. That is the object of the Positive Philosophy and Religion.

Paine Celebration

BY THE SPIRITUALIST AND LIBERALIST SOCIETY OF FLINT, MICH.

The 145th anniversary of Thomas Paine's birthday was celebrated by the Liberals of this city and vicinity, in a manner and way that betokens less slavery of thought for the future.

The exercises were well attended, as they were a year ago. The hall was very beautifully decorated with evergreens, appropriate mottoes and paintings, and portraits of those who hav given or are now devoting their lives to the cause of truth.

The portrait of Thomas Paine graced the wall back of the rostrum.. Over it the word PAINE, above which was the double arch, "The world is my country, to do good my religion," in large gilt letters.

Services opened Sunday, 10 A.M., by an original song by the choir. Mrs. C. Fanny Allyn entertained the audience for over two hours; first, reading extracts from Thomas Paine's "Common Sense," "The Crisis," "The Rights of Man," and his discourse on fanaticism and Infidelity. Then came the reading of letters from George Chainey, Elizur Wright, B. F. Underwood, E. Macdonald, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a telegram from T. B. Wakeman, interspersed with very appropriate and appreciativ remarks. Then followed an inspirational discourse, doing as full and complete honor as time would allow to the man who dared to speak and write his own honest thoughts regardless of opposing minds that deemed him a fanatic, but whose zeal and persevering efforts for the rights of men helped him to first pen "The free and independent states of America," and giv that nerve and stimulus to the colonial people necessary to make it an actuality.

In the afternoon M. Babcock, of St. Johns, and Mr. Fields, of Chicago, divided the time in bringing out more facts of Thomas Paine's life, more especially dwelling on the power he wielded over the people during the Revolution, and the real moral independence of the man.

In the evening M. Babcock, "the infamous," gave to the crowded house his famous lecture, "Guiteau, and the Victims of Superstition." The lecture was logical and reasoning, and elicited general approval and satisfaction. After the lecture C. Fanny Allyn gave an impromptu poem on the subject "Thomas Paine," of which to say it was grand, and appropriately honored the man, would be putting it very mild, for seemingly words could not paint a finer eulogy.

The exercises of the day closed with another song (original) by the choir, the audience joining in the chorus.

Monday evening opened with readings of some essays, left out the day before, followed by social games, a dance and banquet.

Fraternally yours, W. R. ALGER.

Talmage's Trifling with the Unknowable.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Talmage seems to be as utterly routed as Judge Black was by the great Infidel. It is made evident that the theologian has been trifling with the sacred record of the flood, in the vain effort to make it appear reasonable. But the theory of a "local option" flood impugns the Lord's veracity. If Noah's flood was local, the covenant, that the waters should no more become a flood, has been repeatedly broken. To a believer in a universe governed by law what can be more ridiculous than the idea of the author of law playing tricks, like a conjurer, with his own laws? If, as some claim, he only performs wonders within the realm of law and in conformity with it, which in our ignorance we imagin to be a violation, the real character of the conjurer is made still more apparent. If walking upon water—a performance in which Peter partly succeeded—was not an act in violation of law, why was not the secret of so useful an art revealed? The mode by which the swine were drowned or the fig-tree withered, if scientifically explained, would be a valuable antidote to superstition. DUNC.

Buy It and Try It.

I hav just finished reading a copy of the second edition, revised and enlarged, of the "Book of the Generation of Jesus," and I think that the author has conclusivly proved that the real Jesus was born 106 B.C., and the stories of the Jesus of the Christian Bible are only revised editions of those.

"SEPHER TOLDOTH JESHU."

I do not see how it is possible for any one to read this little book and continue to believe in any Jesus as the "only begotten son of God." It is as interesting as a novel, and knocks the Bible Jesus "higher than a kite," besides giving other equally damaging testimony concerning the so-called "holy writ."

Price, "Book of the Generation of Jesus," twenty-five cents; "Sepher Toldoth Jeshu," twenty-five cents. Address D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth st., New York. ELMINA.

Ingersoll and Jesus.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A strange dream flitted through my mind;
Not from the pallid night,
But from the blithesome beams of day
It wakened into light;
Wrought not from fancy, but from truth,
It spread a picture clear
Of what might happen if the world
Were thoroughly sincere.

I dreamed that Jesus walked the earth
Just as he walked the sod
Beneath the skies of Galilee,
A man, and not a god;
A man with quivering flesh, and blood
Like what we have to-day;
With self-same eyes and burning soul,
Frank as a child at play.

He walked the earth with sturdy grace,
As if he loved the world;
No sackcloth on his fair, strong limbs,
No lip with anger curled;
He did not seem to hate mankind,
He seemed to think that all
Had something in them of the fire
To make one rise, not fall.

He sought no company select,
He wandered everywhere
With free and independent mind,
Turned not from laugh to prayer.
He with the ardor of a boy
Enjoyed the play and dance,
The crowded mart, the flowery field,
All that could meet his glance.

He touched the glowing heart of things,
And flushed with manly power;
Before no golden shrine he kneeled;
Upright with nature's dower,
He fronted the blue infinite sky,
And worshiped that alone,
Which all the temples of the land
Could not make better known.

Thus he appeared. None knew him now,
His Bible-garb was gone,
And all the pageantry of creeds—
He was the man alone;
Unrecognized the natural force
That once made men sublime,
Not with the marvel of a god,
But fit worth for his time.

He met a priest, who questioned him
If he believed the pope,
And that the instituted church
Was the source of every hope;
If he believed the Trinity—
The Father, Spirit, Son;
And that somehow the infinite three
Made only infinite one.

Said Jesus, with a fine, grand scorn,
"I have no faith in that;
It is a strange absurdity,
A contradiction flat;
I trust to my simple reason,
In what my own mind sees,
And not in the outward fashion
Of councils and decrees."

When the pious priests and bishops
Heard these words that Jesus said,
Though he was their "Lord and master,"
They would have stoned him dead;
Indeed, the brick-bats threatened
A modern religious fight;
But he slipped into a theater,
And so escaped their spite.

A cold blue Presbyterian
Dozed in lofty contemplation,
Forgetting the beautiful sunshine,
In thinking of damnation;
And Jesus, the child of nature,
He failed to understand;
He worshiped the dead, not living,
And would not give his hand.

The cultured Unitarian
Flashed one disdainful look,
Then turned from the natural Jesus
To the image in his book;
The Methodist and Baptist,
And all the sects, indeed,
Rebuffed the genuine Master—
He was not in their creed.

At last he met Bob Ingersoll;
Right welcome here he found,
The nineteenth century Infidel
Advanced on common ground;
For he recognized a brother
Whose heart was sound and true—
A man of men, fresh from a world
Wherein the flowers grew.

And Jesus, with the soul of fire
Which makes all nature kin,
Saw in the bold Iconoclast
The things he reveled in—
The qualities of manhood fair,
The keen and generous mind,
The roaring genius and the thought
That will not be confined.

Said Jesus, "What a wrong it is,
The way men worship me;
I never claimed such honor;
I spent my life to free
The human mind from shackles all;
I want no altars high,
I only want the mind sincere."
Said Robert, "So do I."

Said Jesus, "It is all a lie
The churches' gloomy creed,
I never preached such doctrines,
For I believe each deed
Produces in this world its fruit
Like seed beneath the sky,
And makes, or unmakes, our happiness."
Said Robert, "So do I."

Said Jesus: "How I hate these priests!
They live on coward fears;
They wring their gold from tortured hearts;
They dry no fount of tears;
They walk in pride and selfishness;
Men's woes they multiply;
Oh, I would like to sweep them off."
Said Robert, "So would I."

Said Jesus, "If there is a God
He must be kind and good;
Each mortal is a child of his,
The whole earth's multitude;
He would not make one erring soul
In endless torture cry;
Why, if he did, I'd curse that God."
Said Robert, "So would I."

Said Jesus, "See how poor men sweat
To build the golden throne;
Ah, if I had the power men say
I'd give each one his own;
To-day I'd make a paradise;
To-day should cease each sigh;
I'd scatter flowers on every path."
Said Robert, "So would I."

Said Jesus, "All these churches cold
I'd tumble to the ground,
Or they should ring with music glad,
And warmth and light be found;
Each day, each hour, for every man
The doors should open fly;
I'd make the churches pay their way."
Robert said, "So would I."

Said Jesus: "What a waste of time
To worship what is dead;
I would I were forgotten,
And living truths were spread;
I did my work like other men,
Why not like others die?
I have no faith in miracle."
Said Robert, "Nor have I."

Said Jesus, "What one is, not seems,
Makes for the world a heaven;
The outward show is but a sham;
Not one day out of seven,
But every moment, is sublime
Wherein our powers we try;
I want not creeds, but honest deeds."
Said Robert, "So do I."

Said Robert, "Here's my hand and heart,
The truths you speak I feel;
My reverence for what you are
Compels me not to kneel;
Thy manhood I would vindicate,
And thus appease thy foe;
The honors heaped on thee but curse."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Said Robert, "They that worship thee
Worship an outward sign;
Thy real self is witnessed not,
Veiled in a dazzling shrine;
The godhood that men give to thee
Is but an empty show,
The gilded shadow of vain dreams."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Said Robert, "From thy cross the fire
Of persecution leaps;
The heart of love therein is lost;
Injustice through it keeps
Its bloody throne from age to age,
And man is ground more low,
And Reason's voice is made a crime."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Said Robert, "If thy cross would make
An avenue of light,
To carry messages of peace,
And not make men to fight;
The miracle that I would see
Is in the lightning's glow;
This is the greatest heaven can do."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Said Robert, "I for man would work
His earthly needs to-day;
What makes him better here and now—
'Tis for the world I pray,
Not for another in the sky,
Of which we cannot know;
The living present is our goal."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Said Robert, "If there is a God,
I cannot measure him
In whose great splendor through wide space
The myriad stars grow dim;
The life I see, the things I feel,
In these my thought must flow;
O'er nature's frame I cannot rise."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Said Robert, "In our soul we find
What we must godlike call;
Man weaves from his own being bright
His Lord imperial;
To make an honest God, I say,
As higher still we go,
Is conscience' noblest work and dower."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Said Robert: "Every age must fling
Forward its bright ideal,
Born not of mythic tales of yore,
But from the splendid real.
The impulse of the past we take,
But knowledge still must grow
Broader and deeper evermore."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Said Robert: "In thy deepest life
And in my deepest soul,
Vibrates the truth we both desire,
The glory of the whole;
Thy name hath now become the guard
Of tyranny and woe;
Bury thy name—more great thy grace."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Said Robert: "It is error's night
That I would sweep away;
And then I know the simple truth
Will pour the shining day.
I only fling the rubbish out,
The jewels still must glow
In the new temples of the race."
Said Jesus, "That is so."

Thus with electric sympathy
These glorious spirits burn;
Across the wondrous fields of time
To the same light they turn;
Both working to the self-same end,
To make a happy race,
Not different in the things they seek,
Only in time and place.

Through the long years that intervene
There is a subtle stream
Leaping from soul to soul of man
With million bursting gleam;
'Tis this that makes them one sublime
Across the centuries' scope;
'Tis this that links their separate thought
Into one mighty hope.

Forward in time's unbounded course
They point to stars elate,
Whose clustering fervors beckon us,
And make our work most great,
So that the meanest toil is rich,
Irradiant with vast ends,
Wherein the farthest past of man
With farthest future blends.

There is no sect where heroes meet,
Large-hearted and large-brained;
For they behold the rounded truth
That all by each is gained;
The Buddhas and the Christs that gem
The fields of yesterday
Find in the morrow's Infidel
Their spirits' purest ray.

Religious Rancor.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Puritanical virus of this creed-corrupted place a few days since was stirred to its very depth by the announcement that the ex-preacher, George Chainey, would speak in the largest hall of this city, subject, "The Clergy." Liberalists set forth in glowing terms the talent of this reformed reverend, and the manner in which he showed up clerical inconsistencies and fallacies of the church. Devotees of the deities were alarmed, and insisted that no such Infidel innovation ought to be tolerated, nor such ungodly utterances allowed a hearing in this Christian community. And when the leading pietists learned what was on the tapis they raised such a religious rumpus in opposition that, in order to conciliate them and retain the respectability of the hall, the managers undertook to stave off the lecture by annulling the contract for the hall. They professed ignorance of the fact that it was to be an Infidel lecture, otherwise they said the hall could not hav been engaged at any price, and they insisted that Mr. Chainey should be telegraphed not to come. But since the cash was paid in advance, and the lease duly signed, the hall was held.

The night previous to the lecture the hall was occupied by a clerical "champion of the church," and while the bill-poster was distributing circulars relating to Mr. Chainey's lecture for the following evening, he was forbidden the customary privilege of passing handbills to the people as they entered the hall, and was ordered away from the door. This circumstance shows the animus of religious zealots, and the despicable means to which they will resort in the vain hope to crush out modern Infidelity and suppress the increasing light of the nineteenth century.

Notwithstanding orthodox opposition and the report that the lease of the hall had been revoked, a large and appreciativ audience greeted the speaker. Some of the more audacious subjects of superstition who ventured out to hear the arch-Infidel were surprised to see such a large and respectable gathering of independent thinkers, while a notable absence was observed of sanctimonious swindlers, Sunday-school bank defaulters, and other paragons of piety who so often are conspicuous in jails, penitentiaries, and prayer-meetings. The lecture was a scathing rebuke to ministerial mummery and priestly pretense.

Civilization Before the Bible.

ROCKFORD, W. T., Jan. 16, 1882.

FRIEND EDITOR: I wish you to answer a few questions and publish them in THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I am a reader of your paper: 1. Was there any civilized nation before the Bible came into use? 2. How much older is the Chinese history than our Bible's? and, 3. What is the ol est history known? An answer will accommodate your friend, WM. SOLSBURY.

P. S.—I hav a friend who says he will giv a hundred dollars to any one who will prove that any nation ever was civilized without the Bible. W. S.

The preposterous claim is daily made for Christianity that it is not only the originator of civilization, but that there was no civilization prior to it. But not only is it a fact that there were nations in a forward state of progress before Christianity, but it is also a fact that that system has not helped, but rather retarded, the world's advance since it has been the prevailing religion in Europe. This we fully showed, upon undoubted authority, in a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it will therefore not be necessary to repeat the facts at this time.

The Bible "came into use" at a comparativly late period. But little is known—and that little is often disputed—of the Bible till a few centuries before Christ. To Ezra is given the credit of compiling the Old Testament. He lived between four and five hundred years before Jesus is said to hav come upon the stage. By the longest possible stretch, only 2,300 years can be allowed the Bible since it "came into use." The early Christians discarded the Old Testament, and Origen (A. D. 254) was the first Christian scholar who undertook to learn Hebrew, the original language of that collection.

Allowing that the Bible came into use 2,300 years ago (which it did not by any means, but we giv all the latitude possible), the question remains, Were any nations civilized before that time? Webster says that "civilized" means "reclaimed from savage life and manners; instructed in arts, learning, and civil manners; refined, cultivated." It cannot be claimed that the Jews, in the time of Abraham, were either "reclaimed from savage life," or "instructed in arts, learning, or civil manners." The Bible certainly did not civilize the Jews, and it must be the New Testament the Christians rely upon. But we are willing to go back of that and see.

As we said, five hundred years before Christ is the very earliest period the Christians can say the Bible "came into use." We will first take up China, as we can answer the second question with the first.

Far reaching as is the history of China, it yet fails to giv us any account of the origin of the Chinese race. It was an ancient belief of Chinese writers that there had existed a period of 2,267,000 and odd years between the time when the "powers of heaven and earth united" to produce man as the possessor of the soil of China, and the time of Confucius. Whether this is so or not no one knows, but the authority for the statement is just as good as for the assertion that six thousand years ago man was created in Eden. The Chinese writers believed; so did the Hebrew writers. But this date of creation is accepted in China by more millions than ever put their trust in Moses; and if the Christians stick to their "universality of belief" argument (which Geo. Fisher lays such stress upon in his answer to Ingersoll), they must admit the correctness of Chinese chronology. But we need not deal with millions of years back. Before Moses was found by Pharaoh's daughter, and long before Abraham had taken Isaac up to the mountain to slay, the Chinese were civilized people, cultivating grain for their sustenance and flax for their garments. Before Eve had made her apron of fig-leaves the Chinese knew the value of silk. Before Adam had bartered paradise for an apple the Chinese had developed trade and held fairs at the centers of their districts. Before Joshua had hurled his command at the sun the Chinese knew too much of astronomy to ask that luminary to stand still.

But it is enough for our present purpose that previous to five hundred years before Christ the Chinese were "reclaimed from savage life" and were instructed in arts and learning. Nearly eighteen hundred years before the Jew of Nazareth protested before his rulers and drove the money-changers from the temple we know that the Chinese had governments and drew up written petitions against the acts of kings. Did Jesus ever write a petition? We trow not. Twenty-three hundred and seventy-five years before the wise men followed the star of Bethlehem the Chinese calculated eclipses and took observations of a planetary conjunction. The mariner's compass, gunpowder, and printing are Chinese inventions, made without the use of the Bible or inspiration of God. The first Christian printer was held to be in league with the devil, and Faust was accused of witchcraft by believers in the Bible because he sold Bibles printed in red ink. And this was twenty-six hundred years after a Chinese blacksmith had made movable characters upon baked porcelain paste. This porcelain was also the invention of the Chinese; so were paper, silk, clocks. The oscillating steam engin was invented, according to Prof. Draper, before Christ was born, and by the Chinese. A people possessing all these arts and sciences must certainly hav been "reclaimed from savage life."

Twenty-five hundred years before the Christian era Chin-nung, a Chinese ruler, invented the plow, and from that date the civilization of the country proceeded by rapid and progressiv steps. During the reign of Yaou (2356 B. C.) and his successor Shun, so strong was the force of the example they set that crime was unknown in the land. Was there ever a period in the history of any nation dominated by the Bible when crime was unknown? If so, history is strangely silent. It was during the life of Shun that the great flood occurred in the north of China. A Chinese engineer was employed nine years in draining the country, a stupendous feat never excelled. Could any people not "reclaimed from savage life" boast of such? Their system of numerals was in daily use several hundred years before Christ. Their language dwarfs into "insignificance the antiquity of Western tongues." Eleven hundred and fifty years B. C. a Chinese political offender wrote a book of philosophy within prison walls. Confucius's "Book of History" goes back to the twenty-fourth century before Christ. Time and space would fail to enumerate all the works of biography, science, education, and jurisprudence issued by the ancient Chinese. They had language, literature, laws, long before Jesus Christ was born. They had no help nor hindrance from the Bible. They worked out their lives without the aid of the Jewish Jehovah. Even while his chosen people were floundering around, barbaric nomads, this wonderful people had a civilization which it took centuries and centuries for the Jews to attain. It is only the ignorant who deny this. The facts are accessible and easily proved. But there are some people in the world who think the Bible is all there is of history and literature, of morals and law. Such are, like the ostrich which buries its head in the sand, easily captured.

The glory of ancient Greece is too well known to need an extended enumeration of her deeds and greatnesses. Her people lived in towns filled with palaces and temples of art. Homer did not derive his inspiration from the Bible. The ancient Greeks had their vices, but no one can deny them civilization. They are pointed out by Christian ministers as an example of pagan splendor, and we are told they degenerated because they knew not God. Whether a knowledge of the Jewish Jehovah would hav saved them or not, this much is certain, they not only did not know of him, but at the same time rose to an eminence not equaled by the nations which afterward had the Bible for many centuries.

When the Christians claim that there never was and never can be a civilization without the Bible, they must surely forget Egypt, the country from which Moses stole all he knew. Bunsen called this the "monumental land of the earth." He says the Egyptians were "the chronometers of universal history." "Egyptian civilization" is spoken in the same breath with "Grecian art," and both are as universally acknowledged as the civilization of the United States. Nearly two thousand years before Christ the Egyptians built what Bunsen called the most gorgeous edifice on the globe. Before 1500 B.C. began the most brilliant period of Egyptian history. "No people, ancient or modern," says Champollion, "has conceived the art of architecture on a scale so sublime, broad, and grandiose, as the ancient Egyptian." The "Encyclopedia Britannica" says, "The Egyptian art has the highest place with respect to intention, and equals that of Greece in the excellence with which that intention has been carried out." Bunsen says, "The Egyptians left imperishable monuments of deep ethical thought, of high artistic instincts, and of noble institutions." Can a people who call forth such encomiums be unreclaimed from savage life? It is probable that all the Jews knew they obtained from Egypt. They took from that country a good deal besides jewelry and raiment. They took all the knowledge they possessed of arts, manufactures, and agriculture.

We trust we hav shown to the satisfaction of our friend and his friend that civilization never hinged upon the Jewish Bible. In the light of the learning of the last twenty-five years we had supposed that no one would claim that it did. It is as well established a fact as any in history that there were people who had many of the present arts that constitute civilization many centuries before Ezra and his scribes put together the patchwork that makes up the Jewish Bible. The Chinese had good government, with the right, freely exercised, of petitioning; they had considerable knowledge—more than the Bible Christians of A. D. 1500—of astronomy; they had great skill in civil engineering; they were inventors, and first brought forward those inventions which hav since made the Western world so great; they were skilled agriculturists, and in manufactures they had many cunning arts unequaled by the mechanics of the present. Indeed, the Chinese seem to hav been a much more progressiv people centuries before Christ than they are to-day. It may be that the reason of this can be found in the fact that the Chinese empire is too densely populated. New countries always develop more energy and skill than old ones. However that may be, the fact remains as we hav stated. The authority for these facts is universally acknowledged. It may be found in any history. There is no more doubt of it than there is that the Christians of the middle ages murdered millions of human beings for their heresy.

Our friend's friend can send his check as soon as convenient.

Christian Littleness.

After the late exhibitions of Canadian bigotry, we are not surprised at anything that takes place in that priest and God ridden country. But the following, from the Daily Ontario, shows a new phase of Christian interference with other people's business, and we giv it as a curiosity of Christian effort:

"On the evening of the 26th ult. there was a jovial party at the house of a well-known resident of the second concession of Sidney. They were merrily tripping the 'light fantastic' to the dulcet notes of piano and violin, and the hours flew by on winged feet. About one o'clock in the morning, when the fun and frolic were furious, suddenly there came a tapping—as if somebody was rapping, gently rapping at the parlor door. The genial host hastened to open wide the portal to his hospitable mansion, and bid his belated guests welcome to the cheer and warmth within. The smile upon his handsome face was turned into a ghastly grin when he beheld a number of pious neighbors, headed by a minister of the gospel, formed in solemn file on his doorstep. They quietly accepted the invitation to 'come in,' and formed a semicircle about the stove. There was a sudden lull in the dancing, and the gallants looked askance, while the belles blushed and tittered. But the silence was only for a moment. The minister, having removed his muffler and coat, arose and said, 'Let us pray.' This was something not on the program, and the merry-makers demurred. They protested that a prayer-meeting and dancing-party could not be carried on satisfactorily in the same room and at the same time; and that, as they were the prior occupants of the premises, the praying party were intruders. Both sides were determined to 'hold the fort,' and so while the saints were praying in one room the sinners danced in the other. This did not work well, and the host called a council of war, and resolved to allow the minister and his company twenty minutes to finish their devotions. When the allotted time expired, they (the prayers), were asked to retire, which they reluctantly complied with, the revelers cheering their retreating footsteps with 'One More River to Cross.' We state facts, and hav only to add that, while the minister and his friends were actuated by good motivs, they actuated most injudiciously. If the dancing party was held with the approval of the host and hostess, an intrusion of religious worship by uninvited guests did much more harm than good. Other and more suitable times and places for reproving worldliness could be found."

Mr Bennett finds so much that is new and interesting in the far-away East that he has concluded he cannot get it all in two volumes, and so there will be three. Volume I. will include all up to the Chronicles, and has already appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We shall at once make up the volume and as soon as the illustrations are ready, hav it printed and sent to the subscribers to the fund. In a few weeks all who hav paid the five dollars will receive the first volume, and the remaining two as soon as completed.

The "form" in which the names are printed will be left to the last to giv all who wish a chance to subscribe and hav their names in the first volume. All names accompanied with the five dollars received between now and March 1st will appear in the first volume. We shall print the list but once more, and we hope to see it very much increased. We shall take pleasure in adding new names.

Another New Book.

ALAMONTADA, THE GALLEY-SLAVE. A Narrativ. By Johann Heinrich Daniel Zschokke. Translated from the German by Ira G. Mosher, LL. B. Published by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This work is a narrativ of a young man for whose possession Fame and Misfortune seem to hav disputed with each other, with a victory at last for the latter. Its hero saw early in his life how hatred and egotism more than forbearance and piety were written on the banner of contending sects. Circumstances placed him suspended between two churches—Protestant and Catholic—the former of which he had to confess secretly, the latter openly; and he acknowledges that he became, though almost without knowing it, a hypocrit and a doubter of both. He saw that the arguments with which one attacked the doctrins of the other were sharper, more thoroughly weighed, and more effectiv than those with which they defended themselvs. This awakened in him a suspicion of all dogmas of faith. Yet he was obliged to conceal his thoughts in order not to become an open denier of them. He was thrown into the society of a thoroughly unprincipled man, but whom he believed to be honest, and whom he loved—and whose wife loved him. His struggles with his passions, his belief and disbelief, were incessant. The superstitions of his childhood he could not at times shake off, and again he was intoxicated with exaltations of mental freedom. But he warred manfully with himself and the world, and seemed about to be rewarded with all that complete victory over adversity can bestow. He had won a name, a wife, and a competence, when came the massacre of Nismes in 1703. Interceding with the Marshal de Montreval in behalf of the persecuted Huguenots, among whom were his uncle and family, he was denounced as a heretic and condemned to the galleys—one of the unnumbered victims of the love of God shown in the hatred of man; and thereafter his history is that of Alamontada the galley-slave. How he bore the grief of separation, the suffering and degradation of slavery, is told by the author better than it can be hinted at here. Through the whole sad story there runs the golden thread of the religion of humanity and the philosophy of one who has wakened to the light of the newer day.

Prof. Mosher has left nothing to be desired in the way of bringing out the true meaning of the author's words, though the work of the translator is one of scarcely less responsibility than that of the writer. This work will find a place in the literature of romance and philosophy with those of Geo. Eliot, which divert the mind while they free and strengthen it. The study and enterprise which hav united to giv "Alamontada, the Galley-Slave," to the English-reading public should be rewarded by a demand for many editions of it.

Struck Dead.

The following, from the Cincinnati Star, has been sent us for our opinion:

"Three young men in Union county, Arkansas, were discussing the probabilities of rain from a cloud which was just then rising in the west, a few days ago. The youngest of the group, John Freeman, referred to the drouth, and remarked that a God who would allow his people to suffer thus could not amount to much. Instantly a bolt of lightning flashed from the cloud overhead, and the young man fell dead. Nearly every bone in his body was mashed into jelly, while his boots were torn from his feet and the clothing from his lower extremities. The body presented a horrible appearance, being a blackened and mangled mass of humanity. His companions were stunned and thrown on the ground, but not seriously injured. The funeral of the unfortunate young man occurred next day and attracted a large crowd, the larger portion of whom were drawn thither by the rumor of the strange event preceding the death of the deceased. When the body was deposited in the grave and the loose earth had been thrown in until the aperture was filled, and while the friends of the dead man yet lingered in the cemetery, a bolt of lightning descended from a cloud directly over the burial-place and struck the grave, throwing the dirt as if a plow had passed lengthwise through it. No one was injured, but those present scattered almost paralyzed with terror."

Our opinion is that it is a lie

THE sweetest and best oranges we ever had the pleasure of tasting came to us lately as a kindly remembrance from J. O. Cosby, Micanopy, Fla. They were his own raising, and if the orange-eating public only knew their worth he would get rich from his grove. He has the thanks of THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

MESDAMES COLBY AND SMITH still continue their meetings at Frobisher Hall, 23 E. 14th st., every Sunday morning and evening.

MOSES AND MATTIE HULL speak in Buffalo Feb. 19th and 26th. During that time they can be addressed at 123 West Eagle st., Buffalo, N. Y.

THE next meeting of the Society of Humanity will be held at Science Hall, 141 8th st., next Sunday evening, Feb. 19th, when Corneille Eugene Jacquet will lecture upon "Positivism and the late M. Littre."

THERE has been a bill introduced into the Massachusetts legislature "to regulate the practice of medicin." The Banner of Light publishes a "Remonstrance Petition," and urges its circulation and signature.

THE Two Worlds says that Dom Pedro, the emperor of Brazil, is nominally a Roman Catholic, but is generally understood to be a Rationalist of an advanced type. He is opposed to all religious instruction in schools.

MR. AND MRS. JAMES A. BLISS, the well-known physical mediums of Providence, R. I. (formerly of Philadelphia, Pa.), will soon visit Chicago, Ill., where they will hold their seances every evening, for full form materialization.

THE following card explains itself:

ALTOONA, PA., Feb. 11, 1882.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In my note concerning Colonel Ingersoll's temperance speech you publish the signature W. S. Burns, when it should be W. J. Burns. Will you please correct it? There is a W. S. Burns in this place, but he is not a Liberal. He is a "fish-eater." W. J. BURNS.

WE regret to learn that our old friend, S. D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich., is suffering from the effects of a bad fall. We rejoice, however, that he is surely though slowly recovering. He has had a warm invitation to go to Eureka Springs, Ark., and contemplates making the Liberals of that place a visit.

THE northern Wisconsin Spiritual Conference will hold a three days' meeting in Spiritual Hall, Omro, March 3d, 4th, and 5th, 1882. The Spiritualists intend making this one of the most social and interesting meetings ever held in that place. Frank T. Ripley, J. O. Barrett, and other speakers will be present. Mr. Ripley will giv tests from the rostrum. J. R. Talmadge has been invited to sing.

THE Washington Republican, of the 4th, says that George A. Bacon, Col. J. C. Smith, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Dr. Wm. Boyd, and Charles White, Esq., hav been appointed a committee to receive the necessary funds, and hav prepared a suitable statue of Thomas Paine, to be presented through Congress to the people of the United States. This monument should be built as high and grand as the one to Washington.

Why Is It?

Why is it that while mankind are so brave and progressiv in most directions, they are so conservativ and timid in others?

In most directions men and women will endure any hardship, face any danger, and welcome any change against established usage and time-honored customs. In the pursuits of the arts and sciences they will welcome any change or danger that promises to increase wealth or enlarge the domain of the useful and beautiful. Guided by the instinct of patriotism they will shed their blood like water under the inspiration of love of country. In the prosecution of great commercial enterprises they will handle dynamite and nitroglycerin with apparent unconcern. No considerations of personal danger, enhanced to a fearful degree by the almost constant occurrence of fearful destruction of life and property by land or water, deter human beings in the least from rushing headlong along the same lines of danger. Everywhere and on every hand, we see the same persistent energy and careless indifference to bodily injury and destruction.

In the domain of mechanics every element is brought into play to encourage and stimulate inquiry and invention, and every new accession to mechanical appliances that open up new fields of industry and enterprise, or that supplant old method by new, whereby time is economized, is hailed with delight and satisfaction. Even when an invention entirely destroys long-established and useful occupations, and throws out of employment large bodies of men that hav spent many years in perfecting themselvs for the work, and it reduces them to poverty—even then men boldly accept the inevitable, and what is considered best for the general good the people hav courage to accept. In the domain of agriculture, also, the same principle is recognized, and he or she that can make two blades of grass grow where only one grew before is hailed as a benefactor. All this is right, and the mechanic or farmer that pursues old methods, or uses the same old tools, when better methods and better tools are within reach, is justly esteemed a simpleton.

If reason, courage, and investigation, with a readiness to accept any improvement in the physical departments of human use, are commendable, why not in the moral and intellectual?

The present status of the human mind demonstrates very clearly that the moral and intellectual phase of humanity has been cramped, dwarfed, and fettered, while the commercial side has been allowed to expand, develop, and strengthen. With the ordinary precision of the human mind, its insight has been too obtuse to discover the causes of its enslavement.

Two important factors hav always acted in harmony to produce the results that are so universal. Mankind are like a pair of scales that never balance. The industrial and commercial scale contains the most justice and bravery; the other all the cowardice and mental and moral servility. Under such circumstances human nature is one-sided, angular, and superstitious.

The twin factors are wealth and theology. The union of these in connection with the state constitutes a triumvirate that is a standing conspiracy against human liberty. The savants of wealth, and the church, hav had one common purpose, the former to control the bodies, and the latter to manipulate the minds. The more the latter could subject the race to its creeds and ceremonials, the more readily could wealth and statecraft reduce him to a machine and a menial.

Whatever transforms the human, or any phase of his make-up, to the abnormal condition of the slave, so far substitutes cowardice for courage, and brutality for generosity. This truth is self-evident, for creed worship, and tame submission to the despotism of wealth, never generated a generous thought, nor a brave heart.

How sadly replete is the history of creed worship and the despotism of wealth with all that belittles instead of ennobling human nature! How impatiently, desperately, and cruelly they hav met every scientific and intellectual problem that sought the removal of old prejudices and time-honored errors! With what persistent effort they hav tried to beat back the tide of inflowing light and liberty!

This on the part of priests, politicians, and governmental rulers, is little cause for surprise, for the true liberation of the masses means their dethronement.

The great question for consideration is, why is it that the people do not see their own debasement, and the necessity of striking off their own fetters? "Who would be free, themselvs must strike the blow!" Not until men perceive the absolute necessity of using their reasons to utilize all means within their reach, to improve their mental and moral natures, as they do new tools, and new methods in the physical departments, will they become courageous and just sufficiently to guard well their own rights, and duly respect those of all others.

Why is it also, that men are so mentally and morally obtuse and blind as not to see that others hav the same undoubted right to reject as they hav to accept any creed or party doctrin? There livs no man who does not instantly detect the injustice of calling in question his right to believe or disbelieve whatever to him seems right or wrong. This being universal in its existence, what supreme folly it is to deny its universal demand for general recognition!

What a grand step we shall hav gained when our kind shake off this moral and mental lethargy, when they dare to face the consequences of a new idea that comes in conflict with these old methods of thought as they dare now to face the physical dangers that beset them on every hand. Think of men facing daily the deadly damps of the mines to furnish us with the various ores and coals for mechanical and domestic uses. You can take up no paper from the great mining centers in which you will not read of terrible accidents and acts of heroism that pale the actions of the fields of war. As a rule these brave hearts belong to creed-bound minds, who, could they rise to the altitudes of rational liberty, would constitute an invincible host. Long acquaintances with this class of human toilers assure me that they are grandly generous in the main, and brave to a fault. Their daily lives are in close and constant proximity to bodily destruction, and yet heroically they pursue this dangerous occupation.

Low in the scale as many esteem this class, this fact is undeniable, that they are more easily reached than are those who claim higher respectability, for the simple reason that the latter are more effeminate, and consequently more afraid of Mrs. Grundy and of losing the favor of the theologians and politicians.

What men should fear most is the lack of courage to face squarely any and every idea that has either a direct or remote influence on human well-being, or indeed any question or questions that can be suggested by the human mind. We confess our cowardice whenever we condemn or treat with disrespect any idea, thought, or principle we hav not taken time to consider. We should possess an honest pride in holding the mind free to accept every new truth or enlargement of the old. Instead of treating with disrespect those who call in question the integrity of our modes of thought, we should giv them welcome, for they may be the bearers of new tools for intellectual work. Think of men fearing an Ingersoll or detracting from the character of Voltaire or Paine. Ingersoll can destroy no gods that hav a tangible existence; those that hav not, time will take care of. The colonel can affect no truth permanently only as he helps to forward its use. His opposition to a living truth would only enhance its value by rubbing off some of the dross that might encase it. As for the detractors of Voltaire or Paine, they simply expose their ignorance or malice, or both. What would be thought of a man or class of men who should affirm that God had revealed to them the fact that the proper way to preserve the body and fit it for the duties of its existence was to girdle it closely with an iron frame at the age of twelve years. Would they not be deemed insane or too fanatical for any notice save pity or contempt? In what respect would this be more absurd than the position of the orthodox teachers to-day? For do they not affirm that they hav a revelation no whit less ridiculous, in which to encase the mind, saying, Here it is; thus far and no farther shall it expand; pass our iron-bound limit, and we will commence the damnation in this world, which "our God" will continue endlessly. Could absurdity, arrogance, and despotism go farther?

This is the simple solution of the question explaining why on the one hand human nature is so brave, and on the other so destitute of mental and moral courage. As little by little the hills melt into the valleys, and slowly but surely the immense glaciers creep down the gorges, so will truth by agitation find its way into the minds and growing reason of the race until the reign of justice shall be reached, and the blessings of liberty become universal.

In conclusion, why is it that those who view our existence as confined within a narrower space than do the Spiritualists, are continually begging the question and telling us that our first duty is to attend to earthly things, and when these are corrected they will help us look after matters pertaining to the "summer land?" We assure them that we appreciate their good intentions, but cannot respect their intelligence regarding our status..

In the first place, who has battled more manfully than our workers of both sexes for liberty of thought and freedom from theological dogmatism? What class hav been more bold in defense of Thomas Paine, Voltaire, and all others occupying the front rank of mental liberators? There is no question too sacred for them to grapple with, and that they do not ignore the duties that lie nearest is demonstrated by their readiness to aid every effort looking to human well-being. Spiritualism demands that we must make the most of the means within our reach to develop, harmonize, and strengthen us for the duties that belong to each. We are spirits here as well as in the hereafter, and the only time in which to work out this grand life-problem is the "eternal now." Certainly hope in a better future does not lessen our usefulness in work for the present. If so, then of all men are Bros. Wakeman and Leland growing rapidly debilitated.

Take from our able president his faith and hope of a brighter day for humanity, and you would soon see his strong, clear brain assume an indifference that would amount to paralysis of that organ. We should hav few if any more of his able discourses. The same is true of our able and activ secretary. Let him be shorn of his enthusiasm in the millennial glory that awaits us on the accomplishment of secularization, and the keen, incisiv strokes of his witty brain and pen would be so blunted that the original genial and sparkling "Tee Cee Lee" would drop into a small, common-place individual. Yes, gentlemen, 'twere well to stop this bantering, for if we are not quite as clear-seeing as you, we are just as earnest as any can be to forward the honest work of the Liberal League. If the most radical reform element to which you belong were not sustained very largely by our less, perhaps, clear-seeing element, those workers would hav little support indeed. Still further, had we not done our share in preparing the public mind for the reception of the principles that as a National Liberal League we represent, there would hav been no inauguration of the movement in 1876. While I care nought for what people believe or think, providing they accord to others what they claim for themselvs, I do care what is said by those whom I love and honor, and cannot help regretting the injustice intimated by the careless enunciation of words that cannot be applied truthfully to the honest workers in the ranks of Spiritualism. Where one Spiritualist has left the ranks of the old League from among us twice the number of the Ingersoll, Underwood, and Abbot stripe hav deserted us. A little more grape for them, and less injustice toward us, is the better course, I think.

Ever for the right and truth, GEO. LYNN.

Vice Shielded by Law.

The article of E. C. Walker entitled, "Patent Morality," contains some grand ideas. In the reformation from a wrong to its antithetical right he would use "science, reason, and love;" so, too, would Liberta. He believes that humanity injures itself by over-eating, over-working, late hours, excessiv or insufficient sexual intimacies, expensiv or improper clothing, over-stimulation of the mental and nervous organisms, indulgence in the use of alcohol, tobacco, opium, drugs, medicins, etc. So far I emphatically agree with Mr. Walker.

When he says that "your laws hav retarded, retard, and always will retard the work of the reformers," I cannot agree with him.

When Abraham took his half-grown son to the top of a hill, and built an altar, and placed Isaac upon it, and took up a great knife to cut his throat, as a blood-offering to the bloodthirsty incomprehensible nothing he worshiped, the father had an undeniable legal right to take the life of his son. It is true the reformer found this law giving an absolute ownership of the son to the father very much in his way, just as the temperance reformer of to-day finds the license law in his way.

The reformer made it illegal for the father to take the life of his son; first, after the son had reached a certain age; then earlier, until it protected even the newly-born infant. At last he went further than that, and placed the restraint of the law even upon the hand of the mother that sought to take the life of the yet unborn child. Such is the tender regard for human life that the reformer has engrafted upon our laws. Was it not "science, reason, and love" that urged him on until he had made the laws thus watchful and complete.

The laws we hav were not all made by tyrants and despots seeking their own selfish ends, but were made by wise, generous statesmen, who were laboring for the progress and civilization of their race. Here in America, where the laws are made, indirectly, by the people—the governed—the object, the trend of the law is toward the good of all. Our theory is that if we giv up anything of personal liberty, we are to receive as much again in personal security.

Does the law say to us, "You shall not steal?" It also says to us, "You shall not be stolen from." Does it say to us, "You shall not sell intoxicating liquors?" It also says to us: "You shall not be called upon to support so many insane asylums, jails, prisons, and almshouses. Your head is in less danger from the hand of furious drunkenness." To wives and children it says: "Your husband and father will not squander his meager earnings for rum; you shall hav bread; he will no longer come home to you maddened with drink; he will no longer be to you a demon in temper, a hog in manners. No! the law has undertaken to giv you a sober, gentle, manly, loving husband and father." Thus we hav a law on the side of right, and no longer a shield for vice, pauperism, and crime.

Ah! Mr. Walker, do not "science, reason, and love" plead for such a law?

The law proposed by the prohibitionists is that which is least offensiv in its mode of attack upon this dreadful fountain-head of desolation and crime. It looks out most sharply for the dealer—for the man who has a heart that cannot be melted by the tears of hunger, nor touched by the helpless hands of the widow and the orphan. Churches and pious institutions are built with the money thus heartlessly wrung from want and helplessness. Vassar's brewery, at Poughkeepsie, built the most orthodox of edcational institutions, Vassar College. The Vassars hav given more for the support of churches than any other family in the county of Duchess.

The rum-shops support the churches. Is it any wonder that the churches stand, with the imbecility of hypocrisy, of course, almost without exception, in favor of the inhuman and corrupt license systems that are filling our country with blasted homes, houseless women and children, armies of tramps, and innumerable retreats for the ruined, the depraved, and the criminal. The gilded palaces of crime that inhuman demons build, in which to lure the gay and happy hearts of youth, and when they hav wrung from them the last drop of joyous blood hurl them forth wounded and broken in misery and poverty to lead lives of suffering and crime, the law, led on by "science, reason, and love," will certainly, by and by, grasp with its hand of might and use for nobler ends.

What is the field of the reformer if it is not to engraft upon the laws of his country the principles of civilization he has discovered? "Patent morality!" exclaims our old friend Walker, as if he held in contempt everything moral that could be offered as a rule of law. The aim of every wise and honest statesman is to make the law keep pace with and giv expression to the highest moral convictions of his people. Is it not a matter of mere common sense that the law should not be in favor of rum-selling, that it should not giv out with a liberal hand licenses to destroy; but that it should put forth the united strength of a people to crush that which degrades and makes brutal many of the brightest and most lovable of men.

Mr. Walker says intemperance is the result of ignorance. Perhaps some of it is. Much of it is not. Daniel Webster was not noted for his ignorance. Lord Byron was not reputed as one void of common sense. Edgar Allan Poe was never represented as a dull or stupid person. Robert Burns was nobody's fool; thousands of men who were kind, loving, tender husbands and fathers, bright and activ clergymen, lawyers, doctors, farmers, and mechanics, hav fallen before this mighty foe. Now, alas, when we seek to stay this awful avalanche bearing its horrid load of crime, disease, and death, we are told that the priceless boon of liberty is endangered.

Merciful Jupiter! has freedom in wrong-doing come to be known as liberty? Is it possible a devil has seduced our sweet goddess of liberty and made of her the common painted bawd of the rum-shop? Is she henceforth to be bound in chains and dragged with the foul gang of prostitutes that are bound at the chariot axle of that hateful old rake, King Alcohol?

No, no; with eager hands and hearts the "apostles of liberty," guided by "science, reason, and love," rallying to her rescue and driving this foul demon from our glorious country, will, by legal enactments and constitutional amendments, giv him notice never again to return. LIBERTA.

The Press.

The right to think cannot be interfered with by constable nor postmaster. But without the power to express his thought, the thinker must suffer most keenly. He must giv to his neighbor the fruits of his observations and cogitations, else his work is only half done. So the press must be free from censorship or supervision. A government which cannot guarantee such freedom is not worthy to exist, does not deserve and should not receive the respect of any honest woman or man. It is a hollow mockery, a thing to be condemned, spit upon, and derided.

Perhaps we need not hav expected anything better of the Canadian government, yet I am surprised at the action of the collector of Ottawa. Will the people of Canada endure such wrongs? That is the question. And Paine's works are "indecent!" That is strange. I had supposed that unpopular physiological works only were "indecent" and "obscene." Can any of the cultured authorities explain this thing? Will somebody who insisted that if Liberals would only confine themselvs to the sale of Infidel works, they would not be interfered with by vice societies and their governmental tools, please rise?

The action in regard to Foote's Health Monthly affects us very closely, for it occurs in "free America," and is a fine commentary upon our spread-eagle Fourth of July orations. The question is, What are we going to do about it? Shall we patiently submit? And then, where is it to end? Where will the postal lightning strike next? Considering all that has occurred during the last five years, are we in a position to exult to any great extent over the "effete monarchies" of Europe? Had we not better hang up our bugles and sit down and patiently think for a while, then arise and act? Or are we going to turn the other cheek meekly to our oppressors? What say you, countrymen? E. C. WALKER.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 72.

824. When Jesus practically told the woman of Samaria, who followed him and worshiped him, that she was a dog, or belonged to the dogs, it was extremely uncourteous. She was a human being, and if she did not belong to the race of Jews, it did not make her a dog. A gentlemanly person would hardly address a well-disposed woman in that manner. If God is really the author of all the nations of the earth, neither he nor his son should asperse and insult some by styling them dogs.

825. I cannot think it becoming conduct, when Jesus accepted the hospitality of one of his countrymen, and went home and dined with him, to refuse to follow the custom of washing before eating, and to turn upon his host and call him a fool, a hypocrite, and names of that class. When he denounced people as vipers, hypocrites, children of hell, and piled similar vile epithets upon them, it not only evinced bad breeding, but very poorly carried out his own doctrine of loving enemies. Such language does not show much love.

826. I cannot think Jesus showed much correct knowledge of physical and mental diseases when he thought they were produced by devils entering into the diseased person. Such opinions evince the grossest ignorance and superstition. A physician who should now-a-days hold that every insane person, those who are dumb, and those afflicted with other ailments of the mind and body, had a devil or devils in them, would be justly considered guilty of a most grave error. Insanity cannot now be cured by pretending to drive a devil out of the diseased person. Such a practice would be hooted at by every sensible person, but it would be just as rational and correct now as it was two thousand years ago. Jesus is said to have done a good deal of that kind of business. From one frail woman he is said to have cast out seven devils, and from one crazy man two thousand devils, or enough to enter two thousand swine, causing them to rush madly down a precipitous place into the sea, and be drowned. Such stories located in modern times would be regarded as the silliest and idlest of tales. Yarns about devils taking possession of men and women might have amused children and silly people nineteen hundred years ago, but sensible people would give them no credence now. They would be regarded as the most absurd falsehoods.

827. It seems very far from the spirit of justice that Jesus should have declared that the people of the time in which he lived should be answerable for all the blood that had been shed centuries before they were born, and that all the blood thus shed should be required at their hands. It is not the principle of justice to hold children guilty of the wrongs done by their forefathers hundreds and thousands of years previously. Neither are parents guilty for the misdeeds their offspring may commit centuries after they have passed away.

828. I cannot accept the wisdom or justice of Jesus in holding mendicancy, idleness, and begging as superior and more worthy of reward than industry, thrift, and frugality, claiming that the one should be sheltered in Abraham's bosom, and the other consigned to the ceaseless fires of hell, where a single drop of water would not be furnished him. Jesus was what might be called an idler or tramp himself; though having learned a useful trade, he ceased to follow it, or to perform any labor by which to earn his own bread, but rather strolled over the country, followed by a band of people equally as idle and non-producing as himself. He seems to have had a preference for the idle, worthless class; to consider mendicancy and vagabondism as virtues worthy of the highest reward, and industry, economy, and frugality as crimes worthy of eternal punishment. Men who now-a-days pass their lives as Jesus did his, are called tramps, and regarded as outcasts and worthless persons, unworthy of respect or recognition.

829. I cannot think it godlike, or of the highest conceivable model of perfection, for Jesus to show himself so amenable to flattery, adulation, and personal attraction. If a person spoke words of flattery to him, called him a wonderful person, the son of God, or something of that kind, it seemed to please him, and he showed far more vanity in this direction than did some of the old pagan philosophers, who would not allow adulations to be served out to them, and who took no pleasure in flattery. Jesus allowed women to lavish their fondling caresses upon him, to kiss him, to anoint and wash his feet, to wipe them with the hair of their heads, to thus work over him by the hour, and he was so pleased with it that he accounted it to them as righteousness, and on account of it forgave them all the sins they had committed. He was bitter on those who did not flatter him, and sweet on those who praised him. Zoroaster, Buddha, Confucius, and Thales would hardly have done this.

830. It cannot be regarded as filial and dutiful in him to the mother who bore him to speak to her coldly in company, and harshly ask her who she was, and what he had to do with her.

831. It was very questionable in him to enjoin that persons should hate their father and mother, their brothers and sisters, their wives and children, and give all their love to him. Many of the pagan teachers enjoined love to parents, and fraternal affection in the strongest terms.

832. It was hardly reasonable for him to require a man to love the Lord with all his mind, with all his soul, and all his strength, and then to love his neighbor as himself. If a man gives all his love to God, how much can he have for his neighbor, or anybody else? The command is tantamount to saying, Give God your entire love, all you have, and bestow all that is left upon your neighbor.

833. It was doubtful morality in him to say, "I say unto you, make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that when ye fail they may receive you into everlasting habitations." It sounds much like telling them to study worldly policy and make friends with sinful and unrighteous persons for the beuefits that thereby might be derived. It is a species of Jewish shrewdness that would hardly have been commended by Buddha, Confucius, Thales, and Bias. They would have said, Do right at all times for the love of right, let the consequences be what they may. Be not a policy man; make not friends with bad and sinful men, even if you gain personal favors thereby.

834. I cannot conceive it was in a spirit of mercy and forgiveness that Jesus spoke these words, or put them in the mouth of a ruler whom he held up as a model, "Those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me." It partakes far more of the spirit of tyranny and despotism than of fraternal love and universal brotherhood. It does not sound like Confucius.

835. It was not commendable morality in him to command his disciples to go and take a mule, an ass, or a colt which belonged to another, and bring the same to him for his own use. It would have been more correct for him to have hired a horse, if he wished to ride, or, at least, to have asked the permission of the owner. There are persons now-a-days who take people's horses and mules without asking their owner's consent, and they are also sent to prison for doing it.

836. It did not show wisdom, patience, nor good sense on the part of Jesus to expect a fig-tree to be in bearing when it was not the season of the year for figs to appear, and to get angry because he expected a thing so unreasonable, and to curse the tree to death. I scarcely ever heard of a more absurd and senseless piece of business. What would be now thought of a man who in February or March should take a notion that he wanted some fresh apples and go out into his orchard to get them, and because he found the trees not in bearing get exceedingly angry about it, and curse the trees or cut them down? He surely would be regarded as a fool or a madman.

837. His conduct toward the sellers of doves, etc., for sacrifices in the temple, and the money-changers, did not exhibit the character for gentleness which is usually attributed to him. If it was right for the Jews to make sacrifices of doves and the like to the Lord, it was very convenient for them to be able to obtain them near where they were to be used. If God took pleasure in those sacrifices he should have been pleased with all reasonable facilities offered for promoting the business. The money-changers were also a convenience to the people who went there to sacrifice, and the custom was one of long standing. But, to say the very least, it was not courteous, gentle, nor lamblike for Jesus to rudely upset their tables, and whip them and beat them with scourges as if they were dogs engaged in sheep-stealing. If they were doing wrong he should have expostulated with them, and by reasonable arguments shown them the evil they were committing.

838. I cannot think this sentiment one that should have the approbation of reasonable people: He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned. The more it is looked at and realized, the more unjust and abhorrent it appears. Aside from the questionable justice of conferring an infinite favor upon a person for the simple matter of belief, regardless of conduct, it is well known that belief is an arbitrary condition of the mind, and is not subject to the control of evidence and not to caprice. For a person to consistently believe anything he must have evidence to convince his reason that it is so. A person cannot believe that to be true which he has every reason to think is false. A man of sound mind cannot believe that cold is heat, black is white, night is day, winter is summer, that twice two are seven, even if he is commanded to do so on pain of death. How unjust and unreasonable, then, to consign men and women to damnation, to the eternal furnace or lake of fire which he said had been prepared for the devil and his angels from the foundation of the world, simply because they could not believe what they had no evidence of. The command is calculated to make people hypocritical—to pretend to believe what they do not believe, or to make them accept as truth that which they have not duly investigated and weighed with their best judgment and reason. I pronounce it one of the most monstrous sentiments ever uttered; and as it is ascribed to a person who has been held up as a god and a savior of the world, it has done incalculable injury. It has been the authority for the persecution, torturing, and life-taking that in a most demoniacal manner have been visited upon millions of helpless human beings because they were faithful to their convictions, and because they would not pretend to believe what they had no evidence of, and what they could not possibly believe. If a man cannot believe a thing, he cannot, and it is the most conceivable injustice to send him to everlasting torture for it. It is, indeed, a most monstrous doctrine. None of the pagan philosophers ever taught anything half so monstrous! No system of religion in the world has anything half so monstrous!

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to apply to the Round-the-World trip. Please send books as soon as published, as we miners are very needy of reading matter. We are living eleven thousand feet above the level of the sea, near to the clouds. Some of your readers probably think we ought to hear the angels of heaven sing, but I tell you we can hear the howls of such four-legged monsters as bears and wolves a good deal plainer than the angels in heaven. The mail reaches us twice a week on snow-shoes.
Yours truly. EDWARD WEEKS.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find money order for $5.00 for the Round-the-World trip, Mr. Bennett's letters from abroad, and as you hav kindly left the door open until the 20th, I will embrace the opportunity of having my name inscribed on the starry roll of honor, hoping that for once you will believe that the eleventh-hour workers should hav the same opportunity as those who began in the morning. If I did not help to send, I will contribute a mite to help to bring back the grand old hero of Freethought. Yours for wisdom, light, and truth,
MARY H. BROWN.

AI, OHIO, Feb. 4, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to help pay for Mr. Bennett's trip around the world and the forthcoming books. As I am the only one that takes THE TRUTH SEEKER at this office, I thought I must hav the books also, that after we hav read them I might hav them to lend, hoping they will help to open the eyes of some of my pious neighbors, or to bring them out of their superstitions. We lend the paper to all who will read it, but the most of the folks about here are afraid of it or of their popularity—I don't know which. Perhaps if you will send some of your posters here it may induce some to send for the paper.

Hoping for Mr. Bennett's safe return home,
That in THE TRUTH SEEKER he long may engage,
So the people of all nations may read it
Ever from youth to old age.
MRS. E. WILLSON.

PARKHILL, ONT., Feb. 4, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find ten dollars, which you will please place to my credit. I am obliged to you for sending me the paper so long after the year was up. I hope that I will not be in arrears again, and hope that all those that hav not paid up will do so, and renew and pay two years' subscription in advance. You may put me down for five dollars to help Mr. Bennett home, I think that as you are going to so much trouble to print the names of those who subscribe to the book, you should giv the post-office addresses, county and state. I think that it would be beneficial to all Liberals traveling, as they would know where to find their friends. If you think proper to do so, I would like my name down; if not, I will save you the trouble, as my name would be neither useful nor ornamental; but I want the book, and wish to help Mr. Bennett home, all the same.
Yours with respect. W. O. MARRIN.

PORTSMOUTH, ENGLAND, Jan. 1, 1882.
MR. EDITOR: I am very much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and feel that your kindness in forwarding it weekly exceeds my expectations. In fact, I feel that I am indebted to you. I was not aware when Mr. Bennett visited me at Portsmouth that I was there in company with one of the first noblemen of the age. I was informed by my friend Mr. Forder, of London, who solicited me to entertain him, that he was editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I can now estimate his worth, not only to the States, but to the whole world. I wished him to remain another day with me, but his company was required at the Hall of Science, London, that day, by Mr. Bradlaugh, and I had to submit.

At the secular meetings in this town I hav weekly read a portion of THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially that part treating on the death of the late President Garfield, and the Canadian question on the excise officers stopping the works of Thomas Paine and Voltaire. The evenings of January 22d and 29th, I hav to read and comment on the travels of Mr. Bennett from Greece to Turkey and the Holy Land. Friends hav also read from the works of Colonel Ingersoll. They are having a large circulation in this country.

The photograph likeness of Mr. Bennett you kindly sent me was immediately put in a neat frame, and now joins my family group. He will very shortly be joined by the likenesses of Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Annie Besant. I hope next month this lady will stay at my humble home for a day or two, and one evening deliver a lecture on the "Rights of Constituencies," referring particularly to Mr. Bradlaugh's case. We are all anxiously looking forward to the 7th of February, the date of the opening of Parliament.

Please include me on the list of subscribers for Mr. Bennett's trip Around the World.
Yours truly, J. E. BRUMAGE.

FREETHOUGHT THE HOPE OF OUR COUNTRY.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me, as a reader of your esteemed paper, and an earnest Liberal, to contribute to the correspondent's department of your columns a few thoughts which hav occurred to me while reading the letters of numerous other men and women in our Liberal papers.

There appears to me to be a great mental revolution now going on, not alone in America, but in the world. There is no concealing the fact, there is a struggle going on for a higher and better condition of man in this life, regardless of considerations about a future state. And it is equally apparent that the tendency of that desire is for good. No true Liberal desires to injure his neighbor, because in so doing he would injure himself; therefore all his interest lies in justice and good conscience. The instincts of his nature lead him in this direction. Once cut off all the cords which tie him to the myths and fables of older and worse times; once let him lose implicit confidence in his priest, and he becomes an inquirer, a truth seeker, a Liberal. He begins to improve himself, his family, his house, and all about him. He becomes more kind and true, less dependent on his priest and the "Gaud" of his priest. He becomes interested in the views of others, and gradually becomes mentally free. If he continues to exercise his reason we then call him a Freethinker. The Freethinker is willing to accord to all others the right to think for themselvs. No church on earth has ever accorded that right.

During all the struggles and throes of the French republic, during its infancy and formativ years, every act of opposition came from those who resisted Freethought. The bloody-minded, idiotic-looking priest would hold the cross of the church before the eyes of the doomed person up to the very instant the knife fell to sever the head from the body. They were always seeking to make the poor subject recant. They are still opposing Freethought with the same spirit. The flood of light emanating from the cohorts of freedom are even now obstructed by the spirit that resisted Freethought at all times and ages of the world.

Were it not for Freethought in this country, our government would to-day be no better than that of France during the last four centuries. It behooves the people of the United States to be on their guard. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." No religious party should be recognized by the government. All should be protected by the law; none should be favored. There should be perfect protection by the government to all citizens alike, irrespectiv of their belief, unless it interfered with the common good. Let us see if this is so.

The Christians say that ours is a Christian nation. If so, they are the pets of the nation. We know that the Mohammedans are not claiming this as a Mohammedan nation. We know that the Jews are not claiming this as a Jewish country, yet the Jews' religion and the Jews' book are the ones which the Christians hav taken for theirs, and we fail to see any good reason why any or either of them should hav the slightest reason to claim any preference in the government. They should all be equal, equally protected, equal in rights and privilege; yet we see Sunday laws established against the Jews and all other nations. We see only Christian priests going through the forms of prayer and praise to the Jewish God. This we think unfair. The hope of the country for the future lies in Freethought, and in the organization of all persons who are Liberal for the purpose of ascertaining our strength and maintaining our rights. It means Freethought for all, the Jew as well as the Christian; the Mohammedan as well as either of them, and givs the Liberal precisely the same rights. This we claim, and nothing more. This we insist should be the rule and not the exception.

Yours, ADAM STOCKINGER.

AURORA, ILL., Jan. 2, 1882.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your letters from over the blue waters and T. B. Wakeman's lectures are worth twice the cost of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Continue to cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it "after many days." I often wonder if ministers and priests honestly believe what they teach. I hav come to the conclusion that there are two classes of them. The first class are educated men that love ease and renown, that are willing to work one day in seven, stealing the livery of heaven to serve the devil in. The second class are men who love to float on the breeze of popularity and occasionally inhale a breath of fame. They reiterate what the first class declaim on the same principle that the parrot mocks the sound of the human voice in saying, "Pretty Poll," and do it just about as understandingly. The third class are honest, ignorant men, and believe all they say. Now, forsooth, if the doctrin they teach is true, I would rather be a door-keeper at the gate of eternal damnation, where I could hav the recognizance of honest souls on their way to hell, than an angel in a hypocrit's heaven. May you be happy and healthy on your trip, and return in good time to the many friends that await your coming.

Ever yours truly, R. R. HALL, M.D.

EAST RODMAN, N. Y., Feb. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed a post-office order for $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1882. I hav been a subscriber since 1876, and mean to continue to be as long as I liv if I can raise the money to pay for it.

Our League (No. 136, South Rutland, N. Y., Charles Kellogg, secretary, L. D. Olney, president), did not meet last year at all. We need a place to meet in very much. We met in a grove several times the year before, and had good meetings. We now need a good speaker some pleasant day next summer to bring us to life again, and it will be a great deal more of a resurrection than any Jesus Christ ever performed, I think. I hope H. L. Green will make it in his way to come here, and we will hav a grove meeting that will surprise him.

The inhabitants of this county (Jefferson, named after the soundest statesman this country has ever produced), are generally quite Liberal in their religious beliefs. I think a scientific Freethinker would find this a good field to labor in. Every League should make some provision voluntarily or by requirement of the National Liberal League to appoint one of its members as an officiator at funerals. The people having been accustomed to ceremonies on such occasions, would look upon none as "heathenish," not remembering that the more "heathenish" the more mummeries and ceremonies. The bereaved make in most cases a show of themselvs, while real mourners would prefer seclusion and quiet instead. Freethinkers in most cases at present, allow their friends to employ some would-be agent of an unknown and unknowable God, who, to show their extreme egotism and the little soul their God gave them (which, by the way, would require a God with all the attributes ascribed to him to find), disgust all Liberals assembled by rehearsing a long string of, to themselvs, self-evident Christian arguments, which would not stand the test of the simplest inquiries of a reasoning mind; and then, to top off, you are expected to shell over five or ten dollars to pay for the privilege of hearing yourself abused or something you don't believe in at all. We need a change for our own protection; every death is made an excuse for the propagation of superstitious imaginings. I heard a lady remark, only a few days ago, that when she was teaching a little boy was drowned, and the night following the funeral a meeting was called and twelve of his schoolmates were added to the roll of the "scared-in-the-fold" Jesus Christ followers. She thought it was all right and proper. She could not see the cowardly cunning of priestcraft in it.

If all Liberals would change their forms at funerals, it would lessen the power of the church and in the same degree advance their own interests. Let every League agree among its members to stand by each other and ignore the priest at both funeral and marriage ceremonies. One alone hardly wishes to ignore custom, but unitedly by agreement all would be ready and willing. Through the immutable laws of nature we were so circumstanced by the loss of a darling little child last summer, and know whereof we speak. Yours truly, M. E. ROSE.

CORNPLANTER, PA., Jan. 28, 1882.

MR. MACDONALD: Mr. Bennett's incomparable letters are universally admired, and with good reason. They certainly demand all the reward his friends can giv him, and I very heartily agree with the suggestion of Mr. James M. Wheat, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 31st, that a special palace car should be in readiness at San Francisco to bear him to the Empire City on his return from the East.

Let the two extremes be made apparent to even the most casual observer. Bigotry and injustice doomed him to a prison. Let appreciation and enlightened opinion furnish a palace car to transport Mr. Bennett across the continent in a manner befitting his distinguished abilities and services in the cause of humanity. I will giv one dollar toward such a fund, hoping it will meet with a sufficient response to accomplish the purpose indicated.

Yours fraternally, B. G. MORRISON.

OSWEGO CENTER, N. Y., Jan. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed twenty-five cents for "Anthony Comstock's Career of Cruelty and Crime," which I received, after it had gone to the wrong post-office, remained some time, and been forwarded. Then the boy who brought it kept it a few days before delivering it. I wish every Christian would read it. I wish you would assign one column of THE TRUTH SEEKER to "answers to inquirers'" I believe it would add wonderfully to its interest and would call out our Christian talent. I am a charter member of the Methodist Episcopal church in this place, in good standing, according to our disciplin. But since reading your "infiddle" sheet my brethren find a good deal of fault with my "heresy," and say I'm not "founded on the rock." Now, I want to ask your readers how long such a man as Comstock would liv in their neighborhoods and not get a coat of tar? And, if it is not asking too much, I think it would be a curiosity to see his picture in THE TRUTH SEEKER, that we may compare it with "Babcock's devil."

Yours truly, PROF. HERSCHELL.

MAUSTON, WIS., Feb. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It givs me pleasure to inform you that what few Liberals we hav in and around Mauston recently got Prof. W. F. Jamieson here to giv us a few more of his sledge-hammer blows at old theology, and on the 29th we had a Paine celebration, the first one ever held in Mauston. All things considered, we had a good turnout, and a good feeling prevailed, with a resolution to celebrate Thomas Paine's birthday next year. Nearly everybody says Mr. Jamieson surpassed his former self in speaking of the services of Thomas Paine during the American Revolution. A Mr. Brown, of the Methodist Episcopal church of this place, told his dupes that it would not do for them to follow the immoral character of Tom Paine, and then he went on with the usual slang of the sky-pilots. He daubed it onto "Tom," as he called him, thick and fast. We got out some notices and invited the Rev. Mr. Brown to meet Mr. Jamieson last Wednesday evening, but nary a Brown came to the scratch to be corrected or to prove his assertions. Mr. Jamieson had it all his own way for nearly two hours, to the delight of all present except a few who believed in many lies for Christ's sake. But I cannot do justice to the subject, having been educated in a coal-mine.

Yours truly, WM. HOLGATE.

PARRISH, ILL., Jan. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: We cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, and shall always try to respond when called on for aid. Liberalism is still gaining ground in this vicinity, and the day is not far distant when we Infidels will be considered as respectable as any of the orthodox. Our ranks suffered a material loss in the death of a young and intelligent Liberal, Mr. Thomas D. Moore, who was one of our best posted young men. He was confined to his bed for several weeks, and did not despair until about one week before he died, when he saw that death was inevitable. He insisted all the while during his sickness that he was an Infidel, and his dying request was that L. M. Jones and J. W. Puckett (the champions of Freethought in this community) should deliver orations at his grave. Accordingly, on the day of the funeral Mr. L. M. Jones was in attendance, and delivered one of the most touching tributes to the dead it has ever been our lot to listen to. Nearly the whole audience was in tears, Christians and all, and Freethought received an impetus in this community which the church will never check. This was the first instance in this community where an Infidel had died without recanting, and the orthodox ones don't know what to do. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER long years of prosperity, and a safe return for its editor, I am Yours fraternally, J. L. JONES.

MONTEZUMA, IOWA, Jan. 25, 1882.

MR EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is splendid. I like to see letters from different parts of the country giving reports concerning the advancement of Liberalism. I hav never seen any report from Montezuma, but there are lots of Liberals in and out of the church. I would say two-thirds are Liberals in their views, but we hav never had any speakers, consequently no organization. I wish Mr. Bennett good luck. Yours truly, M. BONE.

WE are pleased to learn that H. L. Green is succeeding admirably as a Liberal lecturer. Colonel Ingersoll recently wrote to him, "It givs me great pleasure to read of your success in the lecture-field. You are doing real good work, and you deserve great success." Mr. Green is now lecturing in western Michigan. He spoke in Hart on last Thursday evening. Friends in the West will address him until further notice at Otsego, Allegan co., Mich.

THE annual meeting of the stockholders of the Paine Memorial corporation was held in Paine Hall on Monday morning, Jan. 30, 1882. The affairs of the corporation were discussed, and it was found that only about one-half of the capital stock yet remained to be disposed of. The corporation is in receipt of an income which not only enables it to meet its expenses, but also to put aside a small sum toward the reduction of the mortgage. General satisfaction was expressed with the present management and the directors, and the old board was re-elected.

ALLEN PRINGLE writes to the Halifax (N. S.) Mayflower: "I hav been very busy with my spare time of late in circulating petitions to both Houses of Parliament for an Evidence Amendment act, so that our people may giv evidence in the courts by making an affirmation the same as in England since 1866. In obtaining signatures in my own locality here, I hav been unexpectedly successful. I hav the names of nearly all the leading men in the country of all religious denominations, even including several of the clergy. I hav had unmistakable evidence of the great progress Liberalism has made here in ten years. I am very proud of my petition. It is as long as the ceremonial law, and twice as important. Our prospects of succeeding, at any rate in our provincial legislature, are excellent. Besides what the Toronto friends sent out, I hav sent out petitions to about thirty different places in this province to be put in circulation. Hav also written to the premier of the province and some of the judges in Toronto, from whom I hav favorable replies. The government will, I hav every reason to think, submit a bill covering the prayer of petition." Every Freethinker in Canada should take hold of this work and push it vigorously. Write to Mr. Pringle for blank petitions, and get them signed by thousands. Mr. Pringle's address is Selby, Lenox county, Ontario.

More Post-Office Tyranny.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you hav the kindness to announce to those of the subscribers to The Health Monthly who hav failed to receive their papers that there are 26,780 copies of Dr. Foote's Health Monthly detained at Buffalo, for the reason, as is alleged by the department, that they bear no evidence of having been prepaid. This, of course, is a falsehood, because the very fact that they were accepted by the Canadian department is prima facie evidence that the postage was prepaid? They could not hav otherwise reached Buffalo. These 26,000 and more papers undoubtedly cover all of our November issue (the most of which we hav supplied to our subscribers by printing an extra edition), the whole or part of our December number, and probably nearly or quite all of our January edition. It has been coolly proposed to us that these papers will be sent to their destination on our forwarding to the Buffalo office the postage at the transient rates, which amounts to $267.80!

It will be seen that the postal department has not only made a false statement in reference to the matter, as already remarked, but they hav violated one of the postal laws forbidding the obstruction of the mails. We hope to get our difficulties straightened out after a while so that our subscribers may be properly served with their papers. For the present we beg the indulgence of our subscribers.

Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE.

New York, Feb. 11, 1882.

The Christian Murderer, Sir Thomas More.

BY ALHAZA.

Some men may believe that such lofty emotion
Is blent with allusions to Dan or to Goshen,
That blandishments holy, of pity and love,
Are showered like rain from some region above.
Such men never studied philosophy right,
And nature, all glowing with beauty and light,
Oppresses their vision, as glorious day
Drives the owl and the bat from its presence away.
Such men never bent over history's page,
To know what a Christian will do in his rage.
So a stream that the loveliest landscape adorns
Can wash the rank branches of poisonous thorns.
No lovelier Christian than fair Thomas More
In the reign of King Henry his God did adore.
But Bainham, the barrister, honored the nation
With views that ennobled the humblest vocation.
He could not believe that his infinit maker
Would dwell amid spice, in the loaf of a baker,
Till a piece of that undescribed holiness clung
To quicken his heart, through the film of his tongue.
"Utopia's" author received such a fable,
And had Bainham racked, 'mid the filth of his stable,
Had him out in the stocks for three days in cold weather,
Himself, too refined for the weight of a feather.
Still further to humor his god and his ghost,
More had Bainham whipped, tightly chained to a post.
"Let heretics die without shadow of steeple."
But Wolsey, too mild, burned the books, not the people.
A scorpion lash is a pious propeller,
And the bishop of London will lend his coal-cellar
For heavenly purpose. Racks used in good season
Will bring stubborn sinners to God and to reason.
More's life was quite pure, and his character blameless,
His genius was lofty, his cruelty shameless.
I hear people whine of the pious and true,
I hav shown what such holy emotions will do,
But do not forget that they burnt Bainham too.
And Latimer cried, "God omnipotent reigns,"
While a Catholic roasted in hammock of chains.
How deceitful and foolish the exquisit chime
That calls some to snivel, and others to crime.
And poverty dies, steeped in hunger and care,
While luxury mutters a beautiful prayer!

"The Dead Sleep Well."

BY GEORGE E. MACDONALD.

This life is a war to the most of men,
And the end of the fray is defeat;
We conquer of enemies one out of ten,
Who rises to meet us in conflict again,
While nine lay us prone at their feet.

Our temporal triumph is but for an hour,
One foe we see ever ahead,
Who goeth abroad like a whirlwind of power,
Through the vale of Gehenna and Eden's bower,
And marketh his way with the dead.

The King of Terrors men call this scourge,
Whose armor is brass, and whose breath
Arouses the billows that foam and surge
Like an ocean upstirred by the demiurge,
And whose waves overwhelm us in death.

To some at the dawning of day he appears
As the first flush of sunrise has come;
Ere we reap the fruition of ripening years,
While the earth is as yet but a valley of tears,
And the voice of the weeper is dumb.

Anon he draws nigh at the noontide fair,
When the flower of our days is in bloom;
And we feel not the weight of the burdening care
Till the hope that upheld us has turned to despair,
And our star disappears in the gloom.

Once more his approach is the close of a day
When the task that was laid has been done;
When the harvest of autumn is garnered away;
Our children's children around us play,
And the race that was set has been run.

Yet not in anger ere rides this knight
Of the sable plume, and whose steed
Has a color as pale as the snowflake white,
And a gentle footstep that falls as light
As the flower drops the ripened seed.

Though he send us sorrow and sore dismay,
He tears not a hope from the breast.
We look for a recompense one day
For the loved and lost one borne away;
In the end he restores us rest.

On the shadowy shore of the great unknown
There dashes no wave of care.
The seeds of contentment in peace are sown,
Transformed to a song is the broken moan,
And sorrow surcease finds there.

So, calm and peaceful, we fall asleep,
And the world moves over our head.
The stars above us their vigils keep,
No dream shall disturb our slumber deep,
For sweet is the rest of the dead.

THE Rev. G. F. Head, vicar of Charles, Plymouth, Eng., one Sunday begged his congregation to "add a petition to their morning and evening prayers that if Bradlaugh or any of his followers came to town God would preserve from evil those who, from curiosity or otherwise, might listen to their pernicious doctrins." The result of the prayers may be taken from the Standard: "The greatest political meeting ever held in Plymouth took place last evening, when Mr. Bradlaugh attended to explain his position in the constitutional struggle now pending. It had been expected that the gathering would hav been broken up by the organized opposition, but quite one hour before the proceedings were advertised to commence there were between four and five thousand persons present, and the meeting was marked by overwhelming enthusiasm. Resolutions supporting Northampton in the struggle were passed by immense majorities. Mr. Bradlaugh was accompanied to the hotel by a cheering crowd of several thousand." Mr. Bradlaugh trusts the Rev. G. F. Head will obey the apostolic injunction, and "pray without ceasing."

The Evolution of Poker.

AN INTERESTING SCIENTIFIC INQUIRY INTO THE COMPARATIV VALUE OF A JACK-FULL AND FOUR DEUCES.—RAKING THE SO-CALLED "POT."

We hav heard that there is a game played in the West called draw poker. We hav also been informed (by no less an authority than Col. R. G. Ingersoll, in a political speech) that it is played for "fossils," i. e., chips made of bone. Such being the case, the following description of a game played strictly in the interests of science will be of interest to those who are familiar with the nomenclature of the game. It is needless to add that to us it is all Greek:

Ever since General Schenck's admirable treatis brought it prominently into notice, savants hav been endeavoring to prove that draw poker is justly entitled to consideration as one of the exact sciences, beautifully governed by strictest mathematical law, instead of being merely one of the eccentric and ruleless recreations incident to American leisure. Their efforts, however, seem to be attended by many complex difficulties. Having been appointed a committee to investigate some interesting experiments explained in a recent paper by Professor Dana on the "Correlation of Blind and Straddle," Professors Huxley, Darwin, and Tyndall pursued their researches from 7:30 P.M. one Saturday until 11:15 A.M. Sunday, and Professor Huxley, the chairman, reported as follows:

"Your committee, after arduous labor and great expense, find that, while the Dana theory of Elevation of Straddles, as contained in his paper, is correct in the premis, it is sometimes disastrously fallacous in the conclusion. One of the experiments tried by your committee proved this, as follows: The senior hand, governed by myself, consisted before the draw of one stratum of ensanguined jacks, one stratum of sable queens, and one accidental but worthless diamond—almost as valuable a formation as that instanced by Professor Dana. The subsenior hand, engineered by Professor Tyndall, was nearly homogeneous with small spades, the beautiful continuity being only bobtailed at one end by a healthy but inefficacious heart. The junior hand, under the management of Professor Darwin, consisted before the draw, as he states, of one thin stratum of deuces, with three substrata of detritus—an eight, a four and a six of assorted suits. Professors Tyndall and Darwin having duly entered, I generously uplifted the revenue to the extent of the limit, which in our case was £10. To this Professor Tyndall readily acceded. Professor Darwin demurred for several minutes, arranged and rearranged his strata in an uncertain and, as we thought, nervous manner, but finally concluded his meditation and contributed quite a handsome fossil collection toward the general center. To me he then dealt one substratum, to Professor Tyndall one, and to himself three. Applying myself to the taxidermist's art, I soon discovered that my formation of jacks had been wonderfully enriched, the triple strata of which even now, resting upon my stratum of queens, quite filled my hand. Professor Tyndall then, after examining his newly acquired stratum with evidences of suppressed emotion, advanced one fossil, to the value of £2. Professor Darwin took a panoramic view of his strata, and neatly covered that, and, to my great delight, added a smaller fossil to the value of ten shillings. I promptly covered both deposits, and then proceeded to hoist Professor Darwin to the extent of £10. Still further to my delight Professor Tyndall elevated me in like ratio. I naturally feared that now Professor Darwin would retire. So did Professor Tyndall, who half regretted having put on so agressiv a front to his usually timid friend. But to our immense satisfaction Professor Darwin, after again reviewing his strata to see if they were all there, not only nimbly ascended Profesor Tyndall's elevation, but capped it, as before, with ten shillings. Rejoicing secretly in the wisdom of the Dana theory, but with an artful simulation of hesitation designed to encourage my fellow-investigators, I again climbed over both precipitous heaps to the extent of £10. Then began a contest which now comes to me like a blurred and hideous dream. Professor Tyndall leaped over me, Professor Darwin hopped over him, and I turned somersaults over Professor Darwin, until not only was my entire fossil collection, my pocket portfolio of engraved portraits of government celebrities, and checks for half the sum of my accumulations in the East India Bank heaped on the pile, with Professor Tyndall's watch and eye-glasses and fine polariscope and collar-buttons, together with his seal ring, a mortgage on his house, an order for seven months' advance salary as secretary of your honorable body, and a transfer order for two-thirds of his registered consols, but also drafts from Professor Darwin upon his publisher for the entire gross receipts of a new edition of the 'Descent of Man,' and a corrected revision of the 'Origin of Species,' with a clear deed of the copyright of a book now in preparation. I now naturally began to fear lest my zeal should blight the future of my two friends, especially that of Professor Darwin, whose acquaintance with the science under discussion was but limited at best, and who, I felt quite certain, merely persevered through a gentlemanly spirit of accommodation. But as Professor Tyndall continued his muscular exercise in boosting my ventures, and as Professor Darwin would each time mildly encourage him with a ten-shilling prod, I still continued. Finally, when my overcoat and Professor Tyndall's rubber galoshes and Professor Darwin's telescope hat had been added to the heap on the extra table brought in to hold the increasing pile, the hands were called all round, Professor Darwin apologetically saying that he called simply because he had nothing more to bet but his sleeve-buttons, which were a birthday present from his wife. Upon the call I looked at Professor Tyndall. Professor Tyndall looked at Professor Darwin, and Professor Darwin looked at both of us. Professor Tyndall said he had not foreseen this; that he had been bounced higher than when he was on top of the Matterhorn, and had forgotten himself in his excitement; that he was so sorry he couldn't think, but he had an ace flush. He then started to gather in and count up the pot. I checked him, and with tears in my eyes confessed I had been very, very wrong, but that I had really supposed Professor Tyndall's strata were more nearly like my own; that I felt keenly for Professor Darwin, who had been dragged innocently into the destructiv contest; that I would cheerfully return to him his vest and comforter and polka-dot handkerchief and telescope hat, and to Professor Tyndall his eye-glasses and galoshes and one collar-button, and beg both not to mention it; that I had been surprised at the tremendous developmental effect of the draw upon the germinal protoplasm of my hand, and had been unnecessarily deluded into raising; and that I was almost ashamed to say it, as they were friends, but that I had three jacks and a pair of queens. I then burst into tears and began to rake in the small change. In this I was assisted by Professor Darwin, who certainly displayed the utmost stoicism throughout. At length, when the huge pile was sorted and the value roughly estimated, I thought to console him and asked him what he had. The horror of Professor Tyndall and myself can only be imagined by your learned body when we saw Professor Darwin deliberately first pocket the neatly folded bank-notes, and then the rolls of guineas, and then put Professor Tyndall's watch in his fob, and try on Professor Tyndall's galoshes, and adjust Professor Tyndall's eye-glasses on his nose, and test them by running over my hand again, and put on my overcoat and stuff the pockets thereof with the mortgages and deeds and checks, etc., which had accumulated, and then pass in the fossils to me to be cashed, and finally, with a delicate smile of condolence, skin out four deuces and a king.

"Your committee beg to state that the Dana theory is pernicious and fraudulent in the extreme. In conclusion I would respectfully beg to withdraw my offer to make at my own expense a scientific investigation of the theory of Professor McCosh, of Princeton, that 'straights are absolute in jack-pots.' Professor Tyndall also desires me to say that his failing health will prevent his equipping and accompanying the proposed party to explore the glaciers of the Jungfrau, and says they must equip themselves or stay at home."

Accompanying the above was a minority report as follows:

"The Dana theory, in my opinion, is the most striking instance of transmitted Simian instinct I hav yet seen. Although apt to mislead at first sight, its finer and more deeply seated reasonings are among the noblest and most improving studies in the contemplation of the ascent and descent of man. I beg to inclose my back dues for eighteen months to the Royal Society, with advance payments for the year, and to state that I will cheerfully contribute £500 towards the contemplated 'Classification of the Ring-Tailed Monkeys of Madras' by your illustrious body. I hav to-day decided to take a pleasure trip around the world, and will forward to your museum, at my own expense, all objects of interest coming under my notice.

"Respectfully submitted,

"CHARLES DARWIN, F.R.S.

"Addendum: Should your honorable body desire any further investigations into the same subject I will cheerfully defer my trip, and shall be proud to serve. C. D."

CENTENARY OF VOLTAIRE.

VOLTAIRE IN EXILE:

His Life and Works in France and Abroad.

(England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, Switzerland), with unpublished letters of Voltaire and Mme. Du Chatelet.

BY BENJAMIN GASTINEAU.

Translated with the author's approval by Messrs. F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg.

This work is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland; his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world, of his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

WHAT OBJECTIONS TO CHRISTIANITY

THE

Bennett-Mair Discussion.

BETWEEN

D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR.

(CONTAINING 969 PAGES.)

The fullest Discussion yet Published, giving the Dogmas and Claims of Christianity a thorough Examination pro and con.

This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the following theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty, the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogressiv in their nature; they are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the higher class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

Some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a dark or pinkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. ☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, a treatise on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, aided by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Gems of Thought.

If all previous religions hav been false, is it not reasonable and inferable that this one is no better; at least no more truthful? If a man lies ninety-nine times is he not very likely to lie the hundredth time? Of course he is not certain to do so, but unless we had some proof, incontrovertible proof, of what he told us, we should be justified in doubting his word. Now because all other mythologies hav been false it is not a positiv proof that Christian mythology is false also. But when we know that it is improbable, unnatural, unscientific, and impossible, it stands to reason that it is more than doubtful.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Remember that as it is a shame to be surprised if the fig-tree produces figs, so is it to be surprised if the world produces such and such things of which it is productiv; and for the physician and the helmsman it is a shame to be surprised if a man has a fever or if the wind is unfavorable.

To look for the fig in winter is a madman's act: such is he who looks for his child when it is no longer allowed.—Antoninus.

And on the morrow when they were come from Bethany he was hungry; and seeing a fig-tree afar off having leaves, he came, if haply he might find anything thereon; and when he came to it he found nothing but leaves, for the time of figs was not yet. And Jesus answered and said unto it, No man eat fruit of thee hereafter forever. And his disciples heard it (Mark xi, 12-14). [In the corresponding passage, to use the pulpit phrase, in Matthew xxi, 10-22, we read that the disciples "marveled;" and no wonder. The commentators are ingenious enough and can split hairs as well as any man, but they hav not succeeded in giving anything like a rational explanation of the teacher's extraordinary conduct. Whoever turns to the passages indicated will find ample matter for "marveling." The fig-tree withered at once, and the legends in which it is imbedded are dead at the roots, and they cannot flaunt their leaves many years longer.—Hylax.]

In Evangelicism the old Puritan element has become thin and sour; whilst Ritualism is surely the most vapid form of sacerdotalism ever imposed on effeminate nature. Adherents of both phases of opinion may hav great merits in point of practical zeal. But were it not that a party of equal sincerity and greater breadth of view still remains within the church, it would be hard for any male person of Liberal views to hav anything to do with it. Such a man would stand aside and let the dead bury their dead. He would be curious to know how long a creed could retain its vitality after the brains had been taken out, but I would take little interest in the precise details of the decay which must inevitably ensue.—Leslie Stephen.

Science and criticism combined hav destroyed the faith of free inquirers in the Bible. . . . Unless the authenticity of the historical books of the New Testament can be certainly established, we hav no eye-witnesses of the Christian miracles at all; and in the absence of such testimony, the adverse arguments derived from the uniformity of nature and from mythological analogy, which traces the belief in miracles to the universal propensities of uncritical ages, rush in with overwhelming force. In fact, in almost any book written by a learned man who feels himself at liberty to say what he really thinks, you will soon find the miracles abandoned, though it may be with evident reluctance.—Goldwin Smith.

Thou seest how rich the Christian is. Even if he will he cannot destroy his salvation by any sins how grievous soever, unless he refuse to believe. . . . Be thou a sinner, and sin boldly, but still more boldly believe and rejoice again in Christ. From him sin shall not separate us; no, though a thousand times in every day we should commit fornication and murder. . . . If in faith an adultery were committed, it were no sin.—Martin Luther. [On second thoughts I am almost inclined to wish that I had not transcribed the utterances of Luther. But "what is writ is writ," as the noble Byron says, taking his cue from Pontius Pilate. Luther had many virtues, and Freethinkers will thank him for what he has done well and try to forget what he has done amiss. His dogma of justification by faith blinded his naturally strong mind and made him speak and write stark, staring nonsense without knowing it. If he had always, or even often, spoken as foolishly, his name and memory would by this time hav perished from earth. Were our Ingersoll or the English Bradlaugh to utter such trash, wouldn't there be rejoicing among the saints? We fondly hope and confidently believe that they will never be so far left to themselvs, or rather that they will never get so far beside themselvs, as to utter such incoherent babble.—Hylax.]

Let any fair-minded person read "The Light of Asia," and note how similar the supernatural incidents are, in many instances, to the supernatural incidents of the New Testament narrativs, and the conceit that Christianity is a supernatural religion, or the only one, must receive a magnificent rebuke. Here are supernatural incidents related so remarkably similar to those of the New Testament, that if the latter are accepted as so many facts there is no reason why the former should not be; in which case we hav two supernatural religions on our hands, "which," as Euclid says, "is absurd."—J. W. Chadwick.

The peculiar excellence of the writings of Epictetus consists in their simple and noble earnestness. Their real heart-felt love of good and hatred of evil, which we are in the habit of supposing an exclusivly Christian feeling, does manifest itself very finely and beautifully in them. Epictetus knew nothing of Christianity.—Chambers's Encyclopedia.

If thou hadst a step-mother and a mother at the same time, thou wouldst be dutiful to thy step-mother, but still thou wouldst constantly return to thy mother. Let the court and philosophy now be to thee step-mother and mother; return to philosophy frequently and repair in her, through whom what thou meetest with in the court appears to thee tolerable and thou appearest tolerable in the court.—M. A. Antoninus.

THE HARE AND THE FISH.

The Hare and the Fish having borrowed tobacco of each other for several months, and agreeing perfetly well on politics, set out to make a journey together and see the sights of the world. They had not proceeded many miles when a Wolf was discovered in pursuit. The Hare at once started off at the top of his speed, but the Fish called out:

"Do not leave me thus; I cannot run!"

"A Fish who cannot run has no business to make a journey," replied the Hare, and away he flew to save his bacon.

The Fish hurried after as fast as possible, and both found themselvs on the bank of a river, while the Wolf was yet a furlong away. The Fish at once rolled into the water and darted away, but the Hare shouted after him:

"Do not leave me; I cannot swim."

"A Hare who cannot swim has no business to make a journey," and he sailed away and left the Hare to be eaten on the half-shell.

MORAL.

An Owl who had overheard the affair from his perch in a persimmon-tree drew down his left eye and softly said:

"You don't know a Man until you hav traveled with him."

A week ago a bright and chatty young woman called at a house on Cass avenue and endeavored to make a sale of a book entitled "Home and Mother." The lady of the house received her in the usual ten-degrees-below fashion, and, utterly refusing to look at the book, she said:

"I havn't any money, and I know that my husband won't pay for it."

"It is a book highly spoken of by the press."

"Yes, I know, but my husband is queer."

"And you see the superior style of binding."

"I know, but my husband would call it bosh and trash."

"Shan't I call when he is at home?"

"That would be useless. He wouldn't even look at it, and he hates female book agents."

"Does he?"

"Yes; he abhors them. I know he doesn't even treat them civilly when they call at his office."

"Is that so?" mused the girl, and when she left the house she, for some reason or other, started right down town.

The lady of the house might hav forgotten the incident in five or six years but for a sort of climax. When her husband came up to dinner he handed her a copy of "Home and Mother," with the remark:

"Happened to see it as I passed a second-hand bookstore, and thought perhaps you'd like it."

"Yes—ah—but, Henry, a girl was here trying to sell me this very book not over two hours ago," stammered the wife.

"Was, eh? Well, she probably got discouraged sold out to a second-hand dealer, and skipped the city. Is dinner ready?"

Dinner was ready, but somehow the wife had no appetite, and since that she has fits of abstraction, glances suspiciously around at times, and has been seen coming out of second-hand bookstores.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

BLISS'S

Electro-Magnetic Planchette.

Designed Especially to Develop Mediumistic Persons as Writing Mediums.

After months of careful study and experiment, Mr. James A. Bliss, the well-known medium, of Providence, R. I. (formerly of Philadelphia, Pa.), has perfected his Writing Planchette, and although many improvements hav been made, the price remains the same as heretofore.

Bliss's Electro-Magnetic Planchette is a wonderful little instrument. It will operate in the hands of many persons who hay never had the least faith in Spiritual manifestations. It has convinced thousands that it was moved by a power independent of hands placed upon it while experimenting. It will answer either mental or spoken questions, and giv you wonderful communications from your spirit friends.

Skeptics are especially invited to experiment with it.

The general verdict of the persons that hav used Bliss's Planchette is, That it will write messages where the common wooden unmagnetized planchette will remain motionless.

Remember this Planchette is not only the best, but it is the cheapest in the market.

The Planchette, with wheels, pencil, and full directions will be securely inclosed in a box and mailed to any address in the United States only, upon the receipt of 50 cents. For sale at the office of The Truth Seeker.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 9. No. 8. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, February 25, 1882. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

MR. J. ROWLANDSON lost his election to Parliament because he went out of his way to use hard language against Freethinkers in general, and Mr. Bradlaugh in particular. This drove away several hundred who had intended to vote and work for his success.

HERBERT SPENCER's long-meditated journey to America is now definitly fixed. He sails August next, and intends to be absent three months. He visits Canada, and also possibly California. He has refused all proposals to lecture, his design being solely to see the country and people.

A RELIGIOUS census taken on a recent Sunday in Glasgow, showed that the number of evangelical churches was 324, with an aggregate attendance of 115,292, and 20 Roman Catholic churches, with an aggregate attendance or 15,871. The population of the city and suburbs included was at last census 704,446. So it seems that even in pious Scotland only about one person in five attends church. That country is progressing.

A. H. DAILEY, ex-surrogate of Brooklyn, has published a card defending his faith in Spiritualism. He writes that he would be unfit for any place except a lunatic asylum, if he failed to observe and to act upon the testimony of his own senses and the corroborativ evidence which comes from others. He adds that he has no fear that his clients will withdraw their confidence in his ability to consider their causes or weigh evidence, but that if it should prove otherwise, he is willing to make the sacrifice.

AN English church paper called the Rock laments that "the works of Bradlaugh and Voltaire hav obtained a ready circulation in Japan, even without the aid of any society," but "that there is considerable difficulty in spreading the gospel in Japan." The Rock does not seem to understand that as the Japanese rise through education above their original faith, they are scarcely likely to accept in exchange the hybrid Christianity which is but the offspring of the older oriental religions.

THE Methodist church of West Troy, N. Y., is trying L. M. Ireland, a class leader for twelve years, on the charge of trotting horses on the Sabbath, calling fellow church-members "liars," attempting fraudulently to get possession of a parcel of land, lying, evil speaking, and commencing a law suit against the pastor. While Ireland's wife was testifying she was stricken with paralysis. The controversy is the outgrowth of the trial of the Rev. Dr. Krohn, the former pastor, on charges of immorality preferred by Ireland.

GEORGE CHAINEY says that "the Free Religious Association, expecting to found the Church of the Future, has decided to giv a certain sum of money to some young man who desires to fit himself to preach its gospel. One condition attached to its gift is that he be a college graduate. Neither Thomas Paine, Herbert Spencer, nor William Shakspere could hav applied for the fund. Fortunately such men can get through the world without any such aid. The Liberalism that thinks more of college culture than nativ talent and true moral power and enthusiasm, is a base pharisaism that thanks its stars that it is not like other men."

THE London Quarterly Review has a fierce onslaught on the revisionists of the New Testament. It is attributed to Dr. Burgon, dean of Chichester. The writer, whoever he is, is very wroth at the Bible having been brought into disrepute, but sees nothing for it now but frankness. He declares the Greek text formulated by the revisionists to be "a tissue of fabricated readings;" and further says: "If all the cases were faithfully exhibited where 'a few,' 'some,' or 'many ancient authorities read differently' from what is exhibited in the actual text, not only would the margin prove insufficient to contain the record, but the very page itself would not suffice."

SOME English Tory organs are are trying to defend the unconstitutional behavior of the House of Commons by pointing out that certain persons, such as clergymen, aliens, felons, etc., cannot be elected to Parliament, and alleging that Mr. Bradlaugh's election comes under this category. The simplest answer to this is These persons are disqualified by law; Atheists are not so disqualified. In order to disqualify Atheists fresh legislation is necessary, and until such disqualifying law has been passed, an Atheist is legally eligible to Parliament.

THE editor of the Popular Science Monthly givs the following amusing bit of personal experience: "We were once accosted by an inquisitiv Irishman thus: 'D'ye b'lieve in the mother o' God?' 'No.' 'Begorry, y'er an Atheist; I wouldn't be in yer boots for twenty pound.'" After all, Pat may not hav made such an egregious blunder, since we take it that the denial of motherhood necessarily involves the non-recognition of offspring. Here, however, we are verging on the mystery of "an uncaused cause," and, warned in time, we "throw [meta] physic to the dogs."—Secular Review.

THE abominable outrages on the Jews in Russia are raising much indignation in England. This is fair enough, but it would be well if the Jews and some of the Christians there would avoid manifesting a spirit identical with that which is rampant in Russia. The Russians who rob and murder Jewish men, and who ravish Jewish women, are strictly carrying out the command of Yahweh, in the Bible accepted by Christians as a revelation from him. The Jews deny the Christian god Jesus, and, according to the Bible, ought to be put to death, while the treatment of the women is thoroughly biblical. The spirit of the Russian Christians toward Jews is shown in England toward heretics, and it is impossible to believe in the sincerity of the admiration of religious liberty expressed by persecutors like Baron Henry de Worms. The words of Jesus, that he came to send a sword, are being thoroughly verified by his disciples in Russia.

AT a meeting "to protest against Roman Catholic influence in American politics and educational affairs," in Brooklyn, lately, the Rev. Dr. Geo. H. Hepworth said that it was utterly impossible, in his opinion, for a thorough Roman Catholic to be a genuin American citizen, and he was afraid of the encroachments of a church which did not believe in the eternal power of American institutions, and was entirely autocratic. He was afraid that what could not be accomplished by sheer strength might be done by the courage of cunning. The policy of Romanism was to keep every man in the dark, while republicanism demanded that every man should hav light; and it had been settled by the pope himself that Rome was opposed to the individuality that republicanism bequeaths to every citizen. In conclusion, Dr. Hepworth urged that the security of the government depends upon the ability of the people to think, and nothing else, and declared that he was strongly in favor of compulsory education.

AN interesting debate was had in the Wisconsin assembly recently upon Bates's bill to tax church property, which has been recommended by the committee for indefinit postponement. Mr. Bates made a lengthy speech in favor of the bill against the action of the committee. He called attention to the large accumulation of property by Catholics in Milwaukee, all of which must be protected by the police and fire departments, without such property contributing anything toward the expense of such protection. He claimed that nearly all of the remonstrances now filed in this assembly were signed by Catholics. Mr. Horn contended that churches should not be taxed, because no income is derived from them by the owners. Mr. Prince answered by saying that Horn's theory was contrary to all practice in assessing property. No man is assessed on an income from his brown-stone house, carriage horses, or other luxuries, but on what they are worth. After further discussion the bill was referred to the committee on state affairs.

THE evil effects of Christianity hav again been murderously manifested in a case in Providence, R. I., in which a father attempted to destroy his son, six years old, by burning him. The man was laboring under the delusion that he had been called upon by Christ to sacrifice his child as a burnt-offering, as Abraham had been in biblical times. The man's name is Enos Sylvester, and he has lived, for the last five weeks, with his wife and child, at 74 Printery street. He is about thirty-five years old, and a machinest by trade. For some time past he has had morose fits, when he would sit motionless with his eyes gazing on vacancy and his mind apparently wrapped up in meditating upon some dismal project. He would suddenly spring up, mutter incoherently, tear his hair, and walk the room like a madman. At times, in the middle of the night, he would get up from his bed, light a lamp, and stand by the bedside of his son, looking down upon him with an agonizing expression, and then, as if seized with some powerful overruling spirit, he would ascend to the attic, and lie there, moaning piteously. One night the neighbors were startled by hearing Mrs. Sylvester run out into the street calling for help and begging for mercy, and, in answer to her calls, some of the men entered her house, where they witnessed an exhibition of one of the strangest vagaries of insanity on record. Sylvester had become a raving maniac by brooding over a mission which he thought he was called upon to perform. To fulfil this supposed divine command he had built a pile of kindling wood in the center of the room, out of which he proposed to make a pyre; and when the men burst into the room he was preparing to bind his only son upon it and destroy him in an Abrahamic manner. He was removed to the police station.

IT must be a great satisfaction to professors of the Christian religion throughout the world to know that the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, of Brooklyn, has constituted himself the champion of their faith. Those who hav been raised from the cradle in the belief that a yawning and sulphurous hell awaits them upon their exit from this bed of roses commonly known as the world, may now know that none of their rights in the hereafter can be abridged so long as the champion struts the platform of the tabernacle. Eternal hell shall be theirs, and Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll shall not wrest it from them. Unto Mr. Talmage shall be all the praise. Who can look upon his magnificent form, and hearken upon his eloquent utterances, without feeling that he holds the very key of the place which Colonel Ingersoll would close forever? Out upon such monsters as Ingersoll! Why should he attempt to instill into the minds of the young and old that through lives of goodness and usefulness they may wear crowns of glory that will be visible before they vanish from this earthly sphere? Why should he tell us that it is not true that the helpless infant who was never submitted to the forms of baptism in the church will be pitchforked into a well of burning brimstone, should its breath leave its body in its earthly home? Why should this wretch Ingersoll doubt the stories of the Bible? But it is useless to dwell upon his iniquities. Dr. Talmage will protect us all. Each of us may fall asleep at night with the sweet consciousness that if we should die before daybreak we may find ourselvs safely landed in one of the warmest fires our hearts may wish for, and which tradition teaches us we are entitled to. We cannot add to Ingersoll's agony of mind if we desired. Dr. Talmage has crushed him. Ingersoll on his knees in the quiet of his chamber, reading the fourteenth chapter of St. Luke, is a spectacle upon which all Christian people must look with joy, and they must thank Dr. Talmage for forcing him into that position.—The Judge.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

The Book of the Chronicles of the Pilgrims in the Land of Yahweh.—Continued.

CHAPTER XIV.

A SABBATH AT NAZARETH.

1. And it came to pass on the first day of the week that the pilgrims did not pursue their journey, but rested from their labors. The man of God Getz, with the man of God James and two other pilgrims, went to the house of the Lord and partook of the bread of life which is dealt out there, while the Scribe, not being partial to that diet, remained in his tent and wrote a part of the book of Chronicles.

2. After the bread of life had been duly partaken of, the man of God James did journey on foot some five or six miles away, even unto Mount Tabor, which, it is said, is one of the places where Jesus was transfigured eighteen hundred and fifty years ago; howbeit this is said by those who were not present, while those who were said to be present had not a word to say about it. Whatever transfiguration really is, very little intelligent description has been given of it.

3. The best authorities deny that Mount Tabor could have been the place where the transfiguration took place, and hold one of the slopes of Hermon to be a far more likely place. The only reason why Tabor is selected is because it is a high mountain apart. The story goes that Jesus was in the vicinity of Cesarea Philippi at the time of transfiguration, and that immediately afterward he went into Galilee, on his way to Jerusalem; this he would not have done had Tabor been the place. Several places are claimed for every event in the story. The Scribe does not believe there was any transfiguration.

4. Mount Tabor stands alone, thirteen hundred feet above the plain, or nearly two thousand feet above the sea level. It is chiefly a pile of naked rocks, much in the shape of an old-fashioned straw bee-hive, or an obtuse cone, flattened on the top. There is a little soil in the interstices between the rocks, so that a little scattering shrubbery or bushes can grow, and on the top three or four monks live; and though they have a small garden and keep some chickens, their food has principally to be taken to them. The man of God James did not return till nearly dark.

5. It was on Mount Tabor that Deborah is said to have commanded Barak to gather his army, and Barak went down from Mount Tabor with ten thousand men after him. And the Lord discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and all his host, with the edge of the sword before Barak.

6. In connection with this account the conduct of Jael toward Sisera stands out prominently. Barak, of course, won the fight; and while he was making his victory complete by the Jewish practice of slaughtering in cold blood the remnant of the defeated host, Sisera fled away on foot; and when nearly exhausted by fatigue and thirst he was invited by the Jewish woman, Jael, to enter her tent and rest himself. Weary and exhausted as he was, he gladly accepted her invitation, and she, with show of great kindness, put him to bed. He was very thirsty, and asked his preserver for a cup of water. She brought him some milk, which he drank with gratitude, and lay down again and soon lost himself in sweet repose. When he had become sound asleep, however, the perfidious woman came in stealthily, and with a hammer drove a large nail or tent-pin through his head!

7. For this base deed the woman was exceedingly praised by the chosen people of Yahweh. In the pious song of Deborah and Barak, the following strain of thanksgiving for the perfidious conduct is used: Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kemite be; blessed shall she be above women in the tent. He asked for water and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish. She put her hand to the nail, and her right hand to the workman's hammer, and with the hammer she smote Sisera, and she smote off his head when she had pierced and stricken through his temples. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down, at her feet he bowed; where he bowed he fell down dead (Judges v, 24–27). No savage could have disposed of a sleeping foe in a more pious, barbarian manner, and in an Indian war-dance joy at such a deed could not be more appropriately expressed.

8. In the afternoon the Scribe and five or six of the other pilgrims, with the captain, ascended the hill in the rear of Nazareth, probably over five hundred feet high, where a most splendid view is had of the principal part of the Land of Yahweh. On the summit of the hill is Wely Simian, a Mohammedan tomb, on the top of which is a dome. The Scribe ascended to the very apex of the dome and took in view all the country round about.

9. On the north, far away, is Hermon, with its towering, snow-capped summit. On the east are the mountains of Bashan and Gilead, in Moab, beyond the Jordan. On the west a fine view is had of the Mediterranean, some twenty-five miles away, and the steamboats and vessels can be discerned in the clear air; Mount Carmel, by the sea, looms up proudly, with the plains of Sharon below. To the south the mountains nearly all the way to Jerusalem can be seen, including the Mountains of Samaria, Mount Gerizim, Mounts Ebal, Jenin, Gilboa, Jezreel, and Little Hermon; also the villages of Nan and Endor, and the beautiful plain of Esdraelon.

10. When one realizes that from this point the greater part of the Land of Yahweh is taken in at one view, the beholder is struck with the diminutiveness of the country, and how much exaggeration and big story-telling has been done in connection with it; and he asks himself, Can it be that this is all there is of the land which such a noise and such a fuss have been made about? Can it be that this little seven-by-nine country was all that the deity who had created the whole earth and all the suns and stars cared for or selected? Could a God so circumscribed as he must have been, who claimed this as his chosen land, have been anything more than a mere neighborhood God at best?

11. A few miles to the north, on an elevated plain, some table-land was pointed out as the place where the great and decisive battle took place between the Crusaders and the Saracens, more than eight hundred years ago, from the sad defeat in which the mad Crusaders were never able to recover. It seems a truce had long been in existence between the opposing forces, which Raynauld of Chatilion, lord of Kerak, one of the Christian commanders, basely broke by plundering a Damascus caravan and refusing to give up the booty, which, like a robber, he had obtained. At this the Sultan Saladin became very much exasperated, and swore he would slaughter the perfidious Raynauld, with his own hand, whenever and wherever he might meet him.

12. Both armies prepared for war. Under the weak king of Jerusalem was the very flower of the Christian chivalry. He foolishly compelled his men to perform a long, exhausting march in the scorching sun, and then, without water, or other refreshments, ordered them to encamp in the open plain. The splendidly-mounted masses of the Moslems swept around the north side of the plain, burning and destroying as they went, and pitched their camp in front of the Christian lines.

13. At dawn the terrific fire began. Surrounded on all sides by the swarming battalions of the sultan, the Christian knights fought on without hope for their lives. They fought with desperate valor, but the odds were great against them, and the righteousness or unrighteousness of their cause made no difference. A consuming thirst, and superior numbers and strength opposed to them, were too much for them to withstand.

14. Toward the middle of the day the bravest of the Christian band cut their way through the Moslem ranks, and gained the summit of a little hill; and there, hour after hour, they closed around their banner of the cross, and beat back the charging squadrons of the enemy.

15. But their banner of the cross did not avail; the doom of the Christian power in Palestine was sealed. Sunset found Saladin master of the field, and the ruler of the country, with the Christian chivalry lying in heaps all around. The king of Jerusalem, the grand master of the Templars, and Raynauld of Chatilion were captives in Saladin's tent.

16. He treated the two first named with princely courtesy, and ordered refreshments to be set before them. When the king handed an iced sherbet to Chatilion, the sultan said, It is thou that givest it him, not I. Saladin kept his oath, and slaughtered the hapless knight of Chatilion with his own hand. That terrible warfare is far more easily understood and believed than many of the mythical contests of the olden time.

17. On the southern part of Mount Carmel was pointed out the place where the prophet Elijah had his wonderful experiences after the long drouth when there was neither rain nor dew in the country for three years, and where he had that great contest with the priests of Baal, when by loud praying they could not bring fire from heaven to kindle the sacrifice on the altar, and when after they were vanquished, he brought the fire and not only burned up the sacrifice, but also the stones and twelve barrels of water.

18. Then he mildly, and in a godlike manner, put four or five hundred of those unfortunate priests to death in cold blood, though what that number of men were doing while a single man was putting them to death is hard to understand. If they were so cowardly as to stand still and let an old man kill them by piecemeal, perhaps they ought to have died.

19. After the performance of this feat probably it was not strange that this godly murderer was able to pray up a good rain, which the country so badly needed, though why he should wait through the long dry spell of three years, without praying before, seems a little strange. It was not long from this time that he called fire down from heaven and burnt up a hundred men. Terrible man, that Massa Elijah!

20. A few words about Endor will not be amiss, for it lay before the pilgrims in fair sight. Here is where that celebrated woman lived a long time ago, who, according to the Bible, was able to raise people from the dead. To her the hapless Saul betook himself when his fortunes were bad and when the fates were against him; and though the old witch had no trouble in getting the defunct Samuel from his quiet resting-place, Saul seemed to get no communication that cheered him; and the next day he was unsuccessful in battle with the Philistines, and ended his life by leaning upon his sword and running it through his body.

21. Possibly the descendants of the witch still live at Endor, but they are said to be a dirty, miserable set, who do no honor to their gifted ancestors. They are literally half-naked savages, who look as though they would raise a corpse, or convert a living person into a corpse, for a moderate sum of money. They live in caves in the rocks, eat food when they can get it, and go without when they are not so fortunate.

20. The hill on which Endor stands is barren, rocky, and forbidding, without appearance of anything living or green. Peradventure this was a fitting place for a witch to dwell, who had it in her power to bring people forth from their graves. It is but few who possess that power.

21. Nazareth sits upon the side of the hill, in a hollow, with the sides coming in around it, and shows well a long way off. Many of the houses are square and well built, some of them two stories high; while the larger share are of stone and mud, like an Esquimaux hut, small, low, and round, having a door, but no window or chimney, and about large enough for a dog kennel. These are miserable places for human beings to live in, but they are the residences of many in the Land of Yahweh.

CHAPTER XV.

MELCHISEDEC'S SEVENTH VISIT.

1. The Venerable Visitor slipped in so quietly that not one of the inmates of the tent were apprised of his coming. His first words were: Hail, Truth Seeker; be not disturbed. I come only to renew the remarks not completed at my last visit, and mention a few more of the extravagant and untruthful statements of the Jewish scriptures.

2. I must insist that it shows a depraved and bloodthirsty disposition on the part of the Jewish deity to be pleased with such a shedding of blood as was done when Solomon's temple was completed. On the occasion of moving in the ark it is stated in his book that sheep and oxen were slaughtered in such numbers that they could not be counted; and at the dedication of the temple 22,000 oxen and 120,000 sheep were put to death for his pleasure. No other god can show such a bloody record.

3. It is hard to credit that after such a magnificent and prosperous reign as Solomon enjoyed, his kingdom should so soon be hopelessly divided, two tribes only adhering to his son and successor, while ten tribes went off to the usurper Jeroboam; and also that Jeroboam's hand, upon his putting it forth, instantly became so withered that he could not pull it in again, and that the prophet was able to restore it by prayer.

4. It is a dark story that the prophet Elijah was fed twice a day, and day after day, by ravens, which kept him alive when others all around him were starving to death. Ravens are not in the habit of doing that kind of business. It is also a mystery where they obtained food for the prophet when the country had been without rain or dew for three years and everybody was starving because they were unable to obtain food.

5. Of the same character is the story that the prophet after he had ceased boarding with the ravens and stopped with a widow, was able to prevent her meal and oil being used up, though she daily drew upon her small supplies.

6. It is wholly incredible that Elijah or any other prophet ever restored a dead man to life. A person who has fainted or is prostrated with a fit may be resuscitated, but no one really dead has ever been brought to life.

7. It must require a partialist to believe that the prayers of Elijah were so much more effective than those of the priests of Baal, that, while they effected nothing, he easily brought fire from heaven that readily burnt wood, flesh, stones, and water.

8. It is wholly incredible that he was able, single-handed and alone, to slay four hundred and fifty men. Even if they had been but small children, they ought to have been able to do something to him while he was hacking them to pieces.

9. It is a monstrous falsehood that the Land of Yahweh ever went three years without rain and dew, and that vegetation, animals, and men were not utterly wiped out of existence. It is equally untrue that, after it had so long been perfectly dry, Elijah could produce rain by sitting upon the ground, placing his head between his knees, and praying.

10. It is a Munchausen story that while he was fleeing from the anger of Jezebel angels brought him food, unless the angels were in human form.

11. Of equal incredibility is the tale that after Elijah had thus partaken of a meal brought to him by angels he was able to walk forty days and forty nights without food or sleep. And had he done so and proved himself as good a walker as some of our modern pedestrians, had he kept in a straight direction, he would have got so far away from the diminutive Land of Yahweh that he would never have got back again.

12. It is false that Elijah was able to call down fire from heaven on two occasions and burn up a hundred men and two captains who were sent to him by King Ahaziah to ask a favor.

13. It is wholly unworthy of belief that Elijah, in winding up his earthly career, was taken up bodily into heaven by a whirlwind or by a chariot and horses of fire. No man could live for five minutes if taken five miles into the air. In the first place, the cold up there is so intense that he could not stand it; and then again the air at that altitude is so rare, and there is so little oxygen, that a man suddenly introduced there would die at once. The pressure of the atmosphere being suddenly reduced; hemorrhage of the lungs would take place, and even blood vessels in various portions of the body would burst. No man has ever been taken five miles above the earth.

14. It is not probable that Elisha, the successor of Elijah, was such a plowman as to use twelve yoke of oxen at a time to plow with, and that when Elijah called him he should leave the oxen in the field uncared for, and thus drop everything to follow his new master.

15. It is incredible and foolish that, because some children made sport of Elisha because the hair was gone from the top of his head, God should send two ferocious she-bears out of a neighboring wood, to tear and chew forty and two of the little children. There is only one other God upon whom such cruelty to children can be charged, and that is Moloch, who seemed to take pleasure in the death of the little innocents.

16. The pretense that Elisha was able to increase the quantity of oil by pouring it from one vessel to another is too silly and too impossible for any one to believe.

17. It is no more true that Elisha restored a dead man to life than that Elijah performed the feat. By way of repetition, I must say such a thing was never done.

18. It is a foolish claim that Elisha was able to feed one hundred men without decreasing the store of food on hand. There is no process by which bread and meat can be thus increased.

19. It is very unlikely that Elisha was able to cure Naaman of leprosy by his washing in the river Jordan. If all the lepers in the world were to bathe a thousand times in the Jordan not one of them would be cured.

20. It is equally untrue that Elisha could transfer the leprosy from Naaman to his servant Gehazi, who had offended him.

21. It is untrue that Elisha could make an iron ax swim in the Jordan and float on the surface of the water.

22. It is equally untrue that by smiting the waters of the Jordan they parted and he was able to walk over dry shod.

23. Of a similar character is the story that he was able to cause a young man who was blind to see a mountain full of horses.

24. It is equally untrue that he was able to smite a whole army of Syrians with blindness. The writers of those foolish stories counted so much upon the credulity of their readers that no statement seemed too absurd or too impossible for them to make.

25. It is wholly untrue that the bones of Elisha, long after he was dead and buried, should possess such power that a corpse merely coming in contact with them should be instantly restored to life. Truly a great number of egregious falsehoods were told of the two men Elijah and Elisha.

26. It is a noticeable fact that while these falsehoods are fully given in the books of Kings, in the two books of Chronicles, which detail the events of the same period, not a word should be said about those Munchausen tales, about bringing dead persons to life, about calling fire down from heaven and burning up men; about there being no rain nor dew for three years, when rain was produced by Elijah; about his going up to heaven in a chariot of fire; about Elisha's wonderful feats just alluded to. Evidently the writer of the books of Chronicles had not the assurance and hardihood to repeat such silly falsehoods. Evidently he did not believe them at all.

27. It is hard to understand why Yahweh, who had undertaken the experiment of controling his chosen people in his selected country, and of making a great and powerful nation of them, should suffer the Assyrians under Shalmaneser to come into the country and carry them off captive, and that they should become so thoroughly exterminated that they were never seen nor heard of since.

28. It is very much to be doubted that this miserable little country, which is scarcely more than a pile of rocks, should be able to raise such armies and to keep up a civil war of such magnitude that on one occasion Israel under Pekah was able in one day to slay 120,000 valiant men of Judah, and on another occasion the men of Judah under Abijah in a single day slew 500,000 of the men of Israel. No other nation with ten times the amount of territory has perpetrated such carnage and bloodshed. The statements are simply false; this little country was never able to raise and sustain such armies, and such wholesale killing in such a short space of time was never performed here nor elsewhere.

29. It is wholly incredible that by prayer Isaiah should be able to reverse the motion of the sun and cause its shadow to go back ten degrees on the dial of Ahaz. The story is of the same character as that of the sun's standing still at the command of Joshua. Both statements are positive falsehoods.

30 It is no more true that Isaiah by prayer was able to prolong the life of Hezekiah for fifteen years. Who knew that he would have died sooner than he did but for that prayer? Certain medical treatment and hygienic courses may remove diseases so that life may be prolonged, but prayer by itself has no such effect. That has within the last few months been pretty thoroughly tried in thy own country upon the person of the president who was shot, and his life was not prolonged fifteen seconds by the fifty millions of prayers that were offered up.

31. It is a false statement that the angel of the Lord in one night slew 185,000 Assyrian soldiers. The angels are not doing that kind of business, and never have been.

32. It is very unlikely that during the reign of the King Josiah, the priest Hilkiah found in the temple, or house of the Lord, a book of the law of the Lord which had been lost for hundreds of years. The place for the sacred writings to be kept was in the sanctuary, where they were placed in Solomon's time, and it is the merest pretense that Hilkiah was able to find what no one before him could discover. It is far more likely that the newly found book was gotten up between himself and his scribe Shaphan, and that the finding story was invented to make the new book take well with the young king.

33. It is usually pretended that this book of the law of the Lord was what is usually called the Mosaic law. Whether or not that was the first time the Mosaic law was known to the people, it is very sure that neither Samuel, nor Nathan, nor Isaiah, nor Jeremiah, nor Ezekiel, nor Joel, nor Amos, nor Micah, nor David, nor Solomon, nor any others of those reputed men of God of their time knew anything about the law of Moses, or the extravagant stories told in the Pentateuch, showing very conclusively that the Moses business was an invention of later times, and probably not gotten up until after the return from Babylon.

34. It is very singular, if Yahweh had the power that has been attributed to him, and his reputation was at stake in making a success of his Jewish enterprise, that when he had angels in his employ that could individually slay some 200,000 soldiers in a single night, he should allow the pagan king Nebuchadnezzar, from the wicked city of Babylon, to come into his holy city of Jerusalem, overcome his own chosen people, demolish his holy temple which he had authorized his servant Solomon to build, and to carry off the holy vessels and valuable treasures from the temple and convey them to that pagan and wicked city. It is very awkward to suppose that he would thus suffer his own plans to be perverted, his own darling enterprise thwarted, his word stolen and defiled. One of three conclusions must be arrived at—that the whole story is false, or that he had changed his mind and purposes, or that he was unable to perfect what he had undertaken.

35. There is no truth in the claim that Daniel or any other man could recall a man's dream, as Daniel is said to have done by Nebuchadnezzar, when that king had forgttten all about it himself.

36. It is not a little doubtful about Nebuchadnezzar making a golden image one hundred and ten feet high, and eleven feet broad. Such an image would cost a vast amount of wealth.

37. It is a very untruthful story that because Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego refused to bow down to this image Nebuchadnezzar caused them to be thrown into a fiery furnace made seven times hotter than usual, and that the fire did not burn them at all, nor even singe a hair of their clothing. Fire is no respecter of creeds or moral qualities, but burns everybody alike that comes in its way.

38. It is not at all truthful that Nebuchadnezzar turned from man to brute and fed upon grass like an ox, his hairs becoming like eagles' feathers and his nails like birds' claws. Such stories are only silly fables.

39. The story about the handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's feast, but which Daniel was able to explain, is evidently apocryphal.

40. The story of Daniel being cast into a den of wild and hungry lions for praying, and that the lions refused to taste of him or molest him, is extremely improbable, to say the least. The lions knew nothing about his religious exercises, and cared just as little; and the gods are not controling the appetites of lions. The story is clearly a fiction.

21. I will, however, remain no longer on this occasion, but renew these brief criticisms at my next visit. I wish the Scribe good-night and a refreshing sleep.

CHAPTER XVI.

EIGHTH DAY'S JOURNEY—FROM NAZARETH TO JENIN.

1. And it came to pass on the eighth and twentieth day of the month, and betimes in the morning, the pilgrims, the captain of the host, the men-servants, and horses, and asses were in due time to start upon their journey toward the holy city of Jerusalem; and moreover the dog was also ready to leave Nazareth; but it must be recorded that the dog did here forsake the company of the pilgrims and join himself to another party, even to a party of five Spaniards, who are also doing up the Land of Yahweh, and who camped at the west end of the village of Nazareth at the same time that the pilgrims were camping at the east end. Sobeit, the dog changed companies, and no more traveled with the pilgrims, and no longer combined with the asses to keep the pilgrims awake at night. Moreover the dog is a yellow Arab dog, and his Arab name is Barood.

2. In leaving Nazareth, as you go toward the south, a rough and rocky, and long and steep hill has to be descended, by a winding, precipitous road, which in many places is almost perilous to both horse and rider. The head of the horse is often three feet lower than the opposite end, and it is difficult for the rider to remain on.

3. And it came to pass while descending one of these many steep places, that the horse of the man of God James stepped upon a sloping rock, when his feet slipped, and horse and rider both came down prostrate with much force, but fortunately neither was seriously hurt.

4. The plain of Esdraelon lay before the pilgrims, and it is the finest piece of farming country in all the Land of Yahweh. It is a gently undulating plain nearly ten miles across in the widest place and more than that in length. The soil is mellow and good, and is susceptible of raising good wheat and barley.

5. Several men were here plowing with their yokes of little black cattle and their little plows, sowing the grain before plowing, and not touching the land after. To run over the land with a cultivator would be equally thorough.

6. The plain is devoid of the dwellings of men, the humble, miserable little villages being located at some spring or fountain at the foot of the hills, or upon the hills. The plain is infested with thieves and marauders, so that the labors of the tillers of the soil are not as safe as in other places.

7. The ride across the plain is a pretty long one, and the mountains and hills which inclose it in present about all that can be viewed with much interest, for the plain grows monotonous and dull, nothing being upon it.

8. It was beforetime also called the plain of Jezreel, called also Esdra-Elon. In Zechariah it is called the valley of Megiddo, and in Revelations Armageddon, meaning the city of Megiddo.

9. This plain has been a battlefield from Barak to Napoleon. Warriors of many nations have pitched their tents upon it, and here much human blood has been spilt.

10. The plain was the frontier of Zebulun, and the special portion of Issachar. Here it is held Barak discomfited the host of Sisera, whose defeat was owing, in great measure, to his having been drawn to the river Kishon, which drains the plain into the Mediterranean.

11. Here, it is said, too, that Josiah the king came to fight with Necho of Egypt, and received his death wound. From generation to generation this plain was the scene of plunder and of bloodshed.

12. Here it is claimed that the Cananites under Jobin had nine hundred chariots of iron, which were so effective on the plain that Yahweh and the Israelites could not drive them out for many years.

13. Here, perhaps, it was that, according to Judges i, 19, the Lord was with Judah, and he drave out the inhabitants of the mountain, and could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron.

14. Here it was that the Midianites came up, and the Amalekites, and the children of the East, even they came up against the Israelites and destroyed the increase of the earth, . . . for they came up with their cattle and their tents, and they came as grasshoppers for multitude (Judges vi, 1–6). The plain was also held by the Philistines, and the Syrians often swept through it with their armies.

15. The pilgrims crossed the eastern part of the plain and came even unto the old city of Nain, leaving Endor two or three miles to the left.

16. At Nain it was that Jesus is said to have met a funeral procession bearing a young man on a bier to his grave, and there he commanded the young man to arise, and he that was dead sat up and began to speak; and he delivered him to his mother. This is simply one of the many big stories connected with this country; but the pilgrims could see nothing about the appearance of the shabby little village to convince them that a man had ever been raised from the dead there.

17. At the hour for lunch the band had reached the foot of Mount Gilboa, even the fountain of Gideon, who here selected his three hundred warriors because they lapped water like dogs; and near this place, on the plain, is where the valiant Gideon gained his remarkable victory by breaking his pitchers, which set the Midianites to fighting each other.

18. The fountain is a splendid spring, which gushes up between the stones at the foot of Mount Gilboa and fills a pond, and was beforetime also called the fountain of Jezreel. It is a clear, limpid stream, large enough to turn a mill; and here the goats, and the asses, and the cattle come a long way to drink.

19. It was near this locality that Saul and his three unfortunate sons are said to have met their sad deaths. Saul, the night before, had consulted the witch of Endor, but received from the defunct Samuel no intelligence save that on the following day he should be defeated and meet his death; and after his defeat, his armor-bearer refusing to run him through the body, he performed the deed himself. When the Philistines found his body they cut off his head, and stripped him of his armor, and sent them in triumph to their own country.

20. As the pilgrims were eating their lunch upon the ground they saw it raining in three different directions, two miles or thereabouts away; but it rained not where they were, whereat they rejoiced greatly. The Mount of Tabor was near them on the east, and they had a good view of the same.

21. Leaving the fountain of Gideon, the pilgrims passed along by the foot of Gilboa, near the border of the plain, and reached Shunem, now called Salem. It is surrounded with a thick hedge of the prickly pear, which is more often met with here than any other vegetation, and which grows where nothing else will. The village has little to boast of save stone and mud huts, with some gardens; howbeit, it is pleasanter than some other villages.

22. Here it was that the Philistines had their encampment when they waged war with Saul. And here lived the friendly Shunemite woman who showed kindness to Elisha, and persuaded her husband to build a little chamber or balcony on the side of their stone house for the prophet to make his home when he was in that neighborhood.

23. It will be remembered that the husband of the woman was an old man, and for some reason the woman, though a healthy, robust person, had no children, which she was anxious to have. After Elisha took possession of the little chamber which the woman had caused to be built for him, she conceived and bore a son. Whether there was any connection between the man who occupied the chamber and the child, the Scribe does not pretend to say; only that things of that kind have taken place when men of God were around.

24. Here it was, likewise, that Elisha brought back to life the young man who, going out to his aged daddy in the field, fell and bumped his head upon a stone, and afterward gave up the ghost; whereupon the mother hastened across the plain to Mount Carmel, on the west, for the man of God to come and bring him back to life. He came with alacrity, and soon had the boy sound and well again.

25. It is uncertain whether all of Elisha's remarkable facts were performed in this neighborhood, to wit, the sending of the two she bears to eat up forty-two children, making five gallons of oil into ten gallons, etc.; howbeit, some of his great works were performed in other places.

26. Leaving Taanach and Megiddo on the right, the pilgrims came near the miserable village of Zerin, the ancient Jezreel. The view from the slight eminence is very fine, the plain here being wide and interesting, reaching from Carmel even nigh unto the Jordan.

27. Here was the palace of Ahab, but not a trace of it remains. In the fields below is said to be the vineyard of Naboth, which Ahab so ardently coveted for an herb garden, because it was so near his own house. Naboth, however, did not wish to part with his real estate, it being the inheritance of his fathers; whereupon that bad woman Jezebel, wife of Ahab, laid her foul plots to get Naboth out of the way, by inducing two men to falsely swear he had blasphemed, for which crime he was stoned to death, so that her husband could obtain the coveted field; for which evil doing the man of God Elijah pronounced a curse upon Ahab and Jezebel, in consequence of which, after painting her face, she was thrown out of the window and killed on the pavement, and the dogs came and licked her blood.

28. The way in which Jezebel was served was in this wise: In after years, when Ahab was dead, Jehu, king of Israel, marched down against Jezreel, by order of a man of God, and administered one of the gentle rebukes for which the people of Yahweh were so noted; that is to say, he killed many kings and their subjects; and as he was marching along in lordly triumph he saw Jezebel, finely painted and decorated, looking out of the window, which, in his mild way, he ordered her to be thrown out of; and when he was obeyed by one of his servants he trampled the woman to death with his horse.

29. This little exercise gave him a good appetite for dinner, and he sat down to eat; but very soon a fit of compassion seized him and he said, Go and bury this cursed woman, for she is a king's daughter. He was, however, too late, for the dogs had already fulfilled Elijah's prophecy, and had eaten her, leaving only the skull and the feet and the palms of her hands.

30. It seems that Ahab, who had died some time before, left a somewhat numerous family after him; but the Jewish King Jehu coolly killed seventy of the orphan sons, which act he followed up by killing all the relatives, teachers, servants, and friends of the murdered children.

31. But this little pastime of killing orphans did not quite seem to satisfy Jehu. When he arrived at Samaria, or near there, he met forty-two persons and asked them who they were; and when they answered that they were brothers of the king of Judah, he just killed them all. And when he reached Samaria, to show his holy zeal for Yahweh, he gathered all the priests and people together who had the temerity to worship Baal, under the pretense that he was about to adopt their worship and offer a great sacrifice; and after he had them all nicely shut up he served Yahweh by having them all put to death by massacre. And Yahweh was pleased.

32. The place where Elijah had his contest with the priests of Baal, which resulted in his putting four hundred and fifty of them to death, was on the Hill of Sacrifice, on Mount Carmel, a few miles off to the west; and that was where by prayer he ended the drouth of three years, in which neither rain nor dew had fallen. And near there he called down fire from heaven and burned up more than a hundred men.

33. At Fuleh, another miserable town not far away, the Crusaders had a castle belonging to the Templars and Knights of St. John, but it was taken by Saladin. In 1799 this was also the scene of a great battle between the French and the Turks, sometimes called the battle of Mount Tabor. Kleber, with about fifteen hundred men, kept the Syrian host, consisting of about twenty-five thousand, at bay for six hours. He was near being defeated, when Napoleon came up with but about six hundred men to his relief, and the Turks, thinking a much larger reinforcement had arrived, fled, and the French arms were victorious.

34. In the afternoon some three modern Mohammedan villages were passed, but they are without historical interest; and while the sun was in the heavens the pilgrims reached the white tents pitched on the south side of the town of Jenin, at the foot of a hill by the same name.

35. It is a prosperous looking town for this country, and contains three thousand inhabitants. It is thought to be the En-gannim (fountain of gardens) of scripture. It was a town on the border of Issachar, allotted to the Girshonite Levites. Josephus mentions the town under the name of Ginea, as one of the boundaries between Samaria and Galilee.

36. There are beautiful gardens about the place, in which are orange-trees in bearing, and a plenty of radishes and other vegetables. Several palm-trees overtop the buildings and present a pleasing appearance at a distance. The town shows far more than the usual thrift, and the humble markets were pretty well supplied with fruits and vegetables. This day the pilgrims traveled a score and two miles.

CHAPTER XVII.

MELCHISEDEC'S EIGHTH VISIT.

1. And it came to pass that the Venerable Priest of the Most High did not on this occasion fail to put in an appearance as upon the seven preceding nights; and as he entered he said, Peace be to this tent, and peace be unto thee, Scribe from the land of Unclesam. Thou hast this day seen the best part of all the Land of Yahweh, though thou hast seen many mountains of barren rocks. Howbeit the whole land would not make more than half of many of the countries in thy land.

2. But I will now resume the subject of my last visits. Let me call thy attention to a few of the statements contained in the book of Job. Howbeit that book was not written by a Hebrew, but was borrowed from one of the pagan nations; but inasmuch as the Hebrews adopted it as their own and incorporated it in their collection, it is justly entitled to the same scale of criticism as the books of their own writing.

3. It has often been noticed that the persons and places mentioned in the book of Job have no connection whatever with those mentioned in the other books of the Jewish scriptures, showing conclusively that it has no connection with them in characters, incidents, or localities; howbeit it is one of the grandest books in the collection, though merely a drama or poem.

4. It is very uncertain who the sons of God were with whom Satan met at the time of his traveling up and down in the earth. In the book of Genesis it speaks about the sons of God taking the daughters of men for wives and raising a race of giants; but the book of Job does not indicate that the two sets of sons of God were the same persons. It is not known with any certainty how many sons God had.

5. It hardly conforms with the common conception of God and Satan that they should meet on friendly terms, and in the most amicable manner enter into a bargain to put the good old man Job to the most severe tests to see whether he would bear affliction patiently without getting into bad humor about it.

6. It would seem not honorable in any person, whether God or devil, to bring upon a good and faultless man who had lived uprightly through life, the most cruel and heart-rending afflictions, to wit, taking away his children, seven sons and three daughters; destroying his large possessions, including 7,000 sheep, 3,000 camels, 1,000 oxen, 500 she-asses, etc.

7. When this failed to break the old man's integrity it was doubly cruel and heartless to bring upon him the most grievous bodily afflictions, covering him from head to foot with the most painful and loathsome boils and sores. It would seem that any well-disposed God or devil should have too much character to be guilty of such conduct.

8. It is to be supposed that God should be pardoned for being a party to the sufferings of the poor old man by granting him double the number of sons and daughters, as well as doubling the number of sheep, camels, oxen, etc. Whether his wife who had borne to him the first crop of ten children was able to go through the painful experience and bear twenty more, whether the old man had to take another wife, or whether God furnished him the children already born and grown up, is not stated. There is not the slightest probability that the incidents of the story ever took place.

9. It is a noticeable fact that the sons of God mentioned in the book of Job are not referred to in any other part of the Jewish scriptures; and, save the passage in Genesis, it would not appear that God had sons dwelling upon the earth. Who their mothers were, whether celestial females or earthly virgins, there is no way of deciding.

10. Of the book of Esther it may be said it is remarkable for not containing the name of God and for commending a woman for prostituting herself to a pagan king, whereby she was able to induce him to grant certain favors to her people. The story, however, is a fiction.

11. The book called the Song of Solomon, which is of a very amorous character, in which the writer dwells lasciviously upon the attractive points of a beautiful female, and which have been falsely represented to mean Christ's love for his church, is of unknown authorship. There is no reason for believing that it was written by Solomon.

12. There is much in Ezekiel that is repulsive to a refined taste. His formula for bread making, in the fourth chapter, and the coarse metaphors in the twenty-third and other chapters, are such as a person would not like to read before a company of gentlemen and ladies.

13. The story about the man called Jonah is exceedingly false. The claim that a man not obeying the command of God should cause the sea to become tempestuous, and that it should become peaceful again as soon as he was thrown overboard, cannot be believed, save by the very credulous.

14. That Jonah should have been swallowed by a fish, and be retained for three days, without inconvenience to himself for want of air, and that he could live three days without air, is wholly devoid of truth.

15. It is very unlikely that Jonah should have been selected by an intelligent person to go and prophesy and preach to a people of a different nation and tongue, who could not understand him; or that if he did preach to them, they should become so alarmed at his words that they should not only clothe themselves in sackcloth, but that they should also clothe their beasts of burden and animals with the same.

16. The part about the gourd growing up in a single night so as to form a shade, under which the prophet could hide himself from the sun's rays, and that God prepared a worm to cut it down, is in keeping with the rest of the story. The whole must be regarded by people of reasonable minds as only a fiction.

17. I have hurriedly run over the books comprising what is called the Old Testament, and mentioned only a part of the fictions and creations of the imagination with which it is replete. I am sure I have not mentioned half of those that might justly be termed falsehoods, but I have instanced enough to show that it is an untruthful volume, containing very much that is extremely improbable, and much that is strictly untrue.

18. I made some remarks to show that the first five books of the Bible, called the Pentateuch, claimed to have been written by Moses, were not written by that individual. I will now very briefly run over several others of the books in the Old Testament, with the view of showing that they could not have been written by the persons claimed to be their authors.

19. The book of Joshua could not have been written by the person whose name it bears, unless he was able to write out while living what should take place long after he was dead, which would be a most absurd claim to set up. In chapter xxiv, 31, it says Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that overlived Joshua. He could not have written about what occurred to the men who outlived him, all the days of their lives.

20. When the monstrous statement is given about the sun and moon standing still at his command, the remark is made, And there was no day like that, before it, nor after it, that the Lord hearkened unto a man. That clearly was written by one who lived some time after the event, as the phrase necessarily includes a long time subsequent.

21. Chapter xv, 63, says, As for the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children of Judah could not drive them out, and the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah at Jerusalem unto this day. Joshua could not possibly have written this. Jebusi, the ancient name for Jerusalem, was not taken until the time of David, when the name was changed to Jerusalem, and this was four hundred years after the time of Joshua. It clearly was not written till after the time city was taken.

22. Similar statements are made in several places where the expressions, Even unto this day, and, It remaineth unto this day, show conclusively that the account was not written till a long time after the events transpired. It is a book about Joshua, and not by Joshua. It is not at all probable that he wrote a word of it.

23. Judges is an anonymous book, and it cannot be said who wrote it; but it is very clear that it was not written till a long time after the date of the occurrence of the events given in the narrative. It speaks of Jerusalem in several places, which shows that it could not have been written until after the time of David.

24. The two books of Samuel will bear examination no better. They are claimed to have been written by Samuel, but the claim is untrue. He certainly could not write the account about his being raised from his grave by the witch of Endor, which is given in the first book. The second comes down to the close of the reign of David, when Samuel had been forty years in his grave. He did not write the books.

25. The two books of Kings do not pretend to be anything more than historical narratives of the wars with other nations, and wars with each other, which the kings of the country indulged in. Any person of ordinary ability could write such books, if he had the data for the purpose; and if he had it not, it would not require a powerful imagination to invent some of them. No one knows who wrote the books, and it is but little difference who wrote them. Like all the writings of that period of the world, they contain some truths and some falsehoods. The exaggerations are numerous.

26. The two books of Chronicles go over much the same ground as the books of the kings, with the usual proportion of contradictions and differences. They were not written till two or three centuries before the present era, and were not done by inspiration. The author or authors are wholly unknown.

27. It is thought the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were by the same author as the Chronicles, as the last of the Chronicles and the first of Ezra are alike. They are badly mixed and disjointed. They disagree as to many details, but it is unnecessary to point these out. They were written less than three hundred years before the Christian era.

28. The book of Ruth may be denominated a sort of love story of a Moabitish girl creeping slyly, at night, into the bed of a young man who was her cousin. Thousands of similar incidents could with equal propriety have been added to the Jewish sacred collection. It was not written till nearly a thousand years later than the time of which it speaks. No inspiration was necessary to write it.

29. The book of Esther is chiefly remarkable for not containing the name of Yahweh once, and giving the story of a young woman who willingly prostituted herself to the king of Persia. It required no inspiration to write such an account, and it is of but little consequence in the present age of the world.

30. Enough has been said of the book of Job; it contains many grand conceptions, and comes nearer to containing a correct idea of the forces of nature, though expressed in poetic language, than any book in the Jewish scriptures; but it is not of Hebrew production, nor is it known when or where it was written. It has no kind of connection with the persons or places mentioned in the other books of the Bible. It is a pagan composition—a poem or drama, and wholly imaginative. The events narrated in it never occurred.

31. The Psalms are untruthfully ascribed to David. He never wrote one of them. They are a collection by different authors, much as hymns and songs by different writers are collected now. Many passages are pointed out that clearly were not written till long after the time of David, and the best judges hold that some of them were written as late as the time of the Maccabees, while others were from the time of Ezra. They are the meditations of religious men, and are just as valuable as though written by the bloody warrior to whom they are accredited.

32. It is barely possible that Solomon may have originated some of the proverbs contained in the collection ascribed to him, but there is no probability that he is the author of many of them. They are the collection of what were considered the wise and sage sayings of different times and different peoples. Quite a portion of them are of pagan origin. The chapter beginning with, The words of King Lemuel, is clearly of pagan origin, for the Israelites had no king by that name. The prayer of Agur is probably of the same character. Nearly all ancient nations have had sayings and proverbs of much the same kind.

33. It is very unlikely that Solomon wrote Ecclesiastes, but it was most probably written by some unknown person who wished to palm off his production as if written by a noted person. The very first and twelfth verses have this appearance. I, the preacher, was king over Israel in Jerusalem. Solomon was king up to the hour of his death, and had he really written the book, he would have said, I am king, and not, I was king. Neither would it look well for him to say, I have gotten more wisdom than all that were before me. A truly wise man would not speak in that way of himself. The best Bible students place the writing of the dolorous book seven or eight hundred years after Solomon's time.

34. The song named after Solomon is an amorous composition, and though it is unlikely that he wrote it, the authorship would not be a great credit to him. Solomon would hardly have been the man to highly praise the purity and faithfulness of a maiden he had fruitlessly tried to add to his conquests. The greatest falsehood, however, is the pretense that the amorous song or poem has the slightest reference to Christ and the church.

35. I will not dwell much on the sixteen books called the prophecies, except to remark that they are the oldest of any of the books of the Old Testament, and the least apocryphal of them all, though they are not all correct as to authorship, nor were they written at the time claimed, nor in the order given.

36. Isaiah is by two authors, the first a wild, discordant, but rather grand writer, who lived about 712 B.C.; the second was not written till some two hundred years later, while the Israelites were captives in Babylon. The way in which the writings of two or more authors are thus thrown together and represented as one exhibits the careless and incorrect manner in which the Old Testament is made up.

37. The second or Deutero-Isaiah wrote about the Lord having chosen Pyrus as his servant, whom he had anointed, whose right had he holden to subdue the nations, etc., for he lived in the time of Cyrus, while the first or true Isaiah had died nearly two centuries before. The style of the two writers is materially different.

38. Jeremiah is placed second, while his correct place would be twelfth. He was not the author of all that stands to his credit. Good judges throw out several chapters as not being by him. He made several mistakes in his productions; notably, his assurances to Zedekiah, in the thirty-fourth chapter, that he should not die by the sword, but in peace, whereas Zedekiah's sons were put to death before him, his eyes were put out, and he was taken captive to Babylon and kept in prison till he died. Jeremiah also showed dishonesty by pandering to Nebuchadnezzar, whom he evidently wished to placate. He was undoubtedly a gloomy and sorrowful man.

39. Ezekiel is placed third among the prophets, but should be thirteenth. He has been called a writer rather than a prophet, but he made some hits and some misses. His plan for the rebuilding of the temple was disregarded, and it is well that it was, for his plan would have taken up the entire city. Some of his writings are very coarse and crude.

40. Daniel stands fourth, and should be last, or more correctly, he should not be placed among the prophets at all. The writer was neither Daniel nor a prophet. It was not written till nearly four hundred years after the time of Daniel. It was the last book admitted into the Jewish canon, and got in with much difficulty. It was not placed among the prophecies by the Jews, but by Christians. For many hundred years great importance was attached to what were supposed to be its prophecies, but they are so unmeaning, so misleading, and so many failures have grown out of them, that confidence has been lost, and but little importance is attached to them.

41. The remaining writers of the Old Testament are called the minor prophets, but as comparatively little importance is attached to them, I will not recall them at this time. They do not stand chronologically correct, nor does what they have to say have any bearing upon this age of the world. Some of them prophesied against the Assyrians, some against the Scythians. Some were interested in one direction, others in others; but I will not take them up in detail.

42. Neither will I now enter upon the subject of prophecy by an examination of its unreliability and worthlessness, though I may do so at another time. I will now instead bid thee good-night, wish thee sweet repose, and take my departure.

CHAPTER XVIII.

NINTH DAY—FROM JENIN TO NABULUS.

1. And it came to pass on the morning of the ninth day of the journey of the pilgrims, that they started betimes, learning that they had a long and hard day's journey to perform. Their road at once led up a rocky defile among the hills; for they had now passed the plain country. In passing through an olive grove the Frenchman was knocked from his donkey by passing under low limbs, but as he rides sidewise on some sacks, the falls were slight if frequent.

2. After two hours' ride over a very rough road the pilgrims reached the wells of Dothan, where they saw many or the Syrian damsels filling their earthen jars or pitchers with water to carry on their heads to their homes, some of them two miles away. Many were met on the road, some going toward the well with empty jars, and others returning with full ones. The large bottles or jars are filled by means of a long pole with a pin at the end. The jars are pushed into the water by the pole, and then hauled up.

3. This well is another of the veritable pits into which Joseph was cast by his brethren when his father sent him out to ascertain how they were getting on in pasturing the sheep. When several places are claimed as the locality where certain events occurred, one is not here little embarrassed in determining which is the true and which the false; though in this case possibly one is just as true as the other.

4. It is claimed that here at Dothan Elisha tarried during the time Benhadad was marching toward Samaria, and that here the prophet by prayer enabled a young man to see a mountain full of horses and chariots of fire; and here it was that he caused the Syrian hosts to be smitten with blindness.

5. It is a steep, rocky road to climb up to where Samaria once stood, and where are some of the ruins of the old town. A miserable modern Syrian village now occupies a part of the site, and the name of the same is Sebastiyeh, and it is surrounded by an ill-looking hedge of prickly pear.

6. The first and about the only ruins seen on the rugged hill where Samaria stood is a row of columns which once encircled the city; many of them monoliths of a plain character, and fifteen feet high or more on an average, though they are not all alike. Many of them are still standing, while others have fallen over. They are very tame and unattractive compared with many columns of pagan temples.

7. The city was built by Omri, king of Israel, and became the capital of the ten tribes until they were carried into captivity; and here is that Ahab erected a temple to Baal, and which Jehu destroyed. During his reign the city was besieged by Benhadad, who was defeated. After being many times besieged it was captured by the Assyrians, and all the people of the ten tribes were carried away into captivity.

8. After various revivals the city was taken by John Hyrcanus. Pompey restored it to Syria, and Augustus gave it to Herod the Great, who rebuilt it with great magnificence, and who probably put up all the columns, in all over a hundred in number. But little is now to be seen save the columns and the rubbish where the city stood.

9. After passing around the site of the old city which stood on the hill-top, the pilgrims visited a mosque which was once a Christian church, and called the church of St. John. The Christians lost it when they were defeated by the Saracens.

10. In the center of the court is what purports to be the sepulcher of John the Baptist, which is reached by descending twenty or thirty steps. The bones, however, are gone; they are said to have been taken to Rome, where they have performed astonishing miracles, though the skeleton was minus a head. According to the story, John the Baptist was beheaded, and the head part was taken to Herodias, the daughter of Herod, and it is not at all probable that the head and trunk were ever brought together again. Had they been buried as one in this tomb, what wonders they might have performed indeed!

11. The trouble is one feels so much doubt here as to the certainty of any of these claims. Those upon whose authority these localities have been fixed upon knew not that the persons ever lived whose story they have connected with the places, much less that they selected the right localities. It is very easy to say this is the place where John the Baptist was buried, but that does not prove that there ever was such a person, or that there was one chance in a hundred of his having been buried there.

12. The place, of course, is pointed out where the lepers sat in the days of Ahab, where Herod built his temple, where the market was, the tomb of Obadiah, and other persons. Josephus states that John was beheaded in the castle of Marcherus on the Dead Sea; and if that is so, it is very unlikely that his trunk was carried the better part of a hundred miles for burial. St. Jerome, in the fourth century, is the first one who alludes to the tradition that John was buried at Samaria. He was also the authority for settling many claims which no person had the means of knowing anything about.

13. From the high ground of Samaria an extensive view of the surrounding country is obtained. Many large hills of rock are in view, with narrow valleys and defiles between; and as the pilgrims descended the very precipitous hill on which the city stood, they passed over extremely rough and stony roads. A spring was passed under a ledge of rocks, called the Robbers' Fountain, where the Bedouin brigands who infest the country resort for water.

14. The roads continued extremely rocky and rough, the stones in many places being small and loose, round, and very numerous, so it was bad for the horses to walk thereon. Hills were passed over where the stones had been laid into heavy walls and large piles, but still the ground was well covered; but room was found for some olive and fig trees, and soil enough between the rocks is found to keep them alive, as they require but little.

15. The road to Nabulus, or ancient Shechem, lies between two long hills of rocks, with an arrow valley between, and this continues for several miles. The road was once paved in a very imperfect way, and is extremely rough; but telegraph poles along the road with a single wire reminded the pilgrims that they were still not quite out of the world.

16. The white tents, pitched at the east end of the town, were reached before the fifth hour, and while the sun was still half an hour high in the heavens; and the pilgrims were glad to thus complete a hard day's ride.

17. Nabulus, corrupted from Neapolis, or Flavia Neapolis, is the name given to the town in commemoration of its restoration by Titus Flavius Vespasian. It is the Shechem of the Old Testament. In the time of Jabob it was a Hivite city, under the governorship of Hamor, the father of Shechem. It was here the events are supposed to have occurred referred to in Genesis xxxiv, when Dinah, the daughter of Jacob, pleased Shechem, the son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the country, and he fell desperately in love with her; and they did that together which young people should not do until they are married.

18. Contrary to the usual custom, Shechem retained a strong love for Dinah, and his soul clave unto her notwithstanding their little indiscretion; and he besought his father to see her father and have matters duly arranged so he could make the girl his legal wife.

19. The young man seemed honorable in his intentions, as also did his father Hazor, who conferred with Jacob touching the matter, offering him the freedom of the country, and proposing that Jacob give his daughters to the sons of the country for wives, and in return that his sons take the daughters of the country for wives, and they thus become one people.

20. The father of Shechem bore himself throughout in a very honorable manner, presenting the most amicable offers to give with the son anything reasonable. But it suited the sons of Jacob to be deceitful and play a false and double part; they entertained deep malice against both father and son, and sought their destruction.

21. They pretended if father and son and the males belonging to them would be circumcised they would accede to the request made and consent to the marriage between Shechem and Dinah. Hamor at once complied with the demands thus made, and persuaded all the males under his control to consent to circumcision.

22. But when they had in good faith done all that the sons of Jacob had demanded, and while they were still sore from the surgical operation, the treacherous sons of Jacob falsified their word and massacred in cold blood father, son, and all the males under them.

23. To carry out the business of their natures, after killing the non-resisting men, they took all their sheep, oxen, asses, and everything that was in the city and country, and even the wives and the children of the murdered men were carried away captives. It was only the chosen people of Yahweh that could be guilty of such conduct.

24. Even the dishonest old Jacob, who had deeply wronged his own generous-hearted brother, was appalled at such base conduct and disapproved of it; but his objections were placed on the ground that the Canaanites and Perizzites might regard such conduct as very base and return the compliment by killing Jacob and his sons.

25. It is also claimed that it was to Shechem that Jacob sent his son Joseph with the coat of many colors to look up his brethren who were tending their flocks; but when he arrived there he learned they had gone farther north, even unto Dothan, and following them there, they conspired against him, threw him into a pit, and afterward sold him to be carried away into Egypt.

26. When the land was divided among the twelve tribes Shechem fell to the lot of Ephraim, but was not of great value, for on one side of the very narrow valley there was nothing but masses of worthless rocks. Subsequently, however, it became a Levite city of refuge.

27. After the division of the Israelites, Jeroboam, the king of the ten tribes, made his capital at Shechem, but later on the capital was changed to Samaria.

28. After the return from the Babylonish captivity, Shechem became the center of Samaritan worship, and has continued so until the present day. When the pilgrims arrived at the place they found there already Yacob Amram, the high priest of the Samaritans, who was in waiting to conduct them to the synagogue of the Samaritans, where they have copies of the Pentateuch of great age, and wholly unlike that of the Jewish scriptures.

29. The origin of the Samaritans is a matter of considerable doubt. They may have been Assyrians, blended with Jewish blood. In 2 Kings, xvii, 24, it says: The king of Assyria brought men from Babylon and from Cuthah, and from Ava, and from Hamath, and from Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria, instead of the children of Israel; and they have possessed Samaria and dwelt in the cities thereof.

30. When the Jews returned from captivity the Samaritans were disposed to assist Zerubbabel in rebuilding the temple, but were refused; and then their anger was aroused, and their hostility to the Jews and their worship became intense.

31. They resolved to run an opposition line, and to rival Jerusalem by a temple of their own; and accordingly they built one on Mount Garizim, which is within twenty minutes walk of Shechem or Nabulus.

32. Of course the hatred between the adherents of the rival religions became more heated. There is no greater hatred in the world than the devotees of one system of religion feel toward those who adhere to another system. In this way the most bloody wars have arisen, and this enmity has caused the most terrible bloodshed which the world has witnessed.

33. It became a sin for a Jew to extend hospitality to a Samaritan, or for a Samaritan to extend it to a Jew. The feeling expressed by the woman of Samaria to Jesus when he asked her for water shows the feeling of enmity that existed between the two peoples. She said, How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? For the Jews have no dealings with Samaritans.

84. The Samaritans believe in one God; they look for the coming of a messiah; they believe in the resurrection of the body, and the life of the world to come. They acknowledge none of the books in the Bible save the first five, called the Pentateuch, but they do not believe the Jews have the true copy of that. They observe the Jewish Sabbath; they believe in sacrifice, with the feasts and fasts observed by the Jews.

35. Yacob Amram led the pilgrims through narrow, dark, arched, and filthy streets to the synagogue, where they worship, and where two very sacred copies of the Pentateuch are kept sacredly under lock and key. The first copy brought was not the most ancient, but is a hand-made copy in Hebrew from the original.

36. As a special favor on this occasion, the older one, the most sacred of all, was brought forth, and the pilgrims were permitted to look upon it, but scarcely to touch it for fear of its being worn out. It is on vellum or parchment, and is in Hebrew, but by no means can it be copied or any translation made from it.

37. Yacob assured the pilgrims that the older copy is 3,472 years old, and is materially different from the copy possessed by the Jews. One claim is that it was written by Moses, and another that it was by a grandson of Aaron. One is as true as the other. The Scribe said if the Samaritan copy is is old as claimed it is nearly a thousand years older than the same books in the Jewish scriptures; but he believes not that either is so old.

38. The Samaritans still retain their identity and their prejudice toward the Jews, but there are only about one hundred and fifty of them left. Though their temple on Mount Gerizim has tumbled to ruins, they meet there to attend sacrifice and hold festival.

39. Kids of goats and lambs a year old are the chosen victims, but they must be without blemish. On the fourteenth day of the tenth month all the Samaritans leave their dwellings and repair to the mount, where, after due solemnities and ceremonies, some six of the kids are slain; and, after being dressed and salted, they are roasted in an oven for the purpose, after which the worshipers fall to and eat them up; at all of which it is supposed Yahweh is very much pleased.

40. Mount Gerizim is nearly three thousand feet above the sea, and was the Mount of Blessing, as called beforetime. Its neighboring mountain to the north, one mile distant, is Mount Ebal, or the Mount of Cursing. Nabulus lies between the two. It narrates in Joshua viii, 33, 34, how the tribes of Israel gathered on these two hills, when the Levites lifted up their voices and pronounced from Mount Gerizim blessings upon the obedient, and from Ebal cursings upon the rebellious.

41. Owing to the shape of the hills, it is said that a person standing in the valley can hear what is said in a loud voice on either mount.

42. Nabulus has from 12,000 to 20,000 inhabitants, but the town is not inviting. The population is largely Mohammedan, with some Romish, Greek, and Protestant Christians. A Latin monastery is here, also some fifteen or more of soap factories; but they cannot be very extensive, or the soap is sent away, for the people do not look as though they used any of it.

43. A feature of the town are the lepers who live there. These unhappy creatures sit at the entrance of the town, and when strangers approach extend their deformed and eaten hands, their shrunken limbs, show their distorted faces, and with the horrible husky voices peculiar to them they beg in the most piteous manner. It would seem a very singular kind of providence that should mark out the existence and condition of such miserable wretches.

CHAPTER XIX.

NINTH VISIT OF MELCHISEDEC.

1. And it came to pass when the camp was quiet, and the weary pilgrims had sunk into sweet repose, the Venerable Visitor, just as he had done in previous occasions, entered the tent bearing the Stars and Stripes, and, approaching the cot of the Scribe, mildly spoke these words:

2. Hail, young Scribe; I greet thee on this occasion, and speak words of peace unto thee. I perceive that thou art weary after the hard day's travel, and I would not disturb thy rest nor add in the least to thy weariness. Is there aught that thou wouldst have me speak of to-night?

3. After a moment's thought the Scribe made answer in this wise: Venerable Friend, thou hast kindly spoken of many things touching the events and claims contained in the Old Testament, but thy servant would be greatly pleased to hear thee upon the subject of the New Testament, especially touching the story of Jesus Christ, the remarkable character that is claimed for him, and the wonderful deeds he is said to have performed. Is his story true?

4. Then did the Venerable Visitor make answer in these words: Thou art a Truth Seeker, and I will, so far as in me lies, aid thee in thy search, and give thee what I conceive to be the truth of the whole matter.

5. I deny not there is a basis of truth upon which the current story of Jesus is founded. It is my opinion that there was one living in this rocky, desolate country a person who bore the name of Jesus; and he might have been the reputed son of a carpenter, while he might really have been the son of a priest.

6. Indeed, there was more than one person bearing the name of Jesus, for it was a common name at that period, and was of the same tenor and meaning as Joshua, being simply a modification of that name. In the story of Jesus there are some events that occurred in the lives of two different individuals.

7. But there is a great deal in the story as it has been puplished to the world that has no truth in fact; so that I may say with all truth that there never was such a character as the Jesus of the New Testament is held up to have been. No person ever came into existence in the way claimed for him; no person ever performed the miracles attributed to him, and no person ever left the earth and was taken up bodily into heaven, as claimed for him. All these claims are simply false.

8. There was a man who strolled about the country and was followed by a band of prophets who had little or nothing to do. In part he was a reformer, in part an enthusiast, and in part a person who desired and expected to reach a position as ruler of the land.

9. He attracted no great attention, and possessed no great ability; neither was there anything about him of an extraordinary character. Similar persons have risen in many countries, and in various ages of the world. There was nothing bad about the man, nor did he do anything more than hundreds of his fellow-beings are capable of doing.

10. As his followers increased, his ambition also increased, until at length he even entertained an idea that he was destined to occupy the position of king or chief ruler in the country. It was this which led to the event that closed his career. With him, as with thousands of others, political ambition led to his ruin.

11. The very assertion that he was the king of the Jews, and that it was his destiny to sit upon the throne of David, was sufficient, in the unsettled condition of the country, to stir up enmity and ill will against him among those of his own nation, and answered for a sufficient pretext for the Roman authorities, who were extremely jealous of anybody and everybody who made pretensions to political authority.

12. The man was executed, not because he was really dangerous, nor because the Roman authorities were seriously alarmed at his pretensions of being a prince, or becoming a king; but at that time it took but little to call out the sentence of death, even the crime of stealing a very limited amount being sufficient to demand it.

13. When the Romans became established in the land of the Jews they introduced crucifixion as the mode of capital punishment; and every person who was sentenced to death, regardless of what the offense was, died by crucifixion; thus it was not all strange or unusual that the man Joshua, or Jesus, was deemed a turbulent, designing person, or that he was sentenced to be crucified. The two men who are said to have been crucified with him had committed no crime very dangerous to the country, neither had Jesus; and the three are illustrations of how small a matter at that time was deemed deserving of death.

14. These are the points untrue in the claims set up in reference to Jesus. He was not begotten by Yahweh, or any other god, any more than every other human being that has come into the world. He had a natural father, the same as every other person who has had existence; and the claim that his mother was a virgin when he was born is wholly devoid of truth.

15. No woman ever conceived unless she had come in contact with a person of the opposite sex; the claim that a virgin can become a mother in any other way besides that which nature prescribes is one of the falsest that was ever made. There is but one way that females can be impregnated, and the assertion that it can be done in any other way is as great a falsehood as can be uttered.

16. The claim that Jesus performed miracles; that he set aside the laws of nature; that he raised the dead; restored to sight those who had been blind from their birth; that he healed lepers by his word; that he converted water into wine; that he fed five thousand persons with five loaves and two fishes, and had five times as much left after they had finished eating as they had to begin with, is wholly devoid of truth.

17. As I said before I say again, no miracle has ever been performed. A miracle is something that is produced in opposition to the laws of nature. Every event that has ever taken place has been a natural result, the consequence of natural laws; hence the idea of a miracle is a most absurd one.

18. The claim that Jesus rose from the dead and lived again in the body as he did before he was executed is totally false. No such thing ever occurred, and it is as impossible as it would be for a man to swallow himself. Every time this claim is made a falsehood is uttered.

19. The claim that he was taken up bodily into heaven is another arrant falsehood. No person's body ever left the earth, nor can it by any possibility. The body is made up of the matter that belongs to the earth, and there is no means by which it can be separated from it. And even if it were possible for a living body to be taken from the earth, it could not exist for five minutes.

20. No living body can continue to exist without a due amount of oxygen, which forms a part of the atmosphere near the earth's surface. When a distance of four or five miles is attained from the earth the atmosphere becomes so light, and contains such a small amount of oxygen, that the body could not continue to exist. There is nothing in the world plainer than this.

21. Again, as soon as a few miles from the surface of the earth is reached the cold becomes so intense that no being could live if placed there, nor could it live ten minutes while passing through it. Thus it will be seen there are the best of reasons why a person in the body cannot be taken up away from the earth.

22. It is a noteworthy fact that these impossibilities were not claimed for Jesus when he first began to be believed in, and when his story was first circulated among men; but these impossible claims were added on to his story a hundred years or more after he no longer lived upon the earth. But it is well to remember that it is vastly more easy for these assertions to be made than to prove that they were true.

23. Paul, the renegade Jew, was one of the earliest promulgators of Christianity, and he did more for its spread than all other persons who have lived in the world. His writings are also older than any others in the New Testament; but when they are closely examined, it will be found that he has not a word to say about Jesus having been begotten by Yahweh, or any other god, not a word about his mother being a virgin, and not a word about his performing miracles of any kind.

24. Paul's idea of the excellence of Jesus consisted in his death—his being crucified for the sins of the world. This was the burden of his song—Jesus and him crucified—and this was the extent of his claim. Paul saw, in the fact that Jesus was unjustly crucified, together with some good doctrines he had taught, a sufficient basis for building up a new system of religion.

25. It was not till more than a hundred years after Jesus was dead, and Paul was dead, that the extravagant stories about the miraculous conception of Jesus, about his being begotten by God, about his performing the most astonishing miracles, such as his raising people from the dead, about himself rising bodily from the dead, and being taken up bodily into heaven, were preached and held up to the people to be believed.

26. In Paul's day Jesus was not supposed to be God, and the pagan doctrine of the trinity had not at that time been held by Christians, nor its acceptance demanded. This was all an after consideration, a plan of the fathers of the church; and pursuant to this new-fangled notion, or rather old-fangled notion, borrowed from preëxisting systems, the words attributed to Jesus were changed.

27 He did not think he was a god, nor did he teach it. He knew nothing about his being begotten by God, nor did he ever say a word about it. The expressions that he and his father were one, and the doctrine that he had lived eternally previous to his coming into the world, he never used nor advanced. This was wholly an invention long after he had passed away.

28. Nothing of this doctrine was contained in the original gospels, from which the present gospels were made up. There is nothing of the kind in the gospels attributed to Matthew, Mark, and Luke. It is only the gospel attributed to John that contains those doctrines, and that gospel was not written by John, but by a designing father of the church, to establish the doctrine of the trinity, which was unknown to Jesus and his disciples, including Paul. The doctrine of the trinity was adopted in the second century, and was not preached in the first.

29. It was felt by the Christian leaders when it was determined to elevate Jesus to be a god that his career must be attended with the power of working miracles. It was common in that age of the world, and had been for thousands of years, to attribute the power of working miracles to gods, to demi-gods, and great heroes, kings, and extraordinary men.

30. It was extremely easy to adopt the same style in the story of Jesus, when it was thought that his story must be backed by miracles. It was far more easy to invent the story of the miracles than to have them true. I would have it ever borne in mind that a miracle never was performed; the laws of nature have never been superseded, and have never been suspended.

31. It was no more difficult to make up these stories about the miracles performed by Jesus than by scores of other individuals who lived before him and since. There have been thousands of miracles claimed for different persons, but not one of them is true. Every event that has occurred was the result of natural causes, and whatever is produced by natural causes is no miracle.

32. It is vastly easier for lies to be told in any instance, and about any person, than for impossibilities to take place. People should always think of this when they are asked to believe that which is opposed to nature. It is far easier for a lie to be told than for an impossibility to take place. The world has been filled with lies, but not with miracles. Many miracles have been asserted, but not one has been true—all have been lies. Those attributed to Jesus are no exception.

33. But I will detain thee no longer on this occasion, as thou art weary, and to-morrow thou hast an unusually hard day's work to perform. I will resume this subject at my next visit. Good-night; peace be with thee.

CHAPTER XX.

TENTH DAY'S JOURNEY—TO SHILOH AND BETHEL.

1. And it came to pass on the morning of the last day of the eleventh month that the captain of the host required all the pilgrims to be up in time to eat while still it was dark, and be ready to start on their journey when the light had appeared, for this day nine hours had to be passed in the saddle.

2. As the pilgrims passed through the town and reached the eastern entrance they saw half a dozen lepers sitting in a pitiful position by the roadside, though it was chilly in the morning air, and a horrible picture did they present with their deformities, their distorted faces, their crippled hands and feet, their shrunken limbs, and their hollow, distressing voices. It is only omnipotent power that can help such cases, and that refuses to work. It has little pity.

3. In passing out of the town numerous men and women were seen howling and praying at that early hour in a Mohammedan cemetery, among the graves, for the souls of the dead. The noise was dismal. If such hideous noises can do the dead any good they must indeed be easily benefited.

4. A halt was made between the highest points of Mount Gerizim, the Mount of Blessing, and Mount Ebal, the Mount of Cursing; and the probability was canvassed as to a person standing in the valley and hearing what could be spoken on the hills, fifteen hundred feet above. It was decided it could be done if the voice was loud. But both mounts are simply masses of barren rock.

5. A mile outside of town a stone building of small size was reached, which is called the tomb of Joseph, where he was buried when his bones were brought up from Egypt, where he had died two hundred years before.

6. To the Scribe it looked as though the stone building was of comparative modern structure, and he did not for one moment believe that the bones of Joseph were within a hundred miles of the place; and even if they had been buried there, he could not see that the locality would be in the slightest degree benefited thereby.

7. Half a mile further on what purports to be Jacob's well is reached, which is simply a rough hole down in the ground through the rock, said to be to the depth of seventy feet, but is much filled up with rubbish, loose stone, etc. Around are the ruins of an old church, which was once built over the spot.

8. It is considered a very sacred place, for it is here that Jesus is believed to have stopped when he became thirsty, and asked the Samaritan woman to give him water, and where they held their little tete-a-tete; it was from this well that she pointed to Mount Gerizim hard by, where her fathers had worshiped; and it was from this well that he looked down the little valley and saw the harvest ripe for the sickle.

9. There is nothing about the well that to the Scribe looked any more sacred than any other rough hole in the ground, not walled up, with no curb of any kind around it, and no water to be seen or heard from when a stone is thrown into it. If the well ever afforded water the time has gone by, for nobody now goes there for that refreshing fluid. It has gone to decay like all the rest of this country, and the religion which once existed here.

10. It was here that it is supposed the youthful Joseph looked for his brethren, but found them not, having to move on toward Dothan. It was here that Jacob is said to have presented Joseph with a piece of land, but there is nothing now to indicate that the title has been preserved.

11. Moving on down a narrow valley toward the south, over very stony roads, two or more modern Moslem villages were passed, possessing no historical interest and not the slightest attraction of any kind. Numerous male and female Bedouins and natives were met, the women usually carrying a load of some kind upon their heads, and looking not at all fascinating.

12. Several Syrian farmers were sowing wheat and barley in the narrow valley, and plowing it under with their stunted yokes of cattle and their small cultivator-plows, which fail to remove the stalks of the weeds of the past season. Some of the better hills were terraced hundreds of years ago for vineyards, etc., and the more arable ones are still plowed for grain.

13. On the hills three miles on the left were pointed out the tombs of Phineas and Eleazar, the sons of Aaron, but the Scribe could not recognize the authority which undertook to decide that those men were buried there, and thought it far more probable the places were where some old sheiks were buried a few hundred years ago. In fact, he was indifferent whether the sons of Aaron were buried there or not; and if they were, he could not see how the knowledge that they were could be of much benefit to the world.

14. While passing over the hills and along the winding valleys between the high hills of rocks, the sun beat down very warm, making the weary pilgrim feel depressed. The mornings and evenings are chilly, but the sun through all the middle part of the day shines with a constant and peculiar glare, which burns the skin and produces a deep tan-color.

15. This was not a well day for the Scribe; he had a recurrence of the ailment which troubled him at Baalbec and Damascus, and which in fact has hung around him in his journey through the Land of Yahweh.

16. He finds the most effective remedy to abstain wholly from meat and drink, and on several days he has pursued this course. On this day, when journeying to Shiloh and Bethel, he suffered neither food nor water to enter his mouth; but that kind of diet is not extremely bracing for a long day in the saddle.

17. As the sun poured down his blistering rays, as mile after mile of arid, barren rocks were passed, and the hill of Shiloh at length hove in sight, he felt particularly wearied—wearied with riding, and wearied with the continued vistas of barren, worthless rocks.

18. At length the hill of Shiloh was reached, another mountain of rocks, with nothing but rocks, rocks, eternal rocks, to be seen on every side, with the least quantity of soil that can be imagined. At Shiloh the pilgrims lunched, and gladly the Scribe lay down in the sun to rest, but not to eat.

19. And in this wise did he address the pilgrims around him: I know not how you pious folks feel, but for myself I have this to say: If this is God's country, I want nothing of it; and if the other countries of the world are the devil's, I prefer the devil's every time. There is altogether too much holiness here for my use, and I prefer a country where there is a great deal less of it.

20. The pious pilgrims were not excessively pleased with the country they had passed through, and more than once the Scribe had reason to think they felt sore and disappointed at its wretched and sterile appearance; but, nevertheless, they looked up at the Scribe as though they thought him an irreverent cuss for making such a remark about the Land of Yahweh.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1882.

Comstock Balked.

We are glad to see a little common sense has been exercised by a Jersey jury in one of the infamous Comstock's cases. New Jersey is a state noted for the severity of the punishment meted out to offenders, and "Jersey justice" has become a synonym for legal rigor. The state seemed to be about fifty years behind the age, and, with the exception of Delaware, was regarded as more puritanical than the original Puritans themselvs. Probably it was because of this reputation that Comstock instigated a prosecution against a book that is sold openly over the counters of every respectable book-store in New York and other cities. The book is the "Heptameron of Margaret, Queen of Navarre." The tales of the "Heptameron" were written by Margaret of Angouleme, queen of Navarre, and the only sister of Francis I., about three hundred and fifty years ago. They were put together with imaginary conversations, after the manner of the "Decameron" of Boccaccio, which about that time had been translated from the original Italian into French.

James Miller, the bookseller and publisher, at 779 Broadway, New York, sent out Hiram Dayton and David S. Knox last fall, according to his yearly custom, to sell books in the smaller towns of the neighboring states. It was their custom to rent a store in a town for a fortnight. During the day the books were offered for sale over the counters, and in the evening they were sold by auction.

Dayton & Knox opened a store in Cook's building, a prominent place in Asbury Park, N. J. A great many books were sold there, and among others were nine or ten copies of the "Heptameron." One copy was sold to a young law student, Alfred D. Bailey, on the afternoon of Nov. 22d. Two hours later Constable Jackson arrested Mr. Knox, who had sold the book, and also Mr. Dayton. They were taken before 'Squire Holmes, where James A. Bradley, the founder of Asbury Park, and president of its board of commissioners, made a charge against them of exposing for sale and selling to Bailey a copy of an obscene book. 'Squire Holmes put them under five hundred dollars bail, and at the opening of the January term of court in Freehold the grand jury indicted them.

The trial occupied Tuesday and Wednesday of last week. Judge Walling, before whom the young men were tried, is a typical Jerseyman, who never read anything but the Bible, and took occasion to go out of his way to hav a fling at Infidels, notwithstanding the fact that the Millers are eminently respectable Christians. He had never read nor heard of the "Heptameron." The county prosecutor, John E. Lanning, also had never heard of the book before. The jury was made up of farmers, with two exceptions. These were the foreman, John B. Arrowsmith, a retired miller, who, it was afterward learned, had read the "Heptameron" twenty years ago, and was the only man on the jury who had ever heard of it, and John T. Reynolds, a storekeeper, and formerly a charcoal burner. After the jury had been drawn and sworn, the attention of the court and spectators was attracted by the entrance of Anthony Comstock, who carried a small yellow bag, full of pamphlets and law reports. He sat down behind the prosecutor, within whispering distance. The defendants were represented by Judge Robbins and Eusebius W. Arrowsmith, both of Freehold. They sat at a small round table, upon which were piled half a dozen copies of the "Heptameron," a copy of Rabelais, belonging to Judge Robbins, and the works of Shakspere, Byron, Pope, a Bible, Taine's "English Literature," and several book-catalogs of book-publishers and public libraries.

Mr. Bradley, who is famous through the county for his zeal in temperance matters, was the first witness. He testified that he was in effect mayor of Asbury Park, and that he had sent Arthur Bailey to buy the "Heptameron" because he had heard it was being sold, and that it was obscene. He identified the copy of the book purchased by Bailey. It was the "Flameng edition," with etchings by Leopold Flameng.

The prosecutor was evidently but a tool in Comstock's hands, and was directed by him. He pursued the same course that met with such success before Jeffreys Benedict in the United States court. He submitted, as did Fiero, a copy of the book with the passages marked upon which the prosecution relied to send the prisoners to jail. The defendants' counsel very properly objected to the marked passages going before the jury. He made the same plea that Mr. Bennett's counsel did—that the whole book was to be considered. Upon this the cloven foot of Comstock stuck up prominently. He whispered to the prosecutor, and handed him a printed copy of the proceedings before Judge Benedict whereby Mr. Bennett was convicted and sentenced to the Albany penitentiary. The prosecutor based his argument upon this, and proceeded to address the jury.

Judge Robbins, in opening the case for the defense, said that the defendants were the agents of James Miller, and that they had sold nothing that was not recognized as legitimate by literary people and the trade of booksellers. The "Heptameron" was a book never tabooed in New York. By reputable booksellers and by catalogs he proposed to show the recognized standing of the book as a classic; that it was a book sold publicly, and found in every complete library, public and private.

The court had evidently been furnished with a copy of the Bennett trial also, for its rulings were exactly like Benedict's. William L. Allison, the publisher and bookseller of this city, was called as an expert. He said he had been an editor as well as publisher, and he was also a member of the Presbyterian church. Expert testimony was promptly objected to by the prosecutor, who was coached by Comstock, and the court as promptly ruled that Mr. Allison's knowledge of books had nothing to do with the case. His only qualification, the court said, was his being a church-member. Every question put to Mr. Allison was objected to by the prosecution, the objection was in each case sustained by the judge, and an exception was taken in each case by the defense. An effort was then made by the defense to show that the defendants had no other knowledge of the book than that it appeared in all the catalogs of book-sales, and on the shelves of all booksellers, and was sold publicly every day in New York, in spite of the agent for the suppression of vice. Judge Robbins said that a fair trial would require an examination as to the standing of the book in the field of literature and among booksellers. The court, however, ruled out all of this proffered testimony. Mr. Arrowsmith, for the defense, said that under such a ruling a jury of Infidels might pronounce the Bible an obscene book.

"I don't think you could get a jury of Infidels in Monmouth county," said the judge.

George A. Leavitt, the bookseller, of this city, identified a lot of catalogs in which the public sale of the "Heptameron" was shown, but he was not allowed to go further.

David S. Knox, the defendant, was asked if he had ever read the "Heptameron," and answered, "Never." The prosecutor sat with both legs over the arm of an adjoining chair, and objected to every question. Mr. Knox was not allowed by the court to testify further than to the incidents of the sale of the book to Bailey, and of the arrest of the defendants an hour later. They had, he said, in their store, American editions of the "Heptameron," published by R. Worthington and John D. Williams, of New York, and by Gebbie & Barrie, of Philadelphia, and editions imported by Scribner, Welford & Co, and J. B. Lippincott & Co. Prosecutor Lanning asked Mr. Knox if he had not put up the book at auction night after night, and called attention to it as "racy." Mr. Knox denied that he had ever done so. Hiram Dayton, the other defendant, said there was nothing surreptitious in the manner of offering the book, and no special effort was made to sell it.

Judge Robbins then offered to show that matter of a similar sort to the "Heptameron" is received by people of education and literary people as legitimate. He proposed to read from Shakspere's sonnets, Boccaccio's "Decameron," Rabelais, Swift, "Don Juan," La Fontaine's Fables, Chaucer, Fielding, Smollet, Gay, Pope, and Burns. The court refused to admit the testimony, and rejected also the offer of catalogs to show in what places the book is publicly to be found.

Justice of the Peace Truax, of Asbury Park, testified to having been shown the "Heptameron" by Dayton, who, he said, told him that he could read it all the next day, and called his attention to certain parts of it, but added, as the witness testified, "'Taint no place to lay it down on the parlor-table."

Young Mr. Hawkins of the prosecution then drew his chair close up in front of the jury, and read parts of some of the tales, omitting always the morals with which they are pointed and adorned.

Mr. Arrowsmith, in summing up for the defense, described the life and the times of Margaret, queen of Navarre, in order to show that the book was in keeping with them. Judge Robbins showed the character of the book in history and in literature. He said it was not for a Monmouth county court and jury to say that a book which has lived for three hundred and fifty years was obscene because of broad passages in it, or appoint themselvs as the censors of literature.

Turning abruptly upon Mr. Comstock, who sat whispering through closed lips to the prosecutor, Judge Robbins said: "Why hasn't Comstock first suppressed it in New York, where it is published under his very nose? Why does he step over into New Jersey to teach us what we are to do and to read?" Mr. Comstock continued to whisper. Judge Robbins overheard a remark, and turned fiercely upon him. "No, you didn't stop Worthington from selling it." Half rising from his chair, Comstock hissed back at him, "You say that which is false."

In his charge to the jury Judge Walling said it would be necessary to prove that the book sold was obscene, and that it was sold without just cause. On the first point there could be no question. On the second point the Court declined to giv any opinion. It made no difference if an indecent story had a moral attached to it. If the book was obscene and indecent in part, the book would be an obscene book within the meaning of the law. As men of intelligence, capable of judging, the jurors would hav to determin from the book itself whether it was obscene. It was not a case for expert testimony. If it were found that this was an obscene book, then the third point would hav to be considered; that is, the jury would hav to decide whether it is for the public good, or necessary to the good of religion that the book be sold. If it were found to be an indecent book, and it were deemed that its sale was still necessary to the advancement of literature, it would hav to be considered whether it should be sold promiscuously. The jurors retired with their arms full of copies of the "Heptameron." At 6½ o'clock they returned with a verdict of not guilty. It was received with applause by the throng that lingered in the court room.

Comstock evidently knew his judge in this case, as he does in the United States court, but fortunately he was mistaken in his jury. The "Heptameron" is like two-thirds of the ancient books in many respects. It is a series of tales, like the "Decameron," with a moral to each one. It is not obscene in any way. There are hundreds of passages in the Bible many times broader than can be found in the "Heptameron," and Mr. Arrowsmith's remark that under such ruling the Bible could be convicted, was perfectly true. The judge's remark that a jury of Infidels could not be found in Monmouth county is not true. There are many disbelievers in New Jersey, made unbelievers, perhaps, by just such bigoted ruling as Benedict's and Walling's.

The remarks by the court that books necessary for the good of religion should hav special privileges will not pass unnoticed. It is an eminently Christian sentiment, and when put down into plain English means that the literature of the church, no matter how smutty, may circulate freely, but all other classics must be tabooed. The judge undoubtedly did his best to convict, as did Benedict in Mr. Bennett's case. He is evidently an old Jersey "blue light," who believes that Christ was crucified, and also believes that every one who does not believe should be crucified likewise.

We congratulate the Messrs. Knox and Dayton upon their escape from the web so artfully woven about them by Comstock. Yet we are glad the trial has taken place, for it shows the general public just what an intolerant bigot Comstock is. We congratulate the jury upon having the sense to see what the judge was trying to do, and manhood enough to resist his endeavor to incarcerate two men for committing no offense whatever. Every effort the vice society has made lately but shows up its true character in a plainer light. It is time Comstock was relegated to that oblivion from which he and his soap-fat backer sprung. He and all connected with him are a disgrace to our civilization, and, as long as they are clothed with their present power, a standing menace to our republican institutions.

Prominent Female Suffragists.

LEETONIA, OHIO, Dec. 26, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you oblige the writer by publishing in your paper the names of either sex who were pioneers on the question of woman suffrage in this country, and giv the character of such persons?

S. C. STRATTON.

We hav not the data nor space to giv the character of the advocates of female suffrage, but the reputation of some is world wide. The following are the most prominent: Mary Wollstonecraft, Frances Wright, Lucretia Mott, Harriet Martineau, Lydia Maria Child, Margaret Fuller, Sarah and Angelina Grimke, Josephine S. Griffing, Martha C. Wright, Harriot K. Hunt, M. D., Mariana W. Johnson, Alice and Phœbe Carey, Ann Preston, M. D., Lydia Mott, Eliza W. Farnham, Lydia F. Fowler, M. D., Paulina Wright Davis, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Matilda Joslyn Gage. A complete history of woman suffrage is being prepared by the three last-named ladies, the first volume of which is already issued. It is a very large work, comprising nearly 900 pages. Our friend will find all the information he desires in it. The price is $5 for the first volume. We can supply it. The second volume is under way.

GEO. CLARKE, the recent convert from the ranks of the clergy and church, has entered the lecture field and is now en route west. He is indorsed by the League, by which he is authorized to establish branches, and Geo. Chainey, with whom he has lived during the past six months. His subjects are "Reasons for Leaving the Church" and "Ingersollism." We hope our friends will avail themselvs of Mr. Clarke's services. He is eloquent, young, and wide-awake, and destined to be one of our most popular platform attractions this season. As he goes into the work with missionary zeal he sets no price on his services, but leaves that to the ability and generosity of his hearers. He will be in Philadelphia this week and Pittsburgh next, where he may be addressed care of S. F. De Jones, No. 99 Fifth avenue, and will answer all calls. We trust they will not be delayed, and heartily commend him to our readers. Besides lecturing, Mr. Clarke will take subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER and This World.

A LIBERAL League was organized in Bloomington, Ill., recently, at Schroder's Opera House lecture hall. The charter members are Dr. A. S. Burrows, Thomas A. Walton, W. C. Trott, C. N. Nute, Jacob Goldberg, Jas. Clark, Geo. H. Miller, Dr. H. Schroder, James T. Walton, T. F. Capp, Theo. Coffey, Chas. McGrew, and Wm. Mann. Dr. A. S. Burrows was elected president; Theo. Coffey, secretary, and T. F. Capp treasurer for the ensuing year. The object and aims of the League are to accomplish the total separation of church and state; to advocate the taxation of church property; to exclude the Bible from the public schools; repeal of all laws enforcing Sunday as the Sabbath, and various other reforms; to bring the state governments in harmony with the constitution of the United States, which, as George Washington said, was "not founded on the Christian religion." The League will meet every Sunday for public debates at Schroder's Opera House lecture hall at 2 o'clock P.M.

MR. BENNETT'S path through the East is not all roses. That contemptible fellow Joe Cook is over in Bombay, and has been attacking him in much the same style as he did in this country—slanderous and false. January 20th Mr. Bennett addressed a meeting in reply to Cook. On the 21st he started for Poonah, some hundred and twelve miles southeast of Bombay. On his way he intended to stop and examin the Carlee rock temples. Immediately upon his return to Bombay he and Mr. Bridges were to start on a railroad tour of a month's duration over all the northern part of India, winding up at Calcutta, where they would again take steamer and continue east. While in Bombay the two travelers were entertained by Col. Olcott and Mme. Blavatsky, who are conducting the Theosophist. Mr. Bennett's health continues good.

WE regret to hav to note the death of Miss Jennie M. Grant, of Sidney, N. S. She died at the residence of her sister, Mrs. J. W. Archibald, Elgin, Ill. The funeral was under the auspices of the Liberal League, and, by request of deceased, no minister officiated. The funeral was largely attended. The services were short, simple, and appropriate, consisting of affecting singing and some appropriate remarks by F. Felt. At the grave Mr. P. J. Corey delivered a short and appropriate oration. Mr. and Mrs. Archibald express their sincerest and heartfelt thanks to the press, people, and friends, who so kindly rendered deeds of kindness and sympathy in their bereavement.

THE Unitarian creed is like the Constitution of England—unwritten, but nevertheless as well defined and arbitrary as though marked out with square and compass. When the Rev. Mr. Miln went into the Unitarian fold he fondly hoped it had no bars, but when he went a little farther he found a solid stone fence reaching a good way up into the sky. But he has climbed over it, and when the Unitarians next call their roll he will not answer to his name.

OUR Spiritual contemporary, the Two Worlds, has suspended. Mr. Crowell will return to his subscribers their unexpired subscriptions. The paper was a welcome visitor to this office, and we are sorry that Mr. Crowell could not continue its publication. We advise his readers thus suddenly deprived of their paper to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which would be glad of a few more supporters.

EARLY next month the series of articles on the Christian religion which hav appeared in the North American Review, by Col. Ingersoll, Judge Black, and Prof. Fisher, will be published in pamphlet form. We shall hav a full supply and shall be glad to furnish them to all who wish. We will take orders now, and send as soon as out. The price will be fifty cents.

A CORRESPONDENT wants to knew where Brick Pomeroy's Great West is published. We supposed everybody knew, but for the information of our friend and every one else we will say that Denver, Col., has the honor of being the place.

WE hav just had bound a few copies of Vol. VIII. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which we can furnish to those wishing them. We will mail them to any address on receipt of $4.50.

E. C. WALKER is now in Nebraska and will spend the next six weeks in that state, Kansas, and Missouri, lecturing and canvassing for Freethought literature. His address is Norway, Benton Co., Iowa.

ALAMONTADA, THE GALLEY-SLAVE. A Narrativ. By Johann Heinrich Daniel Zschokke. Translated from the German by Ira G. Mosher, LL. B. Published by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This work is a narrativ of a young man for whose possession Fame and Misfortune seem to hav disputed with each other, with a victory at last for the latter. Its hero saw early in his life how hatred and egotism more than forbearance and piety were written on the banners of contending sects. Circumstances placed him suspended between two churches —Protestant and Catholic—the former of which he had to confess secretly, the latter openly; and he acknowledges that he became, though almost without knowing it, a hypocrit and a doubter of both. He saw that the arguments with which one attacked the doctrins of the other were sharper, more thoroughly weighed, and more effectiv than those with which they defended themselvs. This awakened in him a suspicion of all dogmas of faith. Yet he was obliged to conceal his thoughts in order not to become an open denier of them. He was thrown into the society of a thoroughly unprincipled man, but whom he believed to be honest, and whom he loved—and whose wife loved him. His struggles with his passions, his belief and disbelief, were incessant. The superstitions of his childhood he could not at times shake off, and again he was intoxicated with exaltations of mental freedom. But he warred manfully with himself and the world, and seemed about to be rewarded with all that complete victory over adversity can bestow. He had won a name, a wife, and a competence, when came the massacre of Nismes in 1703. Interceding with the Marshal de Montreval in behalf of the persecuted Huguenots, among whom were his uncle and family, he was denounced as a heretic and condemned to the galleys—one of the unnumbered victims of the love of God shown in hatred of man; and thereafter his history is that of Alamontada the galley-slave. How he bore the grief of separation, the suffering and degradation of slavery, is told by the author better than it can be hinted at here. Through the whole sad story there runs the golden thread of the religion of humanity and the philosophy of one who has wakened to the light of the newer day.

Prof. Mosher has left nothing to be desired in the way of bringing out the true meaning of the author's words, though the work of the translator is one of scarcely less responsibility than that of the writer. This work will find a place in the literature of romance and philosophy with those of Geo. Eliot, which divert the mind while they free and strengthen it. The study and enterprise which hav united to giv "Alamontada, the Galley-Slave," to the English-reading public should be rewarded by a demand for many editions of it.

MYRON HOLLEY, and What He Did for Liberty and True Religion. With steel-plate portrait. Price, $1.50. For sale at this office.

In this work Elizur Wright has shown the life and important works of a man but little known. The volume is both historically valuable and entertaining reading. Myron Holley, who was a descendant of Edmund Holley, the great royal astronomer of that name, was born in Salisbury, Conn., in 1779, and died in Rochester, N. Y., March 4, 1841. He was educated at Williams College, at the New Haven law school, and in the law office of Judge Kent in Cooperstown. He never practiced law, but engaged chiefly in agricultural pursuits. He was a member of the General Assembly in 1816, and was appointed in that year one of the board of canal commissioners. The great work was carried on under his personal supervision, and the financial management of the enterprise, so far as regarded disbursements, was mainly in his hands. He acted with wisdom and energy. He had difficulty afterward in settling his accounts with the state, though there was no suspicion of his honesty, and Mr. Wright thinks that he was hardly treated, and received only an insufficient reparation.

When the excitement against Masonry incident to the affair of William Morgan broke out, Mr. Holley joined the anti-Masonic party, and participated actively in its operations. He was one of the foremost speakers on that side of the state, and his pen was often employed to draft the addresses of the anti-Masonic conventions.

As the antislavery agitation increased, Mr. Holley became much interested in it. He was, says Mr. Wright, "the one man who did more than any other to start the political movement which culminated in 1860 in the victory of a party opposed to any further geographical extension of slavery." He commenced his antislavery labors by delivering lectures in 1838. These are said to hav made a deep and lasting impression. He began the advocacy of political action against the institution in an oration delivered on the Fourth of July, 1839, at Perry, N. Y. He proposed an abolition nomination for president at a state antislavery convention in Cleveland, 1839, but his proposition was not favorably received by that body. He tried the same experiment at a convention in Warsaw, N. Y., at which James G. Birney was nominated for the presidency, a nomination which Mr. Birney declined. The National Convention for the formation of a Liberal party was held in Albany, N. Y., April 1, 1840. In this convention Mr. Holley bore a prominent part, and his eloquence displayed upon the occasion was of the highest order. Again Mr. Wright says that "the Liberal party was practically his achievement."

Mr. Holley spoke constantly and effectivly, besides editing the Rochester Freeman. He had injured his health by his labors, and died in March, 1841. All the extracts from his writings and speeches which are given in this volume indicate a man of unusual intellectual ability, of fine oratorical powers, of a sweet and genial nature, and of rigid conscientiousness. If Mr. Holley had chosen to cast his lot with either of the two great political parties of his day he must undoubtedly hav risen to eminence. But he seems all his life to hav been ready to sacrifice himself for the sake of what he deemed the right. He died poor in this world's goods, but rich in the rewards of a good conscience.

PHYSIOGNOMY. A Practical and Scientific Treatis. Being a Manual of Instruction in the Knowledge of the Human Physiognomy and Organism. By Mary Olmstead Stanton. Price, $2.

This is a splendidly gotten up work of 350 pages, by one of the few practical phrenologists and character readers of this country. The object of the author is to help the human race know itself better, and to glean the knowledge in a scientific manner. Man can only know himself through a thorough understanding of anatomy, physiology, physiognomy, and hygienic law practically applied. Mrs. Stanton has put this science in as plain and simple language as possible, and in the study of this work the non-scientific reader will not be confused by terms whose meanings are ambiguous. The method of classification used is in accord with that observed by all naturalists in their classification of the lower animals, and is based on the forms of the human organism which are produced by the intermingling of the different vital systems. The position is advanced by the author that mind inheres in the entire organism, not alone in the brain. In this she claims the support of Spencer, Lewes, Haeckel, Maudsley, Lindsay, and other evolutionists and social philosophers. Her book is, therefore, the carrying out of this theory to its ultimate, by proofs which she believes to be incontrovertible. The book is a plain exposition of phrenological and facial science, and its careful study will do much to enlighten the human race as to itself. Many of the engravings are from Simms's "Physiognomy," and the author acknowledges her indebtedness to the same source for many valuable ideas. Altogether, it is a book we can heartily commend to the Liberal public.

Elmina Values It.

"Classified Biblical Extracts; or, the Holy Scriptures Analyzed," was the first that gave me an inkling of the contradictions, absurdities, and indecencies contained in the Bible. For years it was my handy reference for finding texts for arguments and talks against the holy volume, which in my girlhood was venerated to an extent that few people now realize. I am glad to see this old friend come out in a fresh, new garb, and hope every Liberal will send twenty-five cents and get one, and make a new friend out of Elmina's old friend. Address D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York. ELMINA.

THOSE who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER are losing a really intellectual feast. The letters of D. M. Bennett, the editor, from the Holy Land, now being published in that paper are unquestionably the very best that has ever been written from that country. The next country written up by Mr. Bennett will be Egypt—the land of the longest-known civilization. It should be remembered that he goes to these countries to get the EXACT TRUTH, and he will giv it without bias, prejudice, or partiality, and wholly free from religious cant and superstition. Of all the men in the world that could hav been selected for that purpose there is positivly not another so well qualified as he for that work. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the largest Liberal paper published in the world, and the price per year is only $3. A rare opportunity is here offered to get the best modern history of the world, besides an almost endless amount of other good reading. THE TRUTH SEEKER yet offers to those who are willing to aid Mr. D. M. Bennett in his Around-the-World trip, by giving him $5, the books of his travels, whether there be two or three, certainly not less than two, of a thousand pages each. We are really sorry for the person who is either unable or unwilling to take advantage of this remarkably good offer. The books will be worth a great deal more than the money.—The Blade, Concordia, Kan.

A Very Ignorant Man!

"I suppose," said a reverend to me the other day, as he was looking at the photograph of Ingersoll in my album, "you would be angry if I told you what I think of that man." "Oh, no," was my response; "I would not get angry at a thing of that sort." "Well," said he, "I call Ingersoll a very ignorant man." "Of course," said I, "he is ignorant of some things, and so are we all;" and as he hastily left the house I thought to myself, What a pity it is that we hav not ten thousand more men who are ignorant in the same line as "our Bob" is; who do not know how to be hard, cold, and unsympathetic; who do not pretend to know all about the wishes, feelings, and character of a something they call God, and who spend no lifetime of labor in bolstering up a religion founded on myths, legends, and superstitions; who do not know how to believe in endless suffering inflicted upon poor, weak, erring human beings, by a creator who made them just what they are, and made them so they cannot draw a breath or lift a finger without his help, and who is consequently responsible for all the sin, misery, want, and crime that has ever existed on the earth.

Yes, we want more such ignorance as this. We want more Ingersolls to teach the good, the true and the beautiful; to speak tender, loving words over our dead—words that will soothe the sorrow of the bereft, and teach them that "the dead do not suffer. If they liv again, their lives will surely be as good as ours. We hav no fear. We are all children of the same mother, and the same fate awaits us all. We, too, hav our religion, and it is this: Help for the living, hope for the dead."

If ignorance can speak truth, beauty, love, and compassion in such thrilling, entrancing, and convincing words that thousands flock to hear and admire, and the public prints repeat again and again the grand and glorious utterances, selecting them as gems of thought, as poetical conceptions, and sound and acceptable doctrins, then is ignorance the best of qualifications for a public speaker. If ignorance can earn tens of thousands of dollars pleading dry law cases in the courts of the country, where every word is subject to the keenest criticisms from the sharpest of intellects, then is it a blessing, indeed, to be ignorant.

Why, the most learned and intelligent among all your Campbellite preachers would not dare stand this test of public criticism. Not one of your reverend pleaders for God's (?) holy truths would dare stand before a jury of six Campbellite preachers and six Infidel lecturers, and deliver your sermons week after week, and allow the "ignorant" R. G. Ingersoll to plead on the other side!

You know too well the sophistry and weakness of your arguments for gods, heavens, and angels, to say nothing of devils and hells, to dare trust your hearers to see how easily they could be riddled by the hot shot of science, fact, and truth.

But Ingersoll pleads publicly against the whole horde of churches and their fifty thousand preachers, and challenges criticism, because he feels he has truth on his side, and he knows his eloquent utterances will go thundering down the ages long after the last god and ghost shall hav disappeared from the world.

In fine, if ignorance utters beautiful sentiments like the following, then may such ignorance be found all over the world:

"And do you know it is a splendid thing to think that the woman you really love will never grow old to you? Through the wrinkles of time, through the mask of years, if you really love her, you will always see the face you loved and won. And a woman who really loves a man does not see that he grows old; he is not decrepit to her; he does not tremble; he is not old; she sees the same gallant gentleman who won her hand and heart. I like to think of it in that way; I like to think that love is eternal. And to love in that way, and then go down the hill of life together, and as you go down, hear, perhaps, the laughter of grandchildren, while the birds of joy and love sing once more in the leafless branches of the tree of age."

The Right Boys for Ministers.

A farmer in the country wrote to the Farmers' Club of the American Institute, inquiring what profession they would advise him to choose for his young son, who, he stated, was a very good boy; "yet, he don't like the farm; he don't like farm work; he don't like to milk the cows, nor take care of them; he don't like to pick up stones on the meadows, nor make improvements on the farm. Yet he's a very good boy." To which S. E. Todd, Sen., replied: "Our country needs the most talented men and the most activ and promising boys on the farm. I hav no hesitancy at all by way of advising this inquirer what profession to to choose for his son. If he is an ill-natured, pugnacious cuss, always stoning the birds, kicking the dog, and trying to set him on the cat, let him study law. He will find his niche in the capacity of a country constable, a horse-jockeying pettifogger, or a legal attorney just competent to do the dirty drudgery of litigious and quarrelsome neighbors. But, if he is a wide-awake, activ, and energetic boy, who seems always ready and willing to take hold of anything, that is the boy for a farmer, who will make a mark, as an intelligent tiller of the soil, which will cheer and gladden the hearts of his parents. On the contrary, if the boy is hateful, indolent, disobliging, and never wants to do anything for himself, or any one else; if he is a boy of one idea, and is entirely satisfied to believe that the whale swallowed Jonah if his mother told him so, make a minister of him. You can never make a thorough-going farmer of such a one-idea dullard. Such a boy will be good for nothing except as a clergyman whom the women can run, while he can run a church."

[From the Chicago Tribune.]

The Rev. Mr. Milne.

A reporter of the Tribune met the Rev. George C. Milne last evening and propounded to him two questions: "Where does your utterance of Sunday leave you as to religious belief?" and, "What do the congregation of Unity Church think of your new departure?"

"As to the last question," said Mr. Milne "I hav not yet had an opportunity of learning officially the views of the congregation of Unity. Many of them think as I do, or at least think in the same plane. A considerable number are not yet ready to go as far as I hav gone. I hav spoken out what I felt, and hav not spoken hastily. My evolution of thought during the last five years, and especially during the last twelve months, has been rapid, and I am certainly further advanced than some of the members of Unity are willing to go at present. But if the church does not sustain me, I will leave it. As I feel to-night, if Unity church considers I hav gone too far for them, I will shut the doors of that church behind my back, and never enter the pulpit again. A three months' notice on either side is all that is called for by my agreement with Unity. Robert Collyer was settled there on that basis, and so was I. Very recently I resigned my pulpit, and it was only after two committees had called upon me, and I had been assured that I should be left absolutely unfettered to preach what I actually believed, that I withdrew my resignation. Probably in a week or so I shall be better able to tell the feelings of the people, and will know more about the future."

"Well, then, as to the first question?"

"Sunday's sermon, which was a series of three, pretty well defines my position. I hav abandoned supernaturalism entirely. My belief to-day is pure naturalism—that is, that men should only accept such evidence as is given them by their senses. I reject the idea of a personal God, of a hell, and of the immortality of man."

"In what do you, then, differ from those who, for want of a better term, are styled Agnostics?"

"I am not exactly an Agnostic, for I hold that the bulk of the testimony is against the existence of a personal God, a heaven, a hell, and the immortality of the soul. Nor am I careless about these things. I do not know what will be the result, but these utterances of mine will giv an opportunity to thousands who hold similar views to come out and boldly affirm their belief. There are many who hav held back for fear of offending. I am fully aware that these views are unpopular and much opposed to the tenets held by the majority, but people who share them can now come forward and state their belief."

"Considering, Mr. Milne, that your belief and that of those who think as you do amounts to a negation of all religious belief, what inducement is there for men to come forward and declare themselvs? Why should they constitute a church of unbelievers, or what use hav they for either church or preacher?"

"Oh, that is a form of Materialism with which I am not in sympathy. There are two classes of Materialists. The first class say: 'There is nothing after this life. Eat, drink, and be merry. Liv as honestly as you can, but if being honest interferes with your enjoyment, enjoy yourself, anyhow.' The other class say, 'Liv so that you can do some good to mankind, and make the world something better for your having lived in it.' As I understand my position, I am in the latter class."

"You are a long way in advance of the other Unitarian churches in Chicago, are you not?"

"A long way. There is the church of the Messiah, named after the Galilean, and presided over by the Rev. Brooke Herford. He is a good man—a kind of cross between Unitarianism and orthodoxy, with a strong leaning towards the latter. As he has reached an age at which men seldom extend their views, he will probably become more conservativ, rather than more advanced, in the future. He does not share my views—in fact, abhors them. The Third church has called the Rev. Mr. Carol, a Methodist clergyman from Pittsburgh, and a great friend of mine. He has strong leanings to orthodoxy, and has great respect for authorities. I hav thrown authority overboard altogether."

"In your church you hav had certain formulas, prayer, and singing of hymns. What are you going to do about them?"

"I hav given up prayer entirely. The essence of prayer is that it presupposes that the course of events can be changed by the being appealed to. As to the hymns. I giv you my word that I hav for a long time had the greatest difficulty in finding any that I could giv out without stultifying myself. I am opposed to many of the hymns in the Unity Church hymn book, because of their bloody theology. The great objection raised to men of my stripe is that we pull down and and do not build up. Now, I don't feel that way. My view of the church of the future is that it shall aim to instruct old and young in the ethics of humanity, and teach them to do good. It should also be a sort of club, bringing people together socially and generally elevating their moral tone."

"There are social features connected with the orthodox churches."

"Yes; but the influence of the orthodox churches is dying out, and a spirit of indifferentism is making itself manifest more and more every year. I would substitute for that a church which, abandoning supernaturalism altogether and appealing to men's reason instead of their fears, should help them to make the world better. Mine is the Materialism of George Eliot, and my conception is that of the City of Light of which Adler has spoken."

"A sort of moral Utopia, Mr. Milne?"

"Precisely. You will find the same expression in my sermon."

A Testimonial.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Anything produced by the brain of Col. Ingersoll, no matter how pure and lofty the sentiments may be, calls forth condemnation from bigoted Christians. Upon him in particular their whole combined force seems to center. They say the colonel is weakening in his views of immortality. Now, I cannot see in any of his writings or speeches where he has tried to take one hope away or asserted that death is the end of life. "Hope sees a star, and love hears the rustle of a wing. I will not take hope away from any human breast. Hope is born of love." I wish Christians would read all of his writings, and not, like Lazarus, be picking up the crumbs when an intellectual feast is prepared for them.

A visitation of nearly three months' sickness in my family resulted in my losing two out of three boys. Before and while watching at their bedside I gave the subject of immortality my most serious thought, and when my children died no parent's heart, it seems to me, could feel more pain or anguish. With my thinking and reasoning powers strained to the utmost tension I would hav wrested the secret if possible. As an Agnostic I can but say, It may be there is another life. I cannot assert anything I do not know, and what lovable heart will not join in with the colonel and say, "Hope sees a star?" When reading orthodox articles about Colonol Ingersoll, I can see from their very narrowness how little they know of his true character, and in proportion to their bitterness and narrow minds do they judge him. To what purposes the lessons of superstitious teachings will urge men, those only know who hav felt their power. It is my fortune to hav served in Colonel Ingersoll's regiment as sergeant, and it is always with pain that I read of attacks made upon him. In his military life, of which I am cognizant, I defy any one to bring a charge against him. His purse was open to the "boys" if their necessities required, and he had anything in it. Appeal to the colonel was sufficient for redress of wrongs or injustice, and when he left the regiment "he carried the affections of his boys with him." In my sorrows, some Christian ladies, seeing my affliction, and knowing I was an Infidel, for the time being forgot bigotry and did all they could for me; and in a card inserted in the Wabasha Herald I thanked them for their kindness and took occasion to say that Col. Ingersoll did not make war upon that kind of Christianity. He says, "Help for the living."

I hav a letter from the colonel. It was never intended for the public, but as he is styled the champion blasphemer, and his character made to appear the opposit of what it is, and as this letter may possibly bring consolation to some wounded heart, as it did to mine, even at the risk of losing his friendship, if he knows of it, I will submit it for publication. When it was written he knew of the loss of only one of my boys. I would especially recommend Mr. Talmage to read it to his congregation, and the next Sunday read Numbers xxvi. Here it is:

"Just this moment I read of your great grief. I know that words are of little worth and that time only can heal the wounds of the heart. I want you to know that I sympathize with you deeply and tenderly. If there is another life your boy is better now; if there is none, he is at peace. The dead do not weep. I feel that it is almost a sacrilege to say even these few words. Grief is sacred; and I not only sympathize with you, but with the heart-broken mother, whose tears will flow while memory livs. There will be some compensation in the fact that your sorrows will increase your love for each other. To hav suffered together strengthens and sanctifies the holy ties of heart and home. The vacant chair will bring you nearer together, and always above the little grave you will lovingly clasp hands.

"Hoping that the future has for you no other grief, I remain, "Your sincere friend, "R. G. INGERSOLL."

More Christian Lies.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Since Judge Black retired howling from his rencontre with Ingersoll, the North American Review has, as you well know, demonstrated its impartiality by having Prof. Fisher write an article in defense of Christianity, which, I suppose, will close the discussion.

Fisher ends his article with the remark that if any of his statements are contradicted, he will not attempt to vindicate them, which is a mighty prudent course. He couldn't vindicate the few which I shall contradict if he should try till doomsday.

"Materialism," says Fisher, "either in a bald form or in its Agnostic dress," is at the bottom of the opposition to Christianity. The words in italics involve lie the first. The Agnostic is no Materialist, and Fisher knows it. The Agnostic doctrin is that the human mind cannot explain itself, and, therefore, that neither Materialism nor the opposit theory of idealism, both of which attempt to do just this, can be received, even as a hypothesis. Far from destroying any rational hope of a future existence, this leaves the mind fully open to any evidence of such an existence that can be found.

"Assailants of Christianity in American journals frequently take up last century weapons which hav been cast aside by adversaries of the gospel who are abreast of the times." This is lie the second. The weapons of Thomas Paine hav never been cast aside by anybody. Strauss, Renan, and other modern Liberals do not use them much, because they write for scholars, who do not need to be convinced that the Bible is no "infallible rule of faith and practice." For those who think it is, Paine's artillery is as good as ever, and, indeed, on such opponents the improved canon of Strauss and Renan would be simply misapplied.

"Christianity is a still advancing religion." Lie the third. The statistics of America, England, Germany, Italy, Mexico, South America, Spain, Scandinavia, all show that it is a rapidly declining religion.

"The burden of disproving Christianity, and demonstrating that it rests on a false foundation, properly falls on the assailing party." This is not a mistake, but a lie. Fisher presumes on his readers' ignorance. Every one who has read a book on logic—and every man who has been to college has—knows that he who affirms must prove. He who denies need only say that he sees no sufficient evidence.

Fisher draws the usual absurd caricature of pagan antiquity. "Charity, compassionate love, says Boeckh, one of the profoundest classical scholars of the present age, was no virtue of the ancient world." Then Boeckh lies. Charity to the poor was a virtue much praised, cultivated, and enjoined in ancient Greece. That foolish, indiscriminate benevolence which has filled Europe with pauperism, did, indeed, come into Europe with Christianity. But it was always rampant in Asia. "In all antiquity the individual was merged in the state." No, no! Only in Greek and Roman antiquity. The stale Christian caricature of ancient morals is produced by confining attention to two countries, and putting together the faults of both, though they were quite different in every conceivable respect. Roman cruelty, Grecian sexual irregularities, and Græco-Roman slavery are all lumped together as parts of one portrait. But no people could be more feeling than the Greeks, more chaste than the Romans before that proud name was extended to all creation, or more devoted to liberty than the Germans. The latter were also very chaste. And as for the sloppy benevolence of Christianity, it never gushed more freely than that of Buddhism or that of Laotse.

"In Christian monasteries" (during the dark ages) "the remains of ancient literature were preserved." This thousand-times-repeated lie has been refuted as often as told. The Christian church annihilated art, literature, learning, science, and philosophy throughout the West. Aristotle, afterward her own great oracle, was lost for four centuries. In the East the treasures of Grecian intellect were too exuberant to be wholly destroyed, but they were no longer valued. It was the Mohammedan Arabs who appreciated the literature of Greece, translated it, and restored it to ungrateful Rome, when experience had taught popes and cardinals that to extinguish the light of human reason utterly was dangerous even to the stability of religion itself.

Apologizing for the Jewish wars of extermination, Fisher says: "The opportunity was given to a besieged city to surrender and become tributary. The inhabitants had the option of saving their lives." Lie. "Seven nations" are expressly excluded from that provision, and these seven "nations," or petty tribes, are the only ones the Jews ever appear to hav conquered! You observe that I assume the authenticity of their own narrativs.

"No such man as Nebuchadnezzar would hav been endured by the Hebrew people." Nebuchadnezzar worse than David! Oh, oh!

"A [Hebrew] father might for money dispose of his daughter, but . . . the purchase money might be looked upon somewhat in the light of a dowry." How absurd! A dowry is a sum of money given a bride by her parents, with the understanding (usually) that her husband is entitled to the use of it, but not to consume the principal. What has this in common with a man selling his daughter? The two customs are as unlike as possible, and belong to totally opposit states of society.

"It was the influence of the gospel which eventually abolished slavery in the Roman empire and serfdom in the middle ages." Slavery never was abolished in the Roman empire. It was to a certain extent discontinued after the dissolution of the Western empire, not because the slaves were emancipated, but because the masters were ruined and the slaves run wild. But slavery continued to be lawful in France till after the establishment of the monarchy by Philip Augustus; in Spain and Italy till the French Revolution; in Greece till 1828; in England till Judge Holt decided otherwise in the last century. As to serfdom, it was established by degrees between the reigns of the Christian emperors Constantine and Theodosius; and, moreover, the serfs were not partially emancipated slaves, but partially enslaved citizens. The Theodosian code declares laborers without property to be serfs (servi, the common Latin word for slaves) to the landlords on whose estates they work, and the ruined class of small proprietors (curiales) were also declared to be slaves of the state attached to the soil (servi imperii, adscripti glebæ). This system of serfdom, instead of being abolished, increased enormously during the middle ages. It was not abolished in France, Spain, Italy, or Germany till the Revolution, nor in Hungary and Russia till our own time. In England it was discontinued by degrees because the stubborn temper of the English peasants made it unprofitable, and because (the Saxon invasion having completely eradicated the Roman element of British civilization) it had never been very firmly established. So much for that complicated, many-sided lie!

"The old Canaanite tribes were steeped in a worse than brutal sensuality. The foulest incest was not the extreme point of their pollution." How does Fisher know this? The Bible, with all its abuse of the Canaanites, does not say so; and from what we know of the Phœnicians and Carthagenians it does not seem probable that they were materially worse than their neighbors.

I am far from having answered all Fisher's lies, for, in fact, they are almost innumerable; but I can not refrain from noticing some other observations, which, though true or half true, are exceedingly funny and suggestiv. "The Song of Solomon contains (except in one passage, chapter vii, 1–9, which is an interpolation) nothing to which a pure mind can take exception." You see I havn't a pure mind. Chapters i, 13; ii, 5, 6; viii, 3, seem to me slightly too warm for good taste. "Aristotle defends slavery on the ground that the slave is an animated tool." Yes, and the united clergy of America, on the ground that a mythical person called Noah cursed another mythical person called Ham, whose very name, being the eponym of Egypt, called in its own language Hama, or rather Kama, shows that he was not supposed to be the ancestor of the negroes, but only of the Egyptians! "The noblest man of all the ancients went to visit a prostitute; not to advise her to 'sin no more,' but to talk on the question how to ply her vocation with most profit." Let's see; why did Beecher (the most popular of American Christian preachers) visit Mrs. Tilton? But I beg pardon of Phryne. Whatever may hav been the faults of the pagan woman, it is most unjust to name the two in the same breath.

Prohibition.

It is not the province of Liberalism, as I understand it, so much to "remove temptation" as to cultivate the growth and stimulate the exercise of moral vertebra, to develop self-control, and to fortify character against everything calculated to injure. Strong and vigorous manhood consists in resisting evil influences, like the sturdy oak, bidding defiance to heat and cold, and to the storms and blasts of heaven.

"Liberta's" solicitude for the weak ones is equal to that of the old lady for her son, whom she forbade going near the water until he had first learned to swim.

This is a world, fortunately or unfortunately, as the case may be, where there is more temptation to the square acre than any place yet heard from out of hades. Temptation began in the "Garden of Eden," and I fear it will never let up on us poor devils until the curtain falls upon the final crack of doom. Had the "snaik," and the woman, and the "tree of knowledge" been "prohibited," Adam would undoubtedly hav stood up to the business like a man. As it was, he "fell." Most any one of us would hav done the same thing. The pressure was too much for him. The great High Ham had no business to put temptation in his way. Gov. St. John was not there to advise him, and Comstock and the Christian Assassination Society were not on hand to read proof and correct errors in the plan of damnation. There, all alone, without help, new at the business, and not very well anyhow, High Ham, no doubt, did the best he could under the circumstances. But he ought not to hav got his back up so high with Adam. Adam was not to blame. It was the fruit and the woman. The proper thing would hav been a prohibitory law, the fruit destroyed, Eve heavily fined and imprisoned for the diabolical crime of selling or giving Adam the apple, the serpent ejected, and the holes in the fence stopped up and made snake-proof.

Thus protected from every breath of harm and temptation, Adam would hav braced up and flourished like a green bay-tree. But no! High Ham must needs wreak his blarsted vengeance on the poor fellow, and incontinently kick him out of the garden. No man was ever known to fall by himself! But, of course, if you let a measly woman come prowling around to tempt him, he is a goner nineteen times out of ten.

That is why all temptation should be removed from man. He is a pretty decent kind of an animal, but he won't stand too much temptation. Horse-stealing is prevalent in the West; how to stop it has puzzled wise heads, but the prophet St. John has solved the problem. Eureka! prohibit horses! remove temptation! Young men ought not to be tempted, and so long as horses are allowed to waltz up and down the streets in broad light of day and display their seductiv charms, young men and old men who never before so much as dreamed of violating the eighth commandment will be dragged down to ruin. Those dens of infamy, livery stables, must be closed up, and their vile keepers lariated out on the prairie and kicked to death by bob-sleds. Such sink-holes of iniquity as watermelon patches, orchards, clothes-lines, and chicken-coops must be removed, and cease to corrupt the innocent and unsuspecting youth of our land.

Do not turn away with indifference, dear reader. You don't know how soon a dear brother or son may stumble and fall—get hold of some marked clothes or encounter one of those ungodly chicken torpedoes on a roost and get blowed into kingdom come. They never would hav gone there but for the clothes or chickens.

How many generous-hearted, noble young men, fresh from the sacred influences of home, hav jumped their board and wash-bills, which they never would hav done had those vestibules of hell—laundries and hash-houses—been blotted from existence Banks, stores, safes, express and passenger trains, are being daily thrown in the way of our loved ones. They hesitate (to see if the coast is clear); they toy for a moment upon the brink, and—over they go into the pen. Temptation did it! O my countrymen! is there no balm in Gilead? no doctor there? St. John says there is. Down with temptation! And down with everybody that don't yell, "Down with temptation," too!

The fact is, man has been out in the weather, exposed to temptation, long enough. Take him in out of the wet. Put bib and diapers on him; put him in the nursery under the care of old granny he and she nurses. Tie him up to a statutory pole like a hop vine or a sweet pea, or trail him up to the legislativ porch like a morning-glory, and let him gracefully entwine about a string as he soars heavenward. Let the church suckle him and tenderly water him with the dews of divine grace, and, my word for it, he will flourish with rankest luxuriance—till frost comes! Then you can mop him up into a bucket and carry him out to fertilize the garden with—about the first and best use you can put him to.

But that is not the kind of a thing Liberalism is endeavoring to propogate. And those are not the methods approved by Liberalism for the growth of men.
